The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 279) to permit to remain within the United States certain aliens admitted temporarily under bond in excess of quotas fixed under authority of the immigration act of May 19, 1921, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORT ON PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 47) was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 17, 1922.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 100,000 copies of the report of the Special Mission on Investigation to the Philippine Islands to the Secretary of War, without the map but with the data on the Philippines preceding and accompanying such report, be, and the same is hereby, ordered printed as a public document, to be distributed as follows: Sixty-five thousand through the document room of the House, 25,000 through the document room of the Senate, 5,000 through the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House, and 5,000 through the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions of the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has the resolution gone to a committee?

Mr. MOSES. It is a concurrent resolution and has not gone to a committee. I am strictly following the custom.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know that there is any custom which would require a concurrent resolution to be agreed to without consideration.

Mr. MOSES. No, indeed, except the custom for the chairman of the Committee on Printing to make a motion to concur in a resolution of this kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This involves a large appropriation. I think there can be no harm done by letting it go to the committee. I believe that course would be better.

Mr. MOSES. A concurrent resolution does not have to go to a committee. However, I have no objection to having it sent to the Committee on Printing, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reference to a committee gives a chance for each side to look into the matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is it a Senate resolution?

Mr. MOSES. No; it is a concurrent resolution passed by the House and sent here, and I am simply making the usual motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, we can not hear what is going on.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator from Alabama wishes to have the resolution go to the Committee on Printing, I have no objection to the reference, and I therefore withdraw my request that the Senate concur in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there has been so much confusion in the Chamber that we have been unable to hear. May I inquire what the motion or request is?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is a concurrent resolution from the House providing for the printing of a very large number of copies of the report of the special commission regarding the Philippine Islands. I do not mean to say that the report ought not to be printed, but we do a vast deal of useless printing.

Mr. MOSES. With all that I concur.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am merely insisting that the concurrent resolution shall go to the committee and be looked over by those whose business it is to look after such matters before the Senate is asked to pass upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not suppose anyone will object to that.

Mr. MOSES. I have no objection to the resolution going to the committee. I merely wish to say that in view of the parsimonious policy of the House in the matter of printing, when a concurrent resolution for printing comes over here we may generally accept it as having been cut to the bone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I believe the Senate is in legislative session?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if anyone on either side desires to address the Senate upon the pending treaty, I consider that under the unanimous-consent agreement it is my duty to move that we go into open executive session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to engage in a brief discussion of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Then I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator withhold the motion for a few minutes?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

INTERNATIONAL LABOR BUREAU.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, at the last session of the Interparliamentary Union at Stockholm, Sweden, there was adopted, among other resolutions, the following, heretofore included in the RECORD:

Resolution adopted by the nineteenth conference of the Interparliamentary Union, held at Stockholm, Sweden, August 17, 18, 19, 1921. (Submitted by Messrs. Engberg, of Sweden; Sigg, of Switzerland; and Munch, of Denmark.)

III.

The nineteenth conference of the Interparliamentary Union greets with satisfaction the creation of an international labor bureau; it appreciates the services of this bureau, destined to render the greatest assistance in the amelioration of the burdens resting upon the laboring masses of all countries, contributing thus to the establishment of social and world peace. It is pleased also to note that the numerous conventions and recommendations elaborated by the international labor conference have already been ratified by many parliaments affiliated with the union. It expresses its profound conviction that the union will have to continue its efforts within the parliaments in favor of this work of restoration and promises its aid and that of its group to the end that there may be a most careful study of the conventions and recommendations above mentioned. It urges the groups to promote within the parliaments the greatest possible constructive legislation looking toward the realization of the conventions and recommendations elaborated by the international conferences at Washington and Genoa, and to support the work of the international labor bureau. It urges further that each of the national groups may see fit to establish a labor committee, which shall be organized to aid such works of the group and which shall look after the promotion of the efforts of the union in accordance with the spirit of this resolution.

In accordance with the direction of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union, I have the honor to present to the Senate at this time the recommendations of these two labor conferences, the one held at the city of Washington and the other at Genoa, and I shall ask that they be referred for consideration to the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate.

Let me say in this connection, Mr. President, that these resolutions emanate from what is known as the International Labor Organization. It is an organization which had its inception with the League of Nations, but operates practically independently of that body. It consists, as it will be recalled, of delegates selected by the labor unions of the various countries, by the labor employers of the various countries, and of delegates appointed by the Governments of the various countries. Its purpose is, if possible, to make legislation touching labor in the various countries as nearly uniform as possible, so that labor in this country, for instance, will not be brought into competition with labor in other countries, where 10, 12, or 14 hours may constitute a day's work, and where other conditions are such as to make difficult, if not impossible, competition to obtain.

Let me read in this connection, Mr. President, simply the titles of some of the resolutions which have been adopted by these conferences. Here, for instance, is a draft of a convention limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to 8 hours in the day and 48 hours in the week. It is recommended that the legislatures of all countries belonging to the union enact laws establishing the 8-hour day and the 48-hour week as the standard, and a draft of such legislation is offered.

The next is a draft of a convention concerning unemployment; then a draft of a convention concerning the employment of women before and after childbirth; then a draft of a convention concerning employment of women during the night; then a draft of a convention fixing the minimum age for admission of children to industrial employment; another one concerning the nightwork of young persons employed in industry. Those emanate from the Washington conference.

Then, from the Genoa conference there is another recommendation concerning unemployment; a recommendation concerning reciprocity of treatment of foreign workers; a recommendation concerning the protection of women and children against lead poisoning; a recommendation concerning the prevention of anthrax; a recommendation concerning the establishment of Government health service; a recommendation concerning the application of the Berne convention of 1906 on the prohibition of the use of white phosphorous in the manufacture of matches.

There are further recommendations from the Genoa conference touching a number of similar subjects, including a draft of a convention concerning the age for the admission of children to employment in agriculture; another concerning the right of association and combination of agricultural workers, a question which had the consideration of the Senate some time ago; another concerning workmen's compensation in agriculture; another concerning the use of white lead in painting; another concerning the application of the weekly rest in industrial undertakings; another fixing the minimum age for the admission of young persons to employment as trimmers; another concerning compulsory medical examination of children and young persons employed at sea; and others of like character, the result of the thoughtful study of experts in these branches.

I trust, Mr. President, that this will not be considered as in the nature of a formal presentation of resolutions of this character, but that they may have the considerate attention of the Committee on Education and Labor, to which I now ask that they may be referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolutions will be received and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on March 3 there was inserted in the RECORD, upon the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], a letter or article contributed by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] to the weekly publication which is known as the Independent, setting forth the reasons which impelled the junior Senator from Pennsylvania to vote for the seating of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY].

As the Newberry case promises to be an issue in the coming campaign in the State of Michigan and in the State of New Jersey, if not in every other State in which a political contest will be waged, I thought it not inappropriate to address to the editor of the Independent a communication in which was set forth the reasons which compelled some of us who voted against Mr. NEWBERRY to take that course, asking that it be given the same publicity as was given to the article by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania. I have a very polite communication from the editor of the Independent this morning saying that my communication is too late for insertion in that journal. I ask, Mr. President, that my letter to the editor of the Independent may be published in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TO THE INDEPENDENT: In your issue of February 18 appeared a brief article from Senator GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER setting forth his reasons for voting to confirm TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY in his seat in the Senate. The enviable reputation enjoyed by the new Senator from Pennsylvania, to which you appropriately refer, the unique character of the position he occupies in having come to the Senate on the very eve of the vote, with other circumstances, contribute at once to awaken public interest in his utterances on the subject and to lend weight to the same.

In the belief that in the interest of an enlightened public opinion you will not be averse to giving equal publicity to the facts which impelled other Senators to the course they took in the matter, I am sending this communication for such disposition as you may care to make of it.

It is to be inferred from the whole tenor of Senator PEPPER'S article what he has elsewhere asserted, that the Democratic Members who voted against seating the Senator from Michigan were actuated by partisan considerations wholly, or at least that their action was controlled by such. He apparently is not prepared to admit even that such a case was made as that an honest difference of opinion might reasonably arise between men sincerely desirous of arriving at a just conclusion. He chooses to attribute to those differing with him among his colleagues motives unworthy of men occupying the responsible positions with which they have been intrusted and discharging the grave duties imposed upon them. Of that readers of the Independent may judge from the brief comment here made on the justification of Senator PEPPER in the article to which reference has been made. It is all too obvious to anyone familiar with the facts that he has accepted the current newspaper apology for the Newberry campaign instead of being guided by the record in the case. He advances—

(1) That huge sums spent in it, denounced alike by the majority and by the minority reports of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as well as by the resolution seating NEWBERRY, was justifiably spent, necessarily spent, in order to defeat Henry Ford, contesting for the Republican nomination.

The facts are, as disclosed by the record, that having been in communication with friends for some months prior thereto, having in the month of December, 1917, endeavored to engage Jay Hayden as manager of his campaign, and having, in the month of February, 1918, had a conference in New York with Paul King, who became such, and King having as early as the 6th of March openly taken charge, it was not until June 14, 1918, that Ford's candidacy was announced, no intimation having been given theretofore that he would seek the nomination on the Republican ticket. Such rumors as were current touching his candidacy prior to that time had reference to his becoming a candidate on the Democratic ticket, not the Republican. Meanwhile the Newberry campaign was directed against such unimpeachable Republicans as ex-Gov. Warner, three times elected chief executive of Michigan; ex-Gov. Osborn, who remained in the race to the last; William Alden Smith, who had a long and honorable career in both Houses of Congress; and C. B. Warren, now minister to Japan. It was against the pretensions of these formidable contenders that the Newberry campaign was organized, as is fully disclosed by the letters that passed almost daily between NEWBERRY in New York and King and others in Michigan. The pretense that the lavish expenditure of money characterizing the Newberry campaign was necessary was exploded in a letter written to him on September 17, 1918, by Gov. Osborn, in which that gentleman said:

"The plea can not be honestly made that you spent money in excess because you were fighting Ford, because you had begun your reckless campaign long before Ford was mentioned and had already transgressed the law. Nor can you plead you 'did not know.' That would prove you to be both an ass and a liar, which I choose to think you are not. I am for you only to save the Nation and the State from the curse of Fordism."

(2) That NEWBERRY being "continuously absent from the State" during the campaign, "the committee" raised and spent about $195,000.

It is true that NEWBERRY was in New York during the campaign, a fact from which, if it has any importance at all, the reader is to assume that he was ignorant of what was going on in Michigan and had no part in it. The fact is that he had repeated conferences in New York touching his candidacy before "the committee" began its work touching his campaign, that he had daily reports by wire from his private confidential agent touching the campaign, as well as from the manager thereof, who communicated with him by letter almost daily as well, and from time to time submitted to him detailed reports of his work and of conditions in almost, if not quite, every county of the State, while NEWBERRY was active himself in New York with concerns doing business and being influential in Michigan and being represented in the metropolis. Besides members of "the committee" and others made repeated trips to New York to confer with NEWBERRY, going sometimes singly but usually in groups. He was as thoroughly advised as to what was going on as if he were a daily habitue of the headquarters in Detroit.

"The committee" was no committee. They were simply NEWBERRY'S agents, selected by him. They represented no one else. "The committee" neither raised nor expended any funds, save that after a public uproar was raised in Michigan about the scandalous expenditure some effort was made by one or two members to solicit subscriptions. Up to that time, after the campaign had been in progress for five months, practically every dollar was contributed nominally by NEWBERRY'S immediate family and relatives—his brother, his wife's brother, his sister's husband, etc.

(3) "This money was all spent for purposes authorized by the Michigan statute governing election expenses."

One J. Scott Hunter got $600 of the Newberry money, which he says he spent for liquor and cigars. One John E. Korn visited Detroit headquarters, where during a conference there was laid before him on a table a sealed envelope. He opened it on the way home and found it to contain $400. One Hanson had slipped to him either in or under a magazine a $50 bill. Frank P. Bohn testified that he paid 15 men $5 apiece "to get their support and vote for NEWBERRY."

Instances like these might be multiplied indefinitely, but it is unnecessary, since the whole campaign was conducted in defiance of "the Michigan statute governing election expenses." It is needless to consider whether the line between legitimate and illegitimate expenses is crossed in placing an advertisement in every paper in Michigan, nor whether it was crossed in the particular case in which Paul King wrote NEWBERRY that a certain labor paper had still remained unconverted, but that he had sent it a full-page advertisement to be inserted just before the primaries, from which he evidently expected results. Every county in the State was "organized" by King, a chairman and a secretary appointed, all paid. Besides numerous "field agents" were employed at munificent salaries, one or more to reach the laboring men, one to influence fraternal organizations generally, another specially to work among the Masons. The foreign-born population was appealed to by field agents speaking their language. A whole army of paid workers was in the service of "the committee." The Michigan statute provides that—

"SEC. 45. Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives * * * or promises * * * to or for any person in order to induce or have such person induce any voter to * * * support or oppose any candidate, * * * every person who by any means receives * * * any money on account of doing or agreeing to do or having done any campaign work, electioneering, soliciting votes for such candidates on primary day or prior thereto, * * *"

And lest there should be aroused any doubt about the construction of the foregoing language the statute continues:

"It being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto; * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

It further provides:

"SEC. 48. * * * It shall be unlawful for any other person to do or perform for or on behalf of any such candidate or to help or injure the candidacy of any candidate, any of the acts or things which it is by this act made unlawful for such candidate to do."

"(4) Within 10 days, as required by law, the Newberry committee published a classified statement exhibiting the receipt and disbursement of the sum above specified."

Every book and memoranda from which the truthfulness of the report could be verified has disappeared and the only man who could account for their loss or give the facts was unavailable as a witness. When desired he was in Canada, a helpless wreck as a result of an automobile accident, it was asserted by NEWBERRY'S friends, in active business in Detroit to-day, it is averred on the other hand.

"Thereupon—that is, upon the filing of the report—the Ford machine attacked the expenditure as unjustifiable, and the subject was discussed all over the State for two months."

That sentence conveys a wholly erroneous impression. Reference has heretofore been made to the letter of Gov. Osborn written shortly after the primary. But on August 8, nearly three weeks before the primary, the editor of the Grand Rapids Herald addressed a letter to NEWBERRY, to which publicity was given at the time, in which he said:

"DEAR SIR: I desire to direct your attention to certain phases of the Michigan Republican senatorial campaign which seem to demand very clear and explicit public statement from you well in advance of primary election. * * *

"I direct your attention to these specific charges which have appeared in responsible newspapers. They are charges, furthermore, which find kinship in very general rumor and report. I fully realize that gossip is deadly and a ruthless assassin. But gossip, in this instance, is too widespread to be longer ignored. It charges you and your associates with the expenditure of money running into six figures in the erection of your senatorial organization. Such a situation must be as intolerable for you, if these reports are false, as it is intolerable for the State if the reports are true. Therefore it is a situation which must be challenged, because if not challenged by you it will have to be challenged by the electorate."

To this very pointed letter NEWBERRY replied in a communication which he characterized in a letter to Paul King, as follows:

"I am inclosing a copy of my noncommittal reply to the Grand Rapids people, which covers the situation in a rather flimsy manner."

It is aside from the purpose of this communication to attack the course of reasoning by which Senator PEPPER defends his vote upon the assumption that the facts are as he recites them. Neither will the argument be followed that, however reprehensible were the means by which his nomination was accomplished, the voters of Michigan condoned the offense by giving him a majority of less than 5,000 votes in an overwhelmingly Republican State which has never elected a Democratic Senator since the days of Lewis Cass.

It is quite evident from recent newspaper reports that some effort will be made in the ensuing campaign by Republican leaders to secure from the people of Michigan a revision of their judgment notwithstanding "the subject was vehemently discussed all over the State for two months," considering that little save rumor and gossip was available then, while the facts as revealed by the trial at Grand Rapids and before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections can now be made the basis of discussion.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 6, 1922.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. MOSES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to present a memorial from the Greater Boston Federation of Churches, praying for the ratification of the treaties, and ask that it lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the memorial will lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

GREATER BOSTON FEDERATION OF CHURCHES AND RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS,
Boston (9), Mass., March 14, 1922.

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LODGE: The Greater Boston Federation of Churches and Religious Organizations, representing more than 600 Protestant churches, Jewish synagogues, and other religious bodies, is throwing all its influence on behalf of the early ratification by the Senate of the treaties submitted by the President for its action. Its board of directors have authorized me to write you that they are confident that such ratification will conduce more to the permanent peace of the Pacific than any other action that our Nation could at present take.

The members of the churches and other organizations which constitute our federation are, in general, persons of education and of large interest in public affairs. They have for years given close attention not only to legislation within the Commonwealth but also to measures before Congress that have ethical significance, and especially to those affecting international relations. Among them are not a few men and women who have lived for years in the Far East and have been close students of the problems of the Pacific. Naturally the carefully considered opinions of these, whom we have the right to look upon as authorities, carry great weight with us. Hence we feel that our conviction with regard to these treaties, which is substantiated by these merchants, missionaries, and students of Pacific questions, is fully in accord with truth.

Our federation therefore earnestly petitions, through you, the Senate of the United States to ratify as speedily as may be the treaties negotiated by the recent Washington conference and submitted by the President.

We can not but believe that failure to ratify these treaties will both discourage the leaders of democracy in China and Japan and give power to the militarists in those nations to whom the treaties and agreements negotiated by and in connection with the Washington conference are, according to their own confession, death blows. Nothing could so reanimate the militarists of Japan and reestablish their hold upon their own nation, upon China, and Siberia as the defeat of these treaties in the United States Senate. Every mail brings from that Empire statements of those militarists showing the disorganization in their ranks created by the achievements of the recent conference and, in fact, voicing their conviction that they have suffered irretrievable overthrow. Coincidentally, the leaders of Japanese democracy are proclaiming that the defeat of the militarists of their nation effected by the conference marks the beginning of a new era of international friendship with both America and China, safeguards the Far East from war, and makes possible a movement for complete disarmament. At this very moment these democratic leaders, who have always championed a policy of closest friendship with China, Russia, and the United States, are fighting a battle to the finish on behalf of universal manhood, suffrage, and radical reduction of the Japanese Army. In the present Imperial Diet they are unlikely to succeed, but another general election will probably see them victorious.

If the Senate should refuse to ratify the treaties, it is impossible to calculate the disastrous effect upon this splendid movement toward democracy in Japan and the consequent elation and stimulation to further encroachments on the Asian mainland that would be fostered among her militarists.

The effect upon China also would be calamitous beyond estimation. It is within the bounds of cold scientific truth to affirm that the hope of China is grounded upon our Senate's treatment of these treaties. For the first time in history the forces in that Republic making for law and order and for the development of a Government devoted to the public weal have met with international treatment by the strong nations of the world calculated to back them up in their battle with the well-nigh irresistible elements of personal greed and selfish ambition so long dominant there. A very grave responsibility rests upon America in this emergency to give Asia a helping hand and to open a new era of national liberty, political probity, public service, and international good will throughout the Far East.

For these reasons our federation begs its two Senators who represent the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the entire Senate speedily to ratify the treaties now under consideration.

Very truly, yours,

DOREMUS SCUDDER,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a moment or two more?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there has been some discussion concerning the position of M. Viviani as to the four-power treaty. On the 10th of March he made a statement, which has been copyrighted by the Public Ledger Co., and from which I take the last paragraph, in which he says:

> I understand that the majority of those who protest against the Pacific accord fear that it is but the nucleus of a group of treaties which will lead the United States beyond its political orbit. We do not wish to pass judgment on American politics. If the Senate demonstrated by the rejection of the Versailles treaty that it was against all alliances, it was certainly acting within its rights. But the pact of the Pacific had been precisely conceived outside all alliances as an agreement on a common and definite point.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the pending amendment to the four-power treaty is designed to safeguard the United States from the perils which might arise through the signatories of the four-power treaty entering into secret engagements respecting international affairs. During recent years the sentiment in favor of publicity touching international relationships generally has been growing throughout the world. Sentiment in the United States has become well-nigh unanimous to the effect that the public ought to be permitted to know what is going on between the nations of the earth, particularly as the course of events may be calculated to affect the interest and the welfare of the people of this country.

The proposal that is now offered is in the form of an amendment. In my opinion, there ought to be no uncertainty as to the attitude of this Government respecting the requirement for publicity on the part of all nations with whom we combine for the accomplishment of any important international purpose. I anticipate that the advocates of the treaty will be slow to accept any amendment. During the debate the other day the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] declared his complete sympathy with the amendment proposed by myself, intended to prevent the parties to the pending treaty from taking aggressive action against other powers and securing to other powers interested the right to participate in conferences which may arise out of such aggression. The Senator from Alabama, however, refused to accept the amendment, on the ground that it constitutes a change in the terms, and would make necessary a resumption of negotiations between the powers who are parties to the treaty, and might result in their rejection of the treaty.

It was pointed out at that time that if the other powers who are parties to this treaty are so insistent upon retaining freedom of action in respect to possible aggressions against the mainland of Asia it puts this country upon notice that we ought to be very careful indeed in entering with them into any enterprises or undertaking which may have the practical result of binding this Government to a passive attitude while other nations with whom we are in alliance proceed at will to commit aggressions against powers friendly to the United States.

Throughout the debate no Senator has combated the principle of that amendment further than to say that it might cause a rejection of the treaty by other powers. No Senator has put himself on record as opposing the principle that while the four powers are combining to protect themselves against aggressions by outside powers, they ought also to give to the world their pledge that none of them will seek to violate the rights of outside powers. No Senator has contended here that it is wrong in principle or unfair in any sense to permit outside powers to participate in the conference when controversies arise between outside powers and any one of the four powers parties to this compact. The whole opposition to it so far has been put upon the ground that it may make necessary further negotiations, and may result in the rejection of the treaty by one of the other powers.

It is my intention, when the parliamentary status permits it, to offer that amendment, in substantially the same form, as a reservation. When so presented it will express merely the understanding of the United States that it is the intention and purpose of these four powers—Great Britain, France, Japan, and the United States—not to aggress against any other power, and that if a controversy arises with another power that power will be granted a hearing in the conference. Surely the Senate will not reject the proposal when submitted as a reservation, and thus impliedly declare that the United States understands that the parties to the treaty will refuse to respect the rights and possessions of other powers, or that it has no understanding of what the policy of the four powers will be respecting aggressions against the sovereignty or rights of weaker nations.

I want Senators who are willing to try this case stripped of every political consideration, who are willing to try it solely upon its merits, to give serious consideration to the question as to whether, in view of the facts and circumstances that are well known, and in view of the lack of information respecting many important questions relating to this treaty, the Senate shall put itself on record as rejecting the proposal that it is the understanding of the United States that these four powers, while binding themselves together for their mutual protection, will respect the possessions and the rights of other nations, and will grant other nations who complain of the action of any of them the right to a hearing before the conference contemplated by the treaty.

It has always been my belief that international questions ought to be determined as nearly as possible free from every political consideration. We divide politically very naturally upon domestic questions, and the interests of the country require that we should maintain those divisions, that our varying viewpoints touching all domestic questions may be brought to the consciousness of the public and the public be given an opportunity of determining who is right. In the conduct of our foreign relations, however, it has long been the accepted theory that, in so far as it can be done, every question should be stripped of considerations of personal or political advantage, and a conclusion reached based solely upon the best interests of this Government and the righteous performance of its duty to its people and to the world. If that rule has been departed from while other treaties were being considered the precedent can furnish no justification for similar conduct now.

From the beginning of this contest in the Senate an effort has been made by some to inject into its consideration political issues. It has seemed to me that the portion of the press which has been unqualifiedly favorable to the treaty has been prompt to attempt to give to this debate a political color. In my opinion, nothing could be unfairer to the country and unfairer to those who are actually moved by a conscientious sense of duty in assuming their attitude on this important question. Politics shall not prompt me to oppose any treaty which in my sincere judgment is wholesome and beneficial in its probable effects, neither shall I be influenced by propaganda, however widespread, to favor an international arrangement which I believe conceals dangers to our country.

The New York World, a protreaty newspaper, publishes this morning an editorial that I am going to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The editorial relates to the subject which I have been discussing—the fairness of the amendment which I proposed and which the Senate rejected. It discusses the duty of the Senate to make clear the fact that it is not entering into a combination with three other great powers by which those powers, while claiming for themselves immunity from attack by reason of the united strength of all, refuse to avow a purpose to respect the rights and possessions of other and feebler powers. This editorial comments upon the fact that no opposition to the principle of the amendment has been asserted in the Senate save that which grows out of the fear that Japan or some one of the other powers might reject the treaty if we expressly avow it to be the understanding of the United States that hereafter she will not commit aggression on the Asiatic nations.

I declare with all the emphasis at my command that if it is the purpose of any one of these four powers to pursue a policy of aggression in the Orient or elsewhere, and if that power would reject this treaty if we so modified it, either by amendment or reservation, as to deter or restrain it in such aggression, if such power would for such considerations reject this treaty, then it is our duty to make clear on the face of this instrument that we will not be a party to any such arrangement as the instrument and the powers actually contemplate.

If it is the purpose of any one of the four powers entering into this agreement to use it as a cloak behind which to extend their authority and their dominion over feebler nationalities, then, unless we can restrain that purpose, we ought to reject this treaty; and the refusal of those who propose the treaty to accept the principle of the amendment, either as an amendment or as a reservation, does not argue very strongly their good faith that this is an honest enterprise, undertaken solely in the interest of the peace of mankind.

The secret arrangements between some of the great powers unquestionably were responsible for many provisions of the Versailles treaty which have come to be regarded by students of international affairs as oppressive and unjust. Old World diplomacy has always been characterized by secrecy. The assertion is made by many responsible persons and the belief is quite general that already there exist secret engagements between some of the four powers who are parties to this pact that are calculated very powerfully to influence the future of the Asiatic mainland.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] called to my attention a few days ago a press report in the New York Times, under date of March 15, in which it appears that Mr. Skvirsky, appearing in Washington as a representative of the Far Eastern Republic at the time the Washington conference assembled, openly declares that there is now in force a secret arrangement between France and Japan for the exploitation of Siberia. I read now the press report, as follows:

> The allegation that France and Japan have an understanding for the exploitation of Siberia to the exclusion of other nationals was made to-day by M. Skvirsky, spokesman of the delegation of the Far Eastern Republic, which came to Washington during the arms conference and is still here. He asserted that all developments since the arms conference and reports from Siberia indicated that France and Japan had an understanding as to their policy in the Washington conference.
> "Our information," said M. Skvirsky, "is that Marshal Joffre's visit to Japan, ostensibly one of pleasure, was in reality for the purpose of concluding details of the entente between France and Japan for the exploitation of Siberia. A new figurehead government will be established by Japan in Vladivostok to replace the discredited Merkuloff government, and this new government will probably be headed by Eremeioff. He will be as much a tool of the Japanese as Merkuloff has been, and no doubt will give large concessions to the Japanese, just as Merkuloff has done."
> Skvirsky charged that the Japanese sought to control the whole of Siberia, but "because of the objections which would be raised by other nations the Japanese dare not openly set up a Japanese administration," he said, "and, therefore, accomplish their purpose in a roundabout way by setting up figurehead 'counter-revolutionary' or 'white' governments from which they get concessions."

Here is a statement that while the Washington conference was in progress two of our allies, France and Japan, entered into a secret arrangement by which they propose to exploit Siberia. At another time I may take occasion to go somewhat into the details of the circumstances which give color to the accuracy of this charge by the representative of the so-called Far Eastern Republic.

We all know that a study of the economic conditions in Japan reveals remarkable developments during the last few years. In spite of those developments, Japan is dependent for certain necessary materials and products, without which she can not continue her progress and could not maintain herself in case of war. Particularly among them may be mentioned petroleum, steel, rubber, cotton, and wool, and perhaps other almost indispensable commodities. In order to secure these and other necessary materials, which Japan can not produce in abundant quantities, she has gone into Korea, into Shantung, into Manchuria, and into Siberia. Everywhere she has penetrated it will be found that back of her advance has been an economic necessity which has driven her to the course taken.

In this connection it may not be improper to refer to the fact that the Japanese policy, which has been well recognized throughout the last 25 years, has been one of expansion. Japan has the viewpoint that she ought to occupy toward the Orient the relationship which the United States occupies toward the western world; that there ought to be created, recognized, and enforced a Monroe doctrine in the East supported by the power of the Japanese Empire. Japanese aggressions have usually arisen out of economic conditions. She is not adequately supplied with certain materials necessary to her prosperity and progress, not to say military prowess. The conditions which have caused her expansion still exist as to some necessaries, and it is therefore likely that her policy of economic penetration supported by military power will be continued.

We have here a representative of the Far Eastern Republic, not admitted to the Washington conference, not granted a hearing, entirely extra-official so far as the proceedings of the conference are concerned, openly announcing that already a secret combination has been formed between two of the powers, France and Japan, which means the exploitation of the whole of Siberia.

It would be interesting, Senators, to know the facts relating to this alleged secret agreement between France and Japan. The Senate can not procure them. The Foreign Relations Committee might go into the subject, if it thinks it of importance, and might ascertain something about the nature of this arrangement, its purposes, and its probable effects. But we should not become a party to this treaty with Great Britain and Japan making secret engagements respecting China, and Japan and France making secret engagements affecting Siberia, and then, when we find they are carrying out those engagements, express astonishment. We have notice now that secret arrangements are being effected.

Has any Senator who knows the course of history during the last few years respecting the relationships between Japan and Great Britain the slightest doubt that there still exists an understanding betwen Japan and Great Britain as to the future policy of the two in the Orient? Does any Senator doubt that there is an arrangement of some sort between Japan and France affecting Siberia, although we do not know the details of it?

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to ask the Senator if he read the account of an address which Ambassador Geddes made yesterday in Los Angeles, Calif., in regard to this treaty?

Mr. ROBINSON. I read a brief press report of the address. I thought it was an Associated Press report.

Mr. SHIELDS. According to the press report, in his address he enlarged upon the advantages of this treaty to the United States, one of which was the removal of a great menace of war in the Orient.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I saw that.

Mr. SHIELDS. Has the Senator any idea what that menace was, and whether it was presented to the conference in formulating this treaty, and was one of the reasons for the negotiation of the treaty?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no information upon the subject whatever. I read with astonishment the statement attributed to Ambassador Geddes in the press report. He was quoted as having said that this four-power treaty is of great benefit to the United States because it has averted war in the Pacific Ocean, a war which was plainly imminent. I wonder if it is the view of the Senators who participated in the negotiation of this treaty that his declaration is true. I wonder if it is true that at the time the Washington conference was called and this treaty was negotiated the United States was facing a desperate war in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not catch who made this declaration.

Mr. ROBINSON. The British ambassador, Sir Auckland Geddes.

Mr. JOHNSON. On yesterday, in California?

Mr. ROBINSON. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is he at present engaged in making addresses for this treaty?

Mr. ROBINSON. The British ambassador made an address at Los Angeles, Calif., a news report of which I read.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not seen it, and that was the reason for my inquiry.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would interest the Senator from California to read the published reports of the address. The report was quite brief, but it was an emphatic declaration attributed to the ambassador that the great benefit to be derived by the United States from the four-power treaty was the fact that the four-power treaty averts a war in the Pacific Ocean which was imminent and scarcely to be otherwise avoided.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. My question is not perhaps germane to the matter which the Senator is now discussing, but it is in line with the question propounded by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

It has been averred repeatedly by the proponents of this treaty that the chief benefit to be derived by the United States from it is the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. In the first place, I do not assent to the statement that that alliance constituted a menace to the United States; but assuming that it did, the question I want to ask the Senator is this: Did not the treaty of Versailles ipso facto terminate the Japanese alliance? Are there not provisions in the Japanese alliance which are in contravention of the letter, as well as of the spirit, of the Versailles treaty, and did not representatives of Japan, of Great Britain, of France, and perhaps of other nations, state, at the time the Versailles treaty was negotiated, or immediately following, and upon a number of occasions since, that the Versailles treaty abrogated the Japanese treaty and all other treaties which were in contravention of the terms of that treaty? If that be true, then why is it urged here or elsewhere as the reason for this treaty that it does terminate a treaty which has already been terminated?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, my friend the Senator from Utah has asked me so many questions that it is impossible for me to keep all of them in mind.

Mr. KING. I want the Senator to speak at length.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is true beyond doubt that the representatives of both Great Britain and Japan expressed the view that the Anglo-Japanese alliance was inconsistent with the obligations of the Versailles treaty, and therefore was terminated. It is also true that the Anglo-Japanese alliance constituted a combination between those two great powers growing out of mutual interests and mutual necessities, if I may use the term, in the Orient. It may be that the Anglo-Japanese alliance would be construed to be a regional understanding, exempt from the provisions of the Versailles treaty. It is undoubtedly true that the four-power treaty is intended to be a regional understanding, and therefore exempt from the provisions of the Versailles treaty.

I can not conceive what use the words "the regions of the Pacific Ocean" would have if it were not the intention of the framers of this treaty to bring the four-power treaty within the provision of the League of Nations covenant, which expressly states that that treaty shall not affect regional understandings.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the treaty of 1911, the last Anglo-Japanese alliance, specifically provided that that treaty should not apply to any nation with which Great Britain had a treaty of arbitration.

Mr. JOHNSON. A general treaty.

Mr. BORAH. The United States did not have a specific treaty of arbitration with Great Britain, but we did have a general treaty. Sir Edward Grey took up with the Japanese Government the proposition whether or not that general arbitration treaty exempted the Anglo-Japanese treaty from operating against the United States, or vice versa. He said that he construed it as exempting the United States from the operation of the Anglo-American alliance under any circumstances, and the Japanese Government responded that it accepted Sir Edward Grey's interpretation of the treaty.

Since the passage of those letters, if there is any honor between nations, the Anglo-Japanese alliance was abrogated so far as the United States was concerned, just as perfectly and completely as it will be abrogated when the four-power treaty is ratified.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, beyond doubt the purpose of the provision in the treaty of 1911, referred to by the Senator from Idaho, was to exempt the United States from the effect of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Everybody understood that. It was a matter of common information. So that the Anglo-Japanese alliance, if the representatives of Great Britain and Japan are to be believed, was already abrogated before the Washington conference assembled. It did not constitute a menace to the United States for the reason that the United States was exempted from its provisions by the treaty of 1911.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In case trouble should arise out of the alleged aggressions of Japan on the Asiatic Continent, and they should be of such a character that the United States, while not immediately involved in them, would regard them as vitally affecting our interests or our policies, such as the open door, for instance, or any other international policy that we might have in that region of the world, and Great Britain, by reason of her treaty with Japan, should take the side of Japan, we would then be affected by the Anglo-Japanese alliance, even though we accept the interpretation of the agreement which has just been referred to by the Senator from Idaho and by the Senator from Arkansas as having previously annulled the alliance so far as it was directly applicable to war between either of the parties and the United States. In any controversy between Japan and some third power Great Britain would be involved on the side of Japan by reason of the alliance so long as it remained in effect as between them. Thereby it can be seen, it seems to me, that the Anglo-Japanese alliance would have the effect of preventing the United States from securing the cooperation of Great Britain in any intervention, diplomatic or otherwise, which it might care to take in such an emergency.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is quite true, and the same conditions will prove true, the same course of history will result, when the four-power treaty has been ratified. Does any Senator imagine, because of the express provision in the four-power treaty annulling the Anglo-Japanese alliance, that the conditions and the circumstances which have made allies of Japan and Great Britain have changed or terminated? Does anybody doubt that in the future as during the last 25 years Japan and Great Britain will make common cause in so far as any conflict which may arise between either of them and an outside Asiatic power is concerned?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Has the Senator from Arkansas seen the Associated Press dispatch from Paris as to the heated debate in the French Chamber in which the statement is made that France was bitterly humiliated because she was excluded from the preliminary conferences in which the four-power pact was agreed on?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not seen that debate.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I call it to the Senator's attention.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have understood from some of my friends who represent newspapers here that it is true that France was denied admission for a long time during the negotiations, and that in all probability the negotiations were almost complete before the arrangement was finally effected for France to be admitted. Mr. Hughes's letter justifies some such declaration. He refers to the fact that after the consent of Japan had been procured to the admission of France to the treaty, he himself framed the first draft that was then made, but he did not tell us what had occurred prior to that, and he did not tell us the reason why Japan objected to France coming in, and the reason why Italy, Portugal, and the Netherlands were finally excluded. Would you not like to know?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the interesting statement made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who has said here several times that he did not know what was going on when this agreement was reached. He stated, of course, the providential cause which kept him away, but I thought it a strange thing that his colleagues in the conference could not wait until he got back from the burial of his mother or at least tell him all about what they had been doing while he was away.

Mr. ROBINSON. Whatever may have been the motive for secret negotiations, whatever may have been the reason for the course taken, we now know that we are lacking in information which the Senate is entitled to receive and which it ought to have if it is intelligently to determine the folly or the wisdom of the United States becoming a party to this treaty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I have listened in vain, in the speeches made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama, and others who have been the ardent champions of this treaty, for reasons justifying it. I can understand that there might be reasons binding the persons who are interested in the Far East to treaty negotiations and perhaps to a treaty. It is obvious that any quarrels this Government may have or other Governments may have in the Far East or in the region of the Far East will relate to the mainland and not to those little islands in the Pacific Ocean. The United States has no quarrel with Japan over Sakhalin or the Pescadores or any of her islands.

Mr. ROBINSON. Or even Yap. We gave her everything we had in that region.

Mr. KING. We have acceded to the action which was taken by the League of Nations in awarding the mandates. Certainly we have no controversy with Great Britain over her islands south of the Equator. We have no controversy with France, if she has any insular possessions of importance in the Pacific, with respect to the same. We have no controversy with Japan with reference to her insular possessions in the Pacific. They have no controversy with us. None of them claims the Philippines. None of these nations claims Guam or Hawaii or any of the islands owned by the United States which might come within the terms of the treaty.

What reason was there, then, to enter into a treaty to respect the insular possessions of those four nations when there is no controversy respecting them? What reason was there, I repeat, for entering into a treaty when three of those nations under the Versailles treaty not only had agreed to respect their territorial possessions, not only insular but upon the mainland, but had guaranteed the title? What reason was there, then, for this treaty, which limited its operation only to insular possessions, whereas if there is any cause of controversy in the Pacific or the region of the Pacific it is bound to be upon the mainland?

It seems to me the treaty must be innocuous, or, if it is not innocuous, it must have some hidden or secret meaning or interpretation which thus far has escaped my mind, though perhaps it may be apparent to others.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, referring to the statement just made by the Senator from Utah, it is remarkable that this instrument should be put forward as the greatest document of modern times, and that no one who advances it will give a single reason for the United States becoming a party to it except that it rids us of the menace of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. The answer to that suggestion is that the Anglo-Japanese alliance never was a menace to the United States, according to the construction placed upon it by both Great Britain and Japan, and by agreement they had excluded the United States from the effects of it by the treaty of 1911 providing that it should not relate to any nation with which Great Britain had an arbitration treaty.

So that we are left without information as to the actual origin of this treaty or the motives which prompted the conference, called for the purpose of providing a limitation of armaments, to enter upon it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Utah asks the question what interest we had in the agreement in regard to the Pacific islands, and the Senator from Arkansas seems to agree with him that there was no reason, so far as those islands are concerned, why we should enter into such an agreement as that contained in article 1 of the four-power treaty.

I may answer that by calling the attention of the Senator to the very elaborate addresses which have been made to the Senate in the last few days in opposition to the treaty by the eloquent and distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], in which he pointed out the menace to the title and interest of the United States in the Philippine Islands on the part of Japan and the ease with which they could be captured. I may point out to both distinguished Senators editorials appearing almost every day in some of the most influential papers in the country, which are vigorously opposing these treaties upon the very ground that, by reason of the menace to the interests of the United States in the Philippines, by reason of the aggressive disposition of at least a portion of the people of Japan, of which there was evidence in the news dispatches at frequent intervals, we were limiting our ability to defend those possessions by agreeing not to fortify them, and so forth. It seems to me that there is the most elaborate and the most complete answer to the question of the Senator from Utah as to our interest in the islands of the Pacific.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Just one word if I may reply, though I do not mean it as a reply, to my friend from Washington. The inquiry which I made was based upon the theory, as I attempted to state, that we do not claim any of the insular possessions of Japan or Great Britain or France in the Pacific. Neither do either of those countries claim any of our insular possessions. Of course, we have an interest indirectly in the islands of the Pacific as we have an interest indirectly in the islands of the Caribbean in the matter of trade and commercial relations. We have trade interests and commercial interests in all countries, but we are not interested directly in any of those islands and we do not claim them, and they are not interested in our islands and they do not claim them. So that we are entering into an agreement or treaty merely to respect the boundaries of those insular possessions when there is no controversy with respect to them.

We do not contest the title to those insular possessions claimed by either of the signatories to the treaty, and they do not contest our title to any of the islands that we claim. Therefore we are virtually affirming a bald principle of international law, which is that each country respects the territorial integrity of other nations. That is all there is in this treaty unless there is some sinister motive back of it or some understanding that this is an alliance rather than a mere agreement to consult and respect the territorial integrity of the signatories to the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, referring to the remarks last made by the Senator from Washington, I have not commented upon that portion of the statement of the Senator from Utah to which the Senator from Washington refers, but I point out to the Senator from Washington that it seems to be his position, and the position of those who agree with him, that the United States, in addition to getting rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, gets a promise of protection for her islands in the Pacific Ocean; that is, immunity from assault on the part of the other three powers.

Mr. President, does the Senator from Washington contend, as it seems the British ambassador does, that Japan really had a purpose, before the four-power treaty was negotiated, to attempt to seize the islands in the Pacific Ocean belonging to the United States? Does any Senator believe that Japan had formed a purpose to attack the Philippines or the Hawaiian Islands if the United States did not enter into some such arrangement as the four-power treaty contemplates?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not make any such claim as that, but I do make the claim that the contingency was subject to very frequent assertions and counterassertions between the two countries.

Mr. ROBINSON. No, no.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me complete the sentence. What I referred to were the assertions of the opponents of these treaties as to the menace which existed, and their objection to the series of treaties in which we have agreed not to fortify Guam and not to fortify the Philippines. The distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who sits in front of me, is one of those who attach great importance to that feature of these agreements.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, just a moment. To show its relevancy, if it is a mistake to agree not to fortify Guam and the Philippine Islands, or, to state it conversely, if the true policy of this country is to fortify Cavite and Guam, against whom are we to fortify? Whose menace is it to guard against which these fortifications are to be erected if it is not the nation to which the Senator refers?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator——

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator from Arkansas will pardon me for an instant—for I do not wish any position of mine unintentionally to be misstated by the Senator from Washington—I have been interested, of course, in obtaining information concerning fortifications in the Philippines, in Guam, and in the Hawaiian Islands; but I do not wish the Senator from Washington to take that as an indication at all of my attitude in respect to any treaty that is not now pending before the Senate. My remarks and my arguments have been devoted exclusively and entirely thus far to the four-power treaty, and to the four-power treaty alone.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] can not divert this argument from the point of weakness, which his statement a few moments ago disclosed, in the position of those who claim that the United States is the beneficiary of great reforms in this treaty. I repeat, their contention is that, in addition to getting rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, we are securing the agreement of the three other powers, parties to this compact, that they will not attack our possessions and our rights in the Pacific Ocean. Mr. President, if it be true that prior to the Washington conference a purpose to violate our rights in the Pacific Ocean existed in the policies, secret or public, of any one of the other powers parties to this compact, I ask you, then, are you willing to accept the mere promise of that party that it will respect those rights, and are you willing to refrain from taking action to secure those rights on behalf of the Government of the United States?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me to answer his question, I will answer it in the negative, that I am not willing to depend entirely upon this agreement, however much I may respect the good faith of the parties to it, for I realize the uncertainty of human agreements, especially international agreements; but the Senator from Arkansas must bear in mind that in one of the treaties which accompany the pending treaty there is a provision for another guaranty, and that is that we shall have a Navy in the ratio of 5 to 3 as compared to that of Japan. So far as my dependence is concerned, I would place it to a considerable extent upon the willingness of the Congress to maintain a Navy upon the ratio and basis provided for in this treaty, and to maintain it efficiently, to give it proper supplies and proper personnel; and if the Senator from Arkansas will join with me in that, I will put forth my best efforts to furnish that additional guaranty for the agreements of the four-power treaty, in addition to the agreement itself.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had hope that such arguments as those made this morning by the Senator from Washington will not drive me to the conviction that it is my duty to vote against the naval arms limitation treaty; but if his premise be correct, if the statement which has been attributed to Ambassador Geddes be correct, that the four-power treaty averted an attack by Japan against the possessions of the United States in the Pacific Ocean, then, instead of disarming, I would call upon the American people to arm.

I have not understood that war in the Pacific against the United States was imminent; I have not understood that any one of the other three powers, parties to this compact, was planning or designing to attack the rights or possessions of the United States in the Pacific Ocean. If it be true that they were, it is a dangerous thing to rely upon a mere political promise and scrap our battleships and refuse further to fortify Guam and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I remind my friend from Arkansas that what Ambassador Geddes is said to have stated is practically the same as the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said in his speech asking us to ratify the pending treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. I had not understood that the Senator from Massachusetts stated to the Senate when he delivered his address that the United States was in danger of an attack from any one of the other three powers; I had not understood that the four-power pact was being advanced as affording relief from imminent and pressing controversies likely to result in war. I had understood that it is claimed to constitute an arrangement by which a controversy which may arise between the four powers shall be adjusted without danger of resorting to force; but, I repeat, if it be true that Japan, at the time of the Washington conference, was meditating an attack upon the United States—and I do not believe it—then the four-power pact could only prove a palliative, and we are not justified in leaving our Pacific possessions at the mercy of Japan.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understood the Senator correctly; but I never said anything to indicate that I thought war was imminent.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was my understanding of the Senator's speech.

Mr. LODGE. Then, I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I said that I did not understand the Senator from Massachusetts made any such statement. Such a statement, if made, would put an aspect on this treaty and give an importance to it, and render it so obnoxious that the people of the Untied States would demand its rejection. Mr. President, do you believe——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Just one moment—do you believe that if the Washington conference entered into this arrangement to enable the United States to escape an attack on her island possessions in the Pacific which Japan was contemplating, the country would stand for this treaty? I had not dreamed that there was such an issue here.

Mr. LODGE. There never was.

Mr. ROBINSON. I had understood that we feared Japanese aggression on the mainland of Asia, but I had not understood, as the Senator from Washington seems to understand, that it was necessary to enter into this treaty to protect American islands in the Pacific Ocean. I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I listened attentively to the speech of the senior Senator from Massachusetts, and I took notes as he went along. I had those notes before me when I made two speeches, and they showed that I understood him then just as I have stated.

Mr. LODGE. The speech delivered by me is all in print.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not know whether the Senator revised his remarks or changed them in any way.

Mr. LODGE. I did not.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not allege that he did. I do not know, for having heard the speech I did not read it.

Mr. LODGE. I did not change my remarks at all.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. But I took notes of the speech, and I ask the Senator if he did not use this language: "If we reject this treaty the outlook is dark, indeed," or words to that effect?

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not use the words that "the outlook is dark in the East." I was speaking of the general outlook for peace in the world, and I said "if we rejected this treaty, the outlook is dark, indeed," as it is.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is exactly what I said, Mr. President. The Senator did not hear what I said. I asked if he did not use the words "dark, indeed," and not "dark in the East," and now he says he did use those words.

Mr. LODGE. Those were the words I used, and I was referring not to the East but to the world at large and the cause of peace.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. But the words clearly indicated that we were in danger of war unless we ratified this pact.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator's words were to that effect. He also said that the clouds of war would settle over the world.

Mr. LODGE. I was talking about the peace of the world.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to say a word or two in reference to the Navy?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield further to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Arkansas has referred to the reduction of the Navy. In that connection there is this to be remembered, as the Senator from Washington has pointed out: The ratio was established 5–5–3, Great Britain 5, the United States 5, and Japan 3. If we had continued our building program of 1916, and Japan had continued hers, and Great Britain had continued hers, at the end of 10 years the ratio would have stood, Great Britain 106, the United States 100, and Japan 87. Under the naval treaty it will stand, as I have said, 5–5–3; and from the view that is now presented in the House of Representatives I think the Senator from Arkansas must, indeed, be sanguine if he thinks we are going to have even the ratio so provided.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not want to discuss at this time the naval arms limitation treaty. I have said, and I repeat, that I am friendly to the purposes of that treaty; that I want to support it; but some arguments have been advanced in favor of the four-power pact this morning that, to say the least, have not strengthened my inclination to support the naval arms limitation treaty. If we have just missed a war with Japan, if we have just avoided an attack on her part upon the Philippines and the Hawaiian Islands by this innocent instrument which we are now considering, I should be very slow to take any action in concurrence with the Japanese Empire.

I should prefer to pursue an independent policy or a policy which would at least give me the assurance of good faith from the nations with which we deal.

Mr. President, we want publicity; we want the light turned on this whole subject. If it is right, why should there be so much mystery and concealment in connection with its conception? Why should there be so much information withheld and so little furnished to the Senate concerning the origin and the negotiations which led up to the adoption of the treaty by the conference? Why should not the Senate know about it and why should not the people of the United States know about it? Why should we commit ourselves to the Old World policy of secrecy and mystery, which always means evil intent?

If Secretary of State Hughes had not gone to Bermuda and had been called by the Foreign Relations Committee to give that committee information regarding this subject, as Secretary Lansing and others were called when the Versailles treaty was under consideration, we might have learned what mysterious secret influences were propelling this agreement as the great achievement of modern diplomacy. We might have learned what secret engagements between our allies already had been formed. Does anybody doubt that there is a secret arrangement of some nature between France and Japan intimately related to the purposes of this treaty? Does anybody doubt that there is a community of interest and purpose between Japan and Great Britain which may place the United States at a great disadvantage when an issue arises between one of the other parties to the treaty and some nationality on the mainland of Asia? Is the Senate going to say by rejecting this amendment or rejecting the proposal in the form of a reservation that our allies may make what secret engagements they will among themselves; it is no concern of ours? If we take that course, the day we ratify the four-power treaty will prove pregnant with danger to this Republic.

I ask leave to print in the RECORD, in 8-point type, the editorial in the New York World, to which I referred in the opening of my remarks, and also the press report relative to the alleged secret agreement between France and Great Britain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be included in the RECORD as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York World of Saturday, Mar. 18, 1922.]

WHAT ARGUMENT AGAINST IT?

The World is still waiting for Secretary Hughes or Senator LODGE or Senator UNDERWOOD to give a valid reason why the Robinson amendment in substance should not be attached to the four-power treaty by resolution of the Senate as a formal definition of American policy. There may be strong and convincing arguments why this should not be done, but they have not been presented to the Senate.

Article 2 of the four-power treaty was written with Russia in mind. All the common guaranties among the four powers are contained in article 1, which pledges them to respect one another's insular rights in the Pacific and to enter a joint conference in the event of a dispute which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy. But article 2 relates to "the aggressive action of any other power," which means a clash beween Japan and Russia over the island of Sakhalin, one-half of which Japan owns and the other half of which Japan has seized from Russia. In order to remove any doubt that article 2 refers to Sakhalin, the supplementary treaty mentions the island of Sakhalin by name.

In case of "aggressive action," which may mean any action on the part of Russia that Japan chooses to regard as aggressive, "the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an uderstanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation." Nothing is said about bringing Russia into the conference. Russia is to be excluded. Russia is not to appear in court. But Russia's case is to be decided by a jury of which the complaining witness is a member.

Taking everything into consideration, that is a dubious method of stabilizing peace in the Far East, inasmuch as it is certain that Russia will not indefinitely submit to continued Japanese occupation of territory in Siberia and in northern Sakhalin. If there is trouble and the United States is obligated to enter a conference, the only rational thing would be to bring Russia into the conference, too. A conference to which only one member of the dispute is admitted is not a conference at all. Not only should Russia be admited but the United States should make it plain at the outset, in order to prevent future misunderstandings, that such is to be its policy.

The four-power treaty does not provide for this, but the Senate can provide for it without amending or mutilating the agreement in any respect. To attach the Robinson formula to the treaty as a resolution of the Senate does not change the obligations or responsibilities of the United States. It neither adds to them nor subtracts from them. It simply rounds out the conference, in so far as this country can do it, and makes that conference complete.

The World can understand why the Republican Senators should have voted against the Robinson amendment as an amendment. It can not understand why they object to the principle of it and refuse to attach it to the treaty as an expression of American policy. When Senator WALSH of Montana raised the question of Sakhalin during the debate Senator LODGE said nothing and Senator UNDERWOOD tried to dismiss it with the plea that it was all based on "such a dream as that Russia could come back within 10 years." Neither Senator UNDERWOOD nor anybody else knows what may happen during the next 10 years, but treaties are supposed to be written by statesmen and not by prophets. Nothing is more dangerous than to mix diplomacy with soothsaying. When the administration refused to recognize the Russian Government it did not advance the argument that Russia could not come back within 10 years, and hence recognition would be futile. It had better reasons than that, and Senator UNDERWOOD's manner of disposing of Senator WALSH's question only added to the sum total of senatorial ignorance about the treaty.

The World is ready to be convinced that it is wrong in its contention that the United States should at once announce its intention to bring Russia into conference should there be aggressive action within the meaning of article 2, but it can not be convinced by silence and evasion. Nor can the essential facts of the situation be disposed of by the Senate's primitive process of shutting its eyes to them.

The Senate Chamber rang yesterday with declarations that the United States should insist on payment of its bill of $251,000,000 for the upkeep of troops in the Rhineland. How the administration was to go about it to get the money nobody seemed to know. No suggestions were made along that line. But if the Senate could talk the claim into the Treasury it would be there before the week is out.

[From the New York Times of Thursday, Mar. 16, 1922.]

SAYS JOFFRE MADE FAR EAST ACCORD—CHITA DELEGATE INSISTS FRANCE AND JAPAN HAVE AN AGREEMENT TO EXPLOIT SIBERIA—NEW VLADIVOSTOK CONTROL—REPUBLIC'S TROOPS ANXIOUS TO OCCUPY THE PORT, BUT ARE PREVENTED BY JAPANESE.

WASHINGTON, March 15.

The allegation that France and Japan have an understanding for the exploitation of Siberia to the exclusion of other nationals was made to-day by M. Skvirsky, spokesman of the delegation of the Far Eastern Republic, which came to Washington during the arms conference and is still here. He asserted that all developments since the arms conference and reports from Siberia indicated that France and Japan had an understanding as to their policy in the Washington conference.

"Our information," said M. Skvirsky, "is that Marshal Joffre's visit to Japan, ostensibly one of pleasure, was in reality for the purpose of concluding details of the entente between France and Japan for the exploitation of Siberia. A new figurehead government will be established by Japan in Vladivostok to replace the discredited Merkuloff government, and this new government will probably be headed by Eremioff. He will be as much a tool of the Japanese as Merkuloff has been, and no doubt will give large concessions to the Japanese just as Merkuloff has done."

Skvirsky charged that the Japanese sought to control the whole of Siberia, but "because of the objections which would be raised by other nations the Japanese dare not openly set up a Japanese administration," he said, "and therefore accomplish their purpose in a roundabout way by setting up figurehead 'counter revolutionary' or 'white' governments from which they get concessions."

Merkuloff, head of the Vladivostok government, who is now reported in flight before the armies of the Chita government, granted vast concessions to the Japanese in the coal mining regions, Skvirsky said. In return for these concessions, he alleged, the Japanese agreed to provide Merkuloff safe conduct to Japan in case his government failed and to turn over to him large sums of Russian gold, which has been on deposit in Japanese banks since the fall of the provisional government at Moscow.

"The flight of Merkuloff," Skvirsky said, "indicates that the Japanese are about to live up to their agreement to provide protection for Merkuloff to Japan, and reports that Merkuloff's cabinet officers are accusing him of absconding with large sums of money indicate that he has already received or is about to receive the cash payments the Japanese agreed upon."

Troops of the Far Eastern Republic are within easy striking distance of Vladivostok, the Chita delegate declared, and if Japanese support were withdrawn, he said, they would be in the city within a few hours.

"It probably would not be necessary for our forces to capture the maritime Province," he declared, "as 95 per cent of the population is for us and would take over the government themselves the moment Japanese troops were withdrawn."

Japan is now endeavoring to get the Chita government to recognize concessions granted to Japanese companies by the Merkuloff government, Skvirsky said. This effort, which, he said, had been stoutly resisted by the Far Eastern Republic, is mainly responsible for the long-drawn-out proceedings at the Dairen conference between Japan and the Far Eastern Republic.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am quite heartily in sympathy with what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has said respecting his amendment. While, of course, from my standpoint his amendment, either as an amendment or as a reservation, does not cure the vice of this treaty, nevertheless it does accomplish some good. It is incredible to me that in a pact for consultation alone there should be only a few interested invited to the consultation, rather than all interested; for if this be a mere pact for conference, it is perfectly futile to confer only among four powers interested in the Pacific, rather than among all powers interested in the Pacific, and there can be no legitimate reason for excluding the other powers which may be interested in the regions of the Pacific in like fashion with the four powers to this pact; and when they are excluded, Mr. President, it is the demonstration that this pact means something else than consultation. However, sir, my purpose in rising was not to discuss the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, but in just a word to call the attention of the Senate to a peculiar and anomalous situation that exists here in the arguments of the advocates of this treaty.

The hobgoblin that is to frighten us into the four-power treaty is, as we know, the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Yesterday I showed that the terms of the Anglo-Japanese alliance related to a specific and a particular locality, the locality being described as the regions of eastern Asia and of India, not the Pacific Ocean at all; and I endeavored yesterday to make plain in a word or two that we, having no territorial interests in Asia or in India or in the East—the regions described in the Anglo-Japanese alliance—should not be at all concerned with that alliance, or touched with it in any way, shape, form, or manner; but if we could be affected by the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which relates to the regions of eastern Asia and of India, we may be affected in like fashion by another alliance concerning which this four-power treaty says nothing at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he leaves the subject of the Anglo-Japanese alliance as affecting only the region of eastern Asia?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the Senator to say that it is of no concern to the United States, because we have no interests in eastern Asia. Is that the position of the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON. I say that the alliance could not touch us because we have no interests there; I mean by that no possessions there.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is true that we have no possessions there, but the Senator would hardly contend that we have no interests there.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, I am not speaking of trade relations or commerce, if that is what the Senator means.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I apprehend, if the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, that the substance of what he is stating is that we have no such interests there as would lead to war between us and any country on account of them.

Mr. JOHNSON. We have no territorial interests at all there. That is what I mean.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But, notwithstanding that, there has been presented here in the course of this debate as one of the most important features of the situation the fact that the greatest interests internationally between the United States and the parties to this treaty do relate to the very region of eastern Asia, and not merely to the islands of the Pacific.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right; let us pursue that inquiry.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one second. The Senator knows the great controversies, diplomatic and otherwise, referred to in the so-called Lansing-Ishii agreement and various other diplomatic exchanges, the great reputation made by the late Secretary Hay because of the establishment of the so-called open-door policy, the question in relation to the aggressions of Japan in Siberia at the present time, the maintenance of an army there, and the interest of the United States in extending the trade of her merchants into that great, rich, and practically undeveloped territory of eastern Asia, the very territory covered by the Anglo-Japanese alliance; so that it seems to me quite difficult to reach the conclusion that the Senator from California reaches, that we are not concerned in the matters which were affected by that agreement between Japan and Great Britain.

Mr. JOHNSON. We may be territorially affected in eastern Asia and in India. If we are, I do not know it; but if we are affected in the fashion that the Senator from Washington says so emphatically, of course in the four-power treaty we would have dealt with the particular region; but in the four-power treaty we are dealing territorially, and we are dealing with certain insular possessions and certain insular dominions. In the Anglo-Japanese treaty they were dealing with the consolidation and maintenance of the general peace, of course, in the regions of eastern Asia and of India. Territorially, the one does not concern the other at all. That is what I have been saying, and that is what I repeat; and if the vast interests that are suggested by the Senator, of Siberia and of eastern Asia, and the like, were intended to be embraced within the four-power treaty, it is remarkable that these gentlemen, with the skill that they possess, did not embrace them.

But leaving that aside, territorially the Anglo-Japanese alliance does not touch us at all. If the Anglo-Japanese alliance was such a menace and such a danger, it may have been so great a part of this conference and of such transcendent importance as the Senator from Washington has pointed out that it was absolutely essential that it be eliminated by the four-power agreement. I do not believe anything of the sort; but if it was, and if that was the sole object, as has been asserted again and again here, or one of the main objects of the execution of the four-power treaty, I ask why the other treaty that related to a territory adjacent was not in like fashion terminated? It may have been by this time for aught I know. I have no very great information upon the subject, and I rise more for the purpose of obtaining that information than for the purpose of indulging in any dogmatic declarations concerning the matter.

I inquired this morning from one of the members who represented us in this conference whether or not the treaty that had been executed between France and Japan had been taken up when this four-power treaty was under discussion. He replied to me that in the later stages of the conference it was considered by the American delegation, but not thought by them to be appropriate to the particular discussion, or to affect it at all, and therefore it was not brought to the attention of the conference generally. I think I repeat accurately the reply that he made to me; but here is the agreement which he tells me—and I am dependent upon the information that thus I can derive—is yet in existence between France and Japan:

> The Governments of France and Japan, being agreed to respect the independence and integrity of China—

I wonder if you mark how sweet, ethereal, spirituelle, every treaty that is made by every exploiting nation is. They all begin in the name of sweet peace, and they all proceed upon the theory of protecting the territorial integrity of the weak. The most vicious of them proceed in just that fashion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in that connection, if I may interrupt the Senator for just a moment, did the Senator ever know one of them to live up to the ideals that are so beautifully set out in the preamble?

Mr. JOHNSON. I know of none; and the first one that these gentlemen assert will live up to those ideals is the one that our friend from Washington advocates. I do not advocate it at all, in addition to the reasons that I have given for my opposition because all history teaches us from the time that pacts were made among nations, from the time that there were agreements by imperialistic countries, that those pacts, however innocently phrased and whatever may be their spirituelle designs, are always ultimately used by one party or the other for exploitation, for oppression, and for ruthless activity against weaker countries.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, all along the path of civilization we find monuments to the truth of the skepticism of the Senator from California as to the holy protestations in the preambles of these treaties. There is China, which has relied upon the promises of others to protect her sovereignty. There is Armenia, which has been a harmless and, as far as we know, a virtuous nation, falling a victim to dependence on the good faith and generosity of other people. There is Russia, which listened to the voice of Germany, and now lies among the wreckage of the great powers of the past.

So, believing and agreeing with the Senator from California, I know he will agree with me that whatever may be the effect of this treaty, whether he may be against it and I may be for it, after all, and back of all treaties, the only true dependence of a self-respecting people is upon themselves in their own defense, and the preparations for their own defense, and that is not provided for in this treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON. Ah, yes, and the only way you can preserve your Nation is to preserve it. Preserve it how? Not by entering into imperialistic schemes with any other nation; not by entering into partnership with those nations which you know are always exploiting. Preserve it how? Letting it live its own life, in its own way, doing justice to all the world, seeking in every fashion amity with every nation on earth, but preserving itself by preserving the policy under which it has grown great, and under which its people have become the most powerful people in all the world. That is what I am seeking, sir, in this contest upon this treaty, to preserve the United States of America as the United States of America have come to us; retaining, sir, the heritage that is ours, retaining it so that we may go on to our glorious destiny instead of going over the brow of the hill and marching downward with those nations, imperialistic in character, exploiting in their activities, which never yet have regarded their plighted troth or their plighted word.

Mr. President, I did not rise to indulge in any such remarks as these, but to call the attention of the Senate to this French treaty, which I am advised is yet in force. It reads:

> The Governments of Japan and France, being agreed to respect the independence and integrity of China, as well as the principle of equal treatment in that country for the commerce and subjects or citizens of all nations, and having a special interest in having order and a pacific state of things guaranteed especially in the regions of the Chinese Empire adjacent to the territories where they have the rights of sovereignty, protection, or occupation, engage to support each other for assuring the peace and security in those regions, with a view to maintaining the respective situation and the territorial rights of the two contracting parties in the Continent of Asia.

That was signed the 10th of June, 1907, by Kerana and Pichon.

It provides "for the maintenance of the territorial rights of the two contracting parties in the Continent of Asia and to support each other in assuring peace and security in those regions."

I simply put the query, If the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which provided for the consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of eastern Asia and of India was such a menace to us, does the French-Japanese alliance, providing for maintaining the respective situation and territorial rights of Japan and France in the Continent of Asia, constitute a menace as well?

The one, the Anglo-Japanese alliance, is terminated by the new four-power alliance. I do not know where the other, the French-Japanese alliance, is or what is its particular position to-day. I call the attention of the gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber to it in order that they may enlighten us concerning it. I repeat only the conversation this morning held with one of our delegates respecting it, and I repeat, as well, that in the historical documents to which I have access it is asserted that this treaty is yet in existence and constitutes a binding arrangement between France and Japan.

I wonder if my friend, the Senator from Washington, in what was a very able but a very rapid dissertation just now upon treaties in the past, can not see the reason for preventing his country from entering into that kind of treaty? If he is right in what he said in his excoriation of these agreements of nations since time began, if they have ever been, with their peaceful words, with their ethereal intention, the mode by which peoples have been subjugated and territories stolen; if from the time civilization began pacts claiming to be of the character of this four-power pact have always been, as he said, merely the methods by which oppression rules, how in the name of God, with a real affection for our country and for its future, can he unite to-day in making us a party to that sort of thing?

The Senator from Arkansas stated this morning that we now have notice of what is transpiring in the Far East. You do not need the detail of the facts to-day about what is happening there. Every man who follows events at all understands and knows. But without those facts he has suggested, without the daily news items which come to us from across the Pacific, without this bloody page in to-day's history of what is transpiring in Siberia and in Korea, you have the experience of mankind, as the Senator from Washington has suggested.

You have, too, the experience of the last 20 years under the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and the experience of all mankind, as the Senator from Washington said. Certainly the experience of the last 20 years under the Anglo-Japanese alliance gives us notice, a notice which we can not fail to observe, that, conceal the facts in regard to this new treaty as you will, write it in words as ambiguous as diplomats ever used, couch it in terms which may be read one way in Japan, another way in France, another way in Great Britain, and another way in the United States Senate—do all these things, and yet you enter into a pact finally which takes your country upon a perilous course and leads it no man yet knows where.

It is this, sir, that by my opposition I would prevent if I could.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, just a word in answer to what the Senator from California has just said in quoting the remarks I made in interrupting his speech.

What I said was not in condemnation of treaties of amity and peace, but it was in condemnation of what I would regard as the fatuity of any people that would divest itself of the means of self-defense because of the existence of such a treaty.

I may have occasion at some later time, before the Senate votes upon the treaty into which we are about to enter, to give my reasons for casting my vote in favor of it, as I expect to do. It will have a binding effect upon the powers which are parties to it in so far as it affects the interests of this country just so long as this country maintains in its own control the means by which it can enforce its rights.

I do not believe for a moment that the United States would have had the consideration of the world which it has had; that its policies in regard to the region of the Pacific which are dealt with in this treaty would have had the recognition of those powers that assembled in the so-called Arms Limitation Conference, if this had been a weak and helpless nation. I rather think that if we had been weak and helpless we would have occupied just about the position in that conference which the weak and helpless nations occupied. I think we would have gotten just as much consideration for the policies which we have advocated respecting conditions in the region of the Pacific and our rights and our possessions in the South Seas as China received in her dependence upon the good will and benevolence of nations defending her against the aggressions of the powers of the world.

So, Mr. President, I repeat what I said, that the agreement which has been reached in this conference, providing for the maintenance by the United States of a relative sea power sufficient in the opinion of those who have so far expressed and defined the policy of this Nation in regard to power upon the sea, is at least equally important, in the effect it will have upon the life and the interests of the people of the United States, as the agreement to respect those rights embodied in the four-power treaty; not that I deny the value of those agreements, because I do attach value to them, but that I would adjure the people of my country, in so far as any responsibility rested upon me as one Member of this body, fixing those lines which were to guide its future conduct, not to be misled by the illusion or the delusion, so that they would disband their Army, throw down their arms, and deprive themselves of the power of self-defense because some other nations had signed an agreement that they would respect their rights.

I hope, Mr. President, that when the execution of these treaties is to be provided for by the Congress of the United States the Congress will realize the truth of that principle, and that means will be provided by which the United States can live up to the terms and conditions of these several treaties, which are interrelated, and which depend to a considerable extent upon each other; that we will not simply limit ourselves in one direction in so far as our naval power is concerned, and be content because we have agreed not to exceed a certain limit, but that we will likewise regard it as an obligation at least that we owe to our own people that when we have fixed that ratio among the powers of the earth we will likewise live up to it, and that we will supplement the faith and the dependence which we have upon all the nations by providing a Navy which is at least equal to that of any other power within the limitations provided in the naval limitation treaty, and superior to that provided for in these agreements to some of the powers.

This is not a new policy with me. Some time ago, upon a resolution introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I have the honor to be a member, being designated by the committee to formulate the report upon that resolution, I wrote into that report, and submitted it to the Senate, that in view of the influence of sea power upon history, which has been so conclusively demonstrated by a great naval authority furnished by our own Navy, Admiral Mahan, that with limitations to avoid a useless race for supremacy which might have no end, the United States should be equal upon the seas to any of the other nations of the world, knowing that the destiny of nations has been controlled by sea power.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the able Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], he is in favor of the ratification of these treaties, and then he is in favor of building a Navy sufficiently strong and having an Army sufficiently large to be sure that we can protect ourselves from those who are signatories to the treaty with us. I think the Senator from Washington is entirely right in his diagnosis of the situation. Anyone who relies merely upon a political pact for security is so grossly misinformed touching the history of the world and human nature itself that it would be most unfortunate to have his doctrine prevail in national affairs.

I wish to ask those who are advocating this political pact as a pact of security—this political combination as a matter of security—to point to a single political pact that was ever observed by a nation after the exigency or conditions had changed so as to make it no longer to the interest of the nation signing to observe it. It seems harsh, in the first instance, to suggest the answer, but political treaties have been almost universally disregarded when changed conditions made it no longer to the interest or benefit of nations to regard them. It is one of the most universal things in the relation of nations. I have come definitely to the conclusion that if there is to be peace there must be acts, deeds, upon the part of nations, not mere promises. So long as nations are armed as these four nations still are, so long as imperialism still obtains as a national policy, so long as strong nations oppress the weak and exploit them, as is now being done in Haiti, Santo Domingo, Manchuria, Siberia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt, these political facts are but hypocritical coverings for continued aggressions and crime which lead ultimately to war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if I may answer the Senator's question, or at least one phase of it, I think that many instances might be found in which nations have lived up to their pacts. I do not claim they have violated all of them.

Mr. BORAH. I said political pacts—when conditions had changed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But what I fail to understand is how the very able Senator from Idaho, who is a learned historian, believing as he does in the inefficacy of the promises of nations—and I think an international promise is about as worthless as any kind we can have unless it is supplemented by something else—believing as he does that we can not depend upon mere agreements, advocates complete disarmament? If I had such utter cynicism in regard to international agreements I certainly would not be in favor, in the face of that, of complete disarmament or disarmament to the extent the Senator from Idaho says should leave only sufficient for police purposes.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho has never advocated disarming the United States alone. The Senator from Idaho has never urged that we destroy our Navy and leave the other nations of the world to build navies. I think the Senator from Washington knows that has not been my position. The Senator from Washington and I have differed as to what constitutes a modern navy. The Senator from Washington has great faith in battleships and my opinion is otherwise. I wish I had the report here—I will have it when I speak next week—of an official character showing how utterly worthless battleships have become in modern sea warfare.

That is the only instance where the Senator and I differ as to what constitutes a modern navy. I have never advocated for a moment that the United States should destroy its Navy and permit Japan and Great Britain to build as big navies as they see fit. My idea in calling them into conference was to see whether or not they would disarm proportionately.

I do not rely upon political pacts and I do not rely upon the good faith of other nations to the extent of asking our Nation to go without any defense at all. My idea is the same policy we have pursued for 150 years, and that is to remain aloof from political associations and political connections and political arrangements with other Governments and take care of ourselves as best we can as an independent, self-governing people. So far it has been very successful. Political pacts foment war, they do not augment peace. Peace is secured in a different way, by actual deeds, conduct, the doing of justice, the refraining from injustice, not promising peace and then pursuing policies which bring war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think it is extremely doubtful, although it is mere speculation, whether we could have secured such an agreement as the so-called four-power treaty between these powers unless it had been accompanied by some agreement for the limitation of naval armament. As I understand the Senator's position, it is that we should refuse to agree with Great Britain and Japan to respect their rights in their insular possessions and dominions in the region of the Pacific, and at the same time we should proceed to bring about an agreement for disarmament.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not object at all to our agreeing to respect the rights of Japan and Great Britain in the Pacific. We will do so without agreeing to it. I have no particular objection to taking Great Britain's and Japan's agreement to respect our rights. I only say that if we must depend upon the mere agreement for our security, according to all these political pacts, there is no security in it. In other words, if for any reason it should be to the interest of Japan to disrespect our rights or to aggress against our rights and as a great nation she should deem it to her welfare to do so, does the Senator from Washington really think that she would respect this political agreement? If she did do so, she would be the only nation in the world which has ever done so, under such changed conditions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am sorry I did not hear the first part of the Senator's question.

Mr. BORAH. I say, if Japan should come to the conclusion that it was to her national interest or her national welfare or according to her plans to attack the islands of the United States in the Pacific, does the Senator think that by reason of this agreement she would hesitate to do so? Would the mere promise to respect our rights control if it should seem to her interests to disregard the promise? Did she respect the rights of China which she had solemnly agreed to respect?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, that opens up a very wide and indefinite range of philosophical speculation——

Mr. BORAH. No; not philosophical.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I think it does, because it would depend entirely upon what those interests were, the extent of her interest, and, furthermore, it would lead to rather a fine analysis of what "interest" is—what it consists of.

I make this proposition to the Senator from Idaho. It is a good deal more to the interest of Japan to respect the rights of the United States in her insular possessions, which his eloquent colleagues have pointed out is the weak point in the armor of this country, because of the distance at which they lie from the shores of continental United States, that it is more to the interest of Japan to respect those rights if we have a four-power agreement in which another great sea power has agreed with Japan and the United States, under a solemn international pact, that they shall be respected. That constitutes one of the elements of the interest of that power, and so if she should be guided by her interest in determining what her interest is she will read the agreement which she has made with the other great sea powers of the world before she reaches a conclusion.

Mr. BORAH. That might be true; that is to say, they might have a conference and they might not.

These political pacts are never of any more worth than the character of the nation which is behind them. A nation which would attack another nation because it felt it was able and wanted to do so would never regard its mere promise not to attack. In other words, as I said a moment ago, I do not know of any political pact of this nature which was ever observed after a change of conditions in the nation's interest. For instance, take the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which was dedicated to peace as is the four-power pact. It was written for the purpose of preserving peace in the Far East. It specifically provided for the protection and maintenance of the integrity of Korea and China. I ask the Senator as a historic fact, although it was signed by two great nations which are now to be our partners, was it respected in a single instance? The aggressions which are now the cause of disturbance in the Far East, and which are what might be conceived as the seeds of war in the Far East, are aggressions which took place under the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which specifically provided that they would respect the rights of China and Korea.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator if the Anglo-Japanese alliance, being what it was, had been a treaty similar to this, and France and the United States had been parties to that treaty, does he think the rights of Korea would be likely to have been violated as they were?

Mr. BORAH. I do think so.

Mr. LENROOT. I think not.

Mr. BORAH. I will tell the Senator why. At the time the Anglo-Japanese alliance was made we had a treaty with Korea by which we specifically agreed that in case the independence and integrity of Korea was attacked, we would interpose our good offices for the purpose of protecting Korea. What happened? When Japan got ready to amalgamate Korea, Korea sent her representative to the Government of the United States and pleaded for a hearing before the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State refused even to hear him until it was too late in defense of the independence of his country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why was that, may I ask the Senator? And if he will allow me to answer my own question I will say simply it was another proof of that principle which I have asserted and reasserted this morning. It was because Korea was a helpless nation. If Korea had been able to defend herself and had sought the assistance of other powers, she would have gotten a hearing and recognition.

Mr. BORAH. Likely so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. So it seems to me, if I may add just a word in relation to this controversy, that the United States under similar circumstances, if she had been as weak and helpless as Korea, would have got just about as much recognition and just such treatment as Korea received.

Mr. BORAH. But my friend from Washington knows full well that at the time we made that treaty with Korea it was not made because she was a strong nation. We did not expect Korea to come to the protection of our independence nor to maintain our integrity. We made it because Korea was a helpless nation and we proposed to interpose our good offices to protect that independence. So the fact that she remained helpless did not at all excuse us from refusing to hear her, at least, when she came to plead for her independence. It was the old story of political pacts—the situation had changed, conditions were changed—we felt it was no longer to our interest to interpose our good offices, and we disregarded our solemn promise and left a helpless nation, which had trusted us, without a friend to plead her cause in the hour of her dissolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It did not excuse us, but we did it nevertheless.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what I say.

Mr. POINDEXTER. At different times we promised to help Armenia, but we have never helped her.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is supporting me in my contention. I agree with all he says. I was answering the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who takes another view of it. The Senator from Washington and I are in complete accord that these political pacts are not observed at all. Nations observe these political pacts so long as it is to their interest to do so, and nations also observe the rules of honor and the dictates of conscience without treaties so long as it is to their interest to do so.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator assumes that conditions to-day are, in so far as the aim and purpose and objects of the nations are concerned, exactly as they were 20 years ago. How does he account for the fact that in the Washington conference, instead of their expressly permitting and providing for further exploitation, they at least did justice in part and retrieved the wrong in part that has been committed upon China? Has that no significance to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. It has this significance, and that is that the Senator is mistaken in his facts. The fact is, Mr. President, that under the Anglo-Japanese alliance Japan presented her 21 demands to China. Those 21 demands, had they been accepted or been enforced, would have destroyed the independence of China. Notwithstanding the meeting of the Washington conference, the 21 demands, except as to the first and fifth groups, still stand just as they did when they were presented; in other words, group 2, group 3, and group 4 stand, and Japan even refused to discuss them or permit them to be discussed before the conference.

Now, if the Senator will refer to the 21 demands and examine groups 2, 3, and 4 he will find that Japan has her hold upon the natural resources, the material, and even the sovereignty of China, just the same as she had before the conference met.

The effect of group 2 of the 21 demands was to give Japan control over Manchuria and inner eastern Mongolia, and by reason of the fact that those demands still stand and that Japan refused to permit them even to be discussed Japan to-day has practical control over Manchuria and eastern inner Mongolia, the same as she has had for the last five or six years. Also under group 3 it will be found that Japan took practical control of the great iron mines in the very heart of China, without which China is practically robbed of one of her great resources. Did Japan consent to rectify the wrong? Did she even consent at the conference to discuss whether she should retain her hold upon the great coal wealth of China? No. She said to the conference, "I will not even permit that question to come within the jurisdiction of this conference," and Japan went home with her hold firmly established upon the great coal mines of the center of China. Did she go home with clean hands?

Under group 4 China agreed with Japan in 1915 that she would not grant any other nation any harbor or bay or island along the coast of China. Was that modified? It stands to-day just as it did in 1915, and, as a result, China to-day is an isolated nation under the dictation and control of one of our allies; no, two of our allies, for southern China is passing under the control of Great Britain.

Mr. POINDEXTER. China has pursued the policy of nonresistance, pacifism, and disarmament, and that is the natural and inevitable consequence.

Mr. BORAH. She, as Korea, has also relied upon the worthlessness of political pacts.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator must have understood that I expressly used the words "in part rectified the wrong." I think the Senator from Idaho was one who prophesied during the debate upon the Versailles treaty that Japan never would restore Shantung.

Mr. BORAH. And Japan never will, in my judgment. I will get to that now in a moment.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. How has Japan restored Shantung? One thing is an absolute certainty, she has not restored it as yet, and four years have passed since she took it. The second proposition is that she refused to permit China to redeem Shantung for five years. Why? What will take place in China as a result of the movement in Japan in the next five years it would be difficult for one to prophesy, but if Japan was inspired by good faith, if she was acting in integrity of purpose, why did she not permit China to redeem Shantung when and under such terms as China could redeem it? Then, having permitted China to redeem Shantung in five years, she provides for the payment of a certain amount of money for a railroad. For whose railroad? Not Japan's railroad, but for a railroad which belonged to China from the hour that war was declared against the German Government. Talk about redemption; it was not a case of redemption. In common honesty it was a case of restoring property and territory which had been unjustly taken. There was no need for delay or details.

But, notwithstanding the fact that it was a railroad that belonged to China, China is compelled to purchase it and to pay for it. How is she going to pay for it? Seventy-eight per cent of the great wealth of China to-day is under the domination and control of foreign powers, and we have signed a treaty which permits her to levy a tariff of 1½ per cent, or something like that, in excess of that which she had the right to levy. How may we expect China to pay for the railroad in the next five years? There is not anyone who is familiar with conditions in the Far East who supposes for a moment that China will be able to redeem Shantung under these circumstances and conditions. Then, if China is not able to redeem Shantung, do Senators not see what will happen? It is forfeited under the color of title, and Japan takes that which she has held by aggression under color of authority and under color of a treaty.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho condemns all that, and everybody who loves justice and liberty also condemns it; but in its application to the concrete questions which are before the Senate, let me ask the Senator from Idaho what he would have the United States do in a practical way to remedy that situation—by positive and affirmative action?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not deem that it is the business of the United States to go about correcting the inequalities or injustices which affect other nations. By example, by counsel, or advice, if requested, by moral leadership, we can do much, but not by joining alliances.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then, if the Senator means to say that, not being our duty, we should do nothing about it, how does that constitute an objection to an agreement in regard to the Pacific islands?

Mr. BORAH. I will tell the Senator how it constitutes an objection, so far as I am concerned. I do not want to be a political associate or ally with the nation which is now indulging in these very practices. We are giving our moral support to wrongdoing. We are becoming an ally in wrongdoing, although we may not actually do the wrong ourselves. If we are going to have an alliance, let us have justice for its foundation; let us start out by every member restoring wrongfully titled territory; let us have righteousness as its basis. That is the only hope of peace. If you will put into this treaty, I will say to my friend from Washington, a provision that these four nations shall respect from the hour of ratification the sovereignty and the rights of all other nations in the Far East, you will put the test at once as to their good faith.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thought the Senator said a moment ago that he would not place any dependence upon the "asininity" of such an agreement as that.

Mr. BORAH. I do not; but it would test the good faith of the signatory powers. Japan will not agree, and the powers will not agree, because at this very hour she is practicing her aggressions in the Far East; at this very time she is invading the territory of other nations, and we are becoming associates of the nation which is practicing those aggressions without attempting to prevent them. If A is going to commit a robbery, I consider that my joining with him in committing the robbery is an entirely different act from my standing apart and separate from him as a respectable citizen.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator mean to say that we are joining with them in committing a robbery?

Mr. BORAH. I mean to say precisely that. The wrongs now being practiced in China, in Siberia, in Korea are indefensible.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think the facts verify that statement.

Mr. BORAH. Here is what Japan is doing now: She is practicing in Siberia precisely what she practiced in Korea, and we are becoming her ally, her copartner; we are giving to her our moral prestige and our moral support and tacitly our approval, and she is carrying on those practices against another nation while the United States is practically her associate in the matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We have made no agreement with regard to that; we have made no agreement with regard to the Asiatic Continent, and I understand that we are practically free to take any action that we may choose to take as a Nation and a Government with regard to those matters.

Mr. BORAH. No; we are not free. Great Britain herself was greatly handicapped because of the Anglo-Japanese alliance when she witnessed the things which were being done by her ally. We will be in a very different position after we join this pact from the position we hold now.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. As a matter of law, is it necessary in order to become an accomplice to know all the details of a conspiracy to violate the law?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think so.

Mr. President, we are shutting our eyes to what is now going on in the Far East. The Senator from Arkansas has offered an amendment which provides that the four powers shall respect in the Far East the rights of other nations outside of the combination. If there is anything in this proposition at all, why should not the four powers agree to respect the rights of other nations as well as to respect the rights of those nations which happen to sign this treaty?

Here is China, with its great wealth; here is Siberia, with its great wealth. Those two great countries are now being assailed, "aggressed" upon, as it were, or attacked by one or two of these powers—for Japan is not alone; Great Britain is pushing her aggressions in China also—and we associate ourselves with the particular powers which are committing the aggressions. We refuse to write into the treaty an obligation upon our partners that they will respect the rights of those on the outside. What is the inference? The inference is that which China has already drawn, which Russia has already drawn, and that is that we are conniving at the things which are going on and adding our moral influence and our moral prestige to the support of those nations which are guilty of these attacks. The Senator from Washington knows quite as well as I do that if he were in a political campaign and I should associate myself with his opponent he would assume that I was interested in seeing his opponent succeed. So when we see Japan and Great Britain attacking the integrity of China and of Siberia and we associate ourselves with Japan and Great Britain the natural presumption is that we want to see them succeed in their aggressions. We are not even willing to write into this treaty that they shall respect the rights and sovereignty of the other nations. We respect the rights of each other, so we declare, but when asked to pledge ourselves as four nations to respect the rights of other nations we will not do so. What is the inference to be drawn by the other nations—continued aggressions, aggressions as they have gone on for 20 years. And that means war.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I was very greatly surprised at the statement of the Senator from Idaho that, as a result of the Washington conference, Japan was giving up nothing. I had supposed that it was conceded by everybody that, while Japan had not given up everything that she should have given up, perhaps, China did receive out of the Washington conference and the treaty entered into there the restoration in large part of that which had been taken from her, the seizure of which had been so severely condemned on the floor of the Senate while the Versailles treaty was under discussion. I think the Senator from Idaho was one of many who prophesied then that Shantung would never be returned to China and that China would not again be permitted to exercise sovereignty over the Province of Shantung.

Mr. President, I want to quote some of the paragraphs of that treaty between China and Japan.

The first paragraph reads:

Japan will, within six months from the date of the treaty, restore to China the former German leased territory of Kiaochow, and all public properties therein, without charge except for such additions and improvements as may have been made by Japan during the period of her occupation.

Of course, the Senator from Idaho may take the position that a solemn engagement of that sort to restore the sovereignty of Shantung to China within a period of six months will be violated by Japan; but I do not believe that he will be able to convince anyone in America that any such result should be presumed.

The next paragraph:

All Japanese troops are to be withdrawn as soon as possible from the line of the railway within six months at the latest, and from the leased territory not later than 30 days from the date of its transfer to China.

Is that a rectification of a wrong, or is it not?

The customhouse at Tsingtao is at once to be made an integral part of the Chinese maritime customs:

The Shantung (Tsingtao-Tsinanfu) Railway and appurtenant properties are to be transferred to China, the transfer to be completed within nine months, at the latest, from the date of coming into force of the treaty; the value of the property to be determined by a commission upon the basis of approximately 53,000,000 gold marks, already assessed against Japan by the Reparations Commission as the value of the railway property taken by Japan from Germany in 1914; the value fixed being paid by China to Japan by Chinese Government treasury notes, secured on the properties and revenues of the railway, and running for a period of 15 years, but redeemable either in whole or in part at any time after 5 years from the date of payment.

If I correctly understood the Senator from Idaho, he believed that this payment for the railways to Japan was something that was going to Japan as a demand upon China, charging them millions of dollars, which had cost Japan nothing, while the very terms of the treaty provide that China is to pay for that railroad no more than has been assessed against Japan by the Reparations Commission created under the treaty of Versailles.

Pending the complete redemption of such treasury notes—

Which, as the Senator from Idaho says, may be at the end of 5 years and not later than 15 years—the Chinese Government to employ a Japanese subject as traffic manager, and a Japanese subject as one of two joint chief accountants, under the authority and control of the Chinese managing director of the railway.

Mr. President, the only control in Shantung that Japan or a Japanese subject will be entitled to under that treaty is the selection by the Chinese authorities of a Japanese traffic manager for the railroad, and a Japanese subject as one of two accountants.

The rights in the construction of two extensions of the Shantung Railway, reserved in 1914 for German enterprise, and subsequently granted to a Japanese syndicate, are to be opened to the activities of an international financial group on terms to be arranged between China and that group;

The coal and iron mines formerly owned by the German Shantung Railway Co. are to be handed over to a company to be formed under a special charter of the Chinese Government, in which Japanese capital may participate equal with Chinese capital;

Japan relinquishes its claim to the establishment of an exclusive Japanese settlement in the leased territory, and China opens the whole of that territory to foreign trade, undertaking to respect all valid vested rights therein;

China is enabled to purchase, for incorporation in its Government salt monopoly, the salt fields now operated in the leased territory by Japanese subjects, on the understanding that it will allow the export on reasonable terms of salt to meet the shortage in Japan;

Japan relinquishes to China all claims with respect to the Tsingtao-Chefoo and Shanghai cables, except such portions as were utilized by Japan during the war for the laying of the cable from Tsingtao to Sasebo;

Japan is to transfer to China for fair compensation the wireless stations at Tsingtao and Tsinanfu;

Japan renounces all preferential rights in respect of foreign assistance in persons, capital, and material stipulated in the Kiachow convention of 1898 between China and Germany.

Mr. President, I can not understand the apparent effort to discredit everything done at the Washington conference. I can not understand why there is not full and free recognition of what everybody must concede was accomplished by the Washington conference. Japan may not have gone as far as she should have gone in securing justice to China; she may not have restored to China all that she should have restored; but for the Senator from Idaho to stand on this floor and say that Japan has done nothing is certainly beyond my comprehension, in the face of these specific provisions that are contained in the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho seems a little doubting in his faith, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to go back with me to the treaty of Portsmouth, executed under the leadership of the late President Roosevelt, between Japan and Russia, and observe the agreements which were made there as to what Japan was to do in the future, and he will find that I have justification for having some doubt as to the fulfillment of such agreements. I undertake to say that Japan never fulfilled her agreements made in the Portsmouth treaty in very important particulars. She has utterly disregarded some of the obligations. What I say is that the promises made in this treaty are contingent upon the happening of certain things, and that the condition of China is such that they never can happen, and therefore when the forfeiture takes place it will take place under the color of title and under the color of the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what condition is attached to the restoration of the sovereignty of China over Shantung?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, so far as sovereignty is concerned, there may be none at all; but what does the sovereignty amount to if you have control of the economics of the situation or of the natural resources of the country? President Wilson advised us that Japan advised him at Versailles that she was perfectly willing to return the sovereignty of China; but the sovereignty of China, with Japan controlling the natural resources, the railroads, the mines, and such things as that, the Senator will concede, would amount to nothing.

Mr. LENROOT. I will ask the Senator another question. What condition is attached to the restoration of the railway, which does control the economic situation?

Mr. BORAH. I understand that the condition is that they shall make this payment of 53,000,000 marks.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think I am.

Mr. LENROOT. The restoration is absolute, and then there is an indebtedness of approximately 53,000,000 marks for which the railroad is security.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; and if the payment is not made Japan will get the railroad.

Mr. LENROOT. But within the nine months the railroad must be returned to the complete control of China; and all that Japan has to do with the railroad after that is that a Japanese subject must be employed as traffic manager during that period, and there must be one Japanese accountant.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so. The Senator and I are simply using different terms to express the same thing. The railroad is returned conditionally. It is returned with a Japanese traffic manager and a Japanese accountant in control of it. The Senator knows what kind of a return that is. In case the 53,000,000 marks are not paid, the Senator does not contend that the railroad passes nevertheless absolutely in title to China. The situation is such and the plan is such that Japan in the end will own the railroad and dominate Shantung.

Mr. LENROOT. But this traffic manager is under the control of the Chinese Government, and not under the control of the Japanese Government.

Mr. BORAH. But suppose they fail to make the payment of the 53,000,000 marks. What happens then?

Mr. LENROOT. I suppose there would be a foreclosure.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I suppose so. A forfeiture, rather.

Mr. LENROOT. But does the Senator think that China will be unable to pay this lien of 53,000,000 marks at that time? If she is, all that has been said about the possibilities of China and her rehabilitation amounts to very little.

Mr. BORAH. As I said a few moments ago, 77 or 78 per cent of the territory of China is to-day under the control or domination of foreign powers. Her natural resources are practically controlled by foreign powers. The aggressions are continuous from the outside; and with her power to levy a tariff controlled by foreign powers, I undertake to say that China under those circumstances can not pay this indebtedness which she agrees to pay, and they did not anticipate that she could.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The policy of the foreign powers toward China will have a great deal to do with determining the question as to whether or not she can meet her obligations under this treaty.

Mr. BORAH. If you take the last 10 years of China's life, the manner in which she has been dominated by foreign powers, the manner in which she has been compelled to incur indebtedness by reason of the aggressions of foreign powers, and then look at the next 10 years, using the last 10 years as a guide for the next 10 years, you can come to but one conclusion.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. President, that Japan had no right to Shantung at all. She did not have even the color of title to Shantung. She took Shantung from China in violation of all laws of honesty and of all laws of nations, and she has held it. She took Shantung from an ally. If she was acting in good faith and wanted to give Shantung to the people who owned it and who were entitled to it, why did she not do it? She has had four years. There was no difficulty about giving back Shantung to China. If she had wanted to do so, she could have done so. Therefore I say I am perfectly justified in saying that there is an element of doubt in the matter by reason of the transactions of the past and by reason of the terms which have been imposed upon China, which I say she never can comply with.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho might give me a thousand dollars if he chose——

Mr. BORAH. I could not.

Mr. LENROOT. But if the Senator signed a note to give me a thousand dollars, I should expect him to pay the note.

Mr. BORAH. We must go a little further back than that. If the Senator comes and robs me of my automobile and exacts from me that I give him a thousand dollars in order to get my automobile back, whatever might happen in the future, all good citizens would doubt the character of the Senator from Wisconsin. That is exactly what I am saying about Japan. I doubt Japan's good faith in the matter. She took a piece of territory which did not belong to her. She took it by force. She took it in violation of all laws of honesty, and she required certain things to be done before the nation that had been robbed could get back her own property.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, again using the same illustration that the Senator from Idaho does about the automobile, the Senator from Idaho might charge me with stealing his automobile. I might claim that I had never stolen it; that it was my property, rightfully secured. There might be a dispute between us with respect to that. I might pay the Senator from Idaho a thousand dollars because he thought or believed that I had stolen his automobile; but if, in settlement of the dispute, I signed a note to pay the Senator from Idaho a thousand dollars I should expect to pay it.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I should be awfully happy if I got it.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I do not rise to advise the Senator from Idaho to keep his automobile locked, but I think it quite apparent that he should do so while he remains in the Senate. I do rise, however, to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he is contending that under these treaties the sovereignty of China over her own territory is being restored?

Mr. LENROOT. I contend that under the express terms of the China-Japan treaty within six months the sovereignty that Japan now exercises over Shantung must be restored to China.

Mr. FRANCE. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Does he believe that it is the restoration of sovereignty to a country when this doctrine of extraterritoriality still applies—the doctrine under which Japanese in China are tried, not by the courts of China, by courts constituted under Chinese authority, but by courts which are constituted under Japanese authority? Does the Senator think there is a restoration of sovereignty when that condition prevails?

Mr. LENROOT. Before I answer that question I would like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question for information. Is there any provision that there would be the exercise of that kind of jurisdiction by the Japanese Government in Shantung after the restoration of sovereignty?

Mr. FRANCE. Not after the restoration of sovereignty.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not.

Mr. FRANCE. But under the provisions of this treaty that practice will continue.

Mr. LENROOT. Why does the Senator say that practice will continue?

Mr. FRANCE. As I understand it, there is no provision in these treaties for the abolishment of that pernicious system of extraterritoriality.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President when the full and complete sovereignty over any territory is returned to a nation the doctrine of which the Senator from Maryland speaks can not be exercised in that territory.

Mr. FRANCE. That is very true; but the point is whether there is a provision in these treaties for doing away with that.

Mr. LENROOT. When it said that sovereignty is to be restored it applies to all, of course.

Mr. FRANCE. But it is in that particular that the sovereignty of China is being disregarded. The Senator from Wisconsin is a prohibitionist, I believe.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not care to discuss that question now. We have enough controversies before the Senate at present.

Mr. FRANCE. Did not the Senator from Wisconsin vote for the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. I did, and for the Volstead Act, and for the amendment to it with reference to beer.

Mr. FRANCE. So that my statement has been confirmed. Would the Senator believe that the United States had sovereignty over its territory if Englishmen, desiring to sell Scotch whiskey here, should come into the United States and sell Scotch whiskey, and when they were arrested for the violation of our laws, should be tried, not by the American courts, but by the English courts?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course not.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator very well knows that is the practice which is being carried on in China to-day.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, Mr. President, I supposed the Senator from Maryland and every other Senator who has been listening to this debate well understood that I have not for a moment claimed that Japan is getting out of China as a result of the Washington conference. The only point I am making is that she has expressly agreed to get out of Shantung.

Mr. FRANCE. Does the Senator believe she will get out of China and restore the sovereignty of China over her own territory?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course I believe it, so far as Shantung is concerned.

Mr. FRANCE. I am very happy to hear that.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, I believe it, but let us see the position some of these Senators are in when pleading for this splendid isolation, contending that the United States must have nothing to do with the affairs of other nations. They say, "Let them do as they please; it is no concern of ours." Then complaint is made, when a conference is held at the instance of the United States, because full and complete justice has not been done to a nation, although more has been done for that nation than could be done in any other way, or would ever be done if the isolation should proceed. Complaint is made because we have not done more.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. I do not want to be placed in the position in which the Senator from Wisconsin places me. I do not conceive it to be our business at all to tie up politically with these nations, either partially or completely. I am not complaining because we did not do more to get further into this situation politically. I am complaining because we got as far as we did. I do not believe in any political relationships with these powers at all. I want no political connections, no political partnerships.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator thinks we ought to be entirely indifferent to Shantung, that we should not have taken even the action that was taken, through our friendly offices in bringing about what has been brought about.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection at all to using our friendly offices whenever they can be employed and the nations interested call upon us to do so; but we are being asked, in addition to exercising our friendly offices, to ratify a treaty which would tie us up politically with these powers and with the powers which practiced the wrong. That has nothing to do with our exercising our friendly offices between two nations when we are asked to do so. We have done that all through our life as a nation. We have done it for 150 years, and we have been very successful at it; but we did not seek a partnership with them and go into political business with them.

Mr. LENROOT. Neither is this a partnership or going into political business with them. Of course, the Senator has his own construction, but he argued the treaty the other day upon the proposition which the proponents of it contend for, that it was an agreement to respect the rights of the other parties, to confer with any of the other three, and in case of an aggression, by any outside party, to communicate frankly and freely with each other with a view to arriving at an understanding. That is all there is to this treaty. Of course, if the Senator thinks that there is in the treaty an obligation to use force, he would be justified in opposing it, and if I thought so, I would be in accord with him; but if I have understood the Senator's position, not only in this debate, but in the debate during the consideration of the Versailles treaty, he would have the United States isolated, enter into no understandings by way of agreement with any other nation with reference to keeping the peace and settling disputes amicably, because he thinks it would be entering into a political partnership.

The trouble with my good friend is, I think, that he is living 20 years ago. He goes back to all the treaties in the past, and shows that they have not been effectual in keeping the peace. He referred to the Portsmouth treaty between Russia and Japan. Mr. President, something has happened since those days. Since that time we have had the greatest war known to history. World opinion is centered against war as it never has been before, and while the Senator is pessimistic, and thinks that no agreement with any nation can be relied upon to any degree, that there is no value in friendly understandings, I am not one who believes that the world has not moved forward after going through the World War, and I refuse to believe that friendly understandings, however ineffectual they have been in the past, will not aid in preventing war in the future. The Senator may.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho does not take so pessimistic a view of this situation as the Senator from Wisconsin would have the listeners believe. I do think there is everything in friendly relations. I want to be friendly with all nations alike. I do not want to tie up in a partnership with any three or four nations and thereby incur the displeasure of other nations. I do not want any political connections with any nation. So far as business affairs and commercial affairs are concerned, they are things which we have had agreements about for the 150 years which we have existed as a nation; but I go back to the old doctrine which we have abided by for 150 years and pin my faith to it. That is the difference between the Senator from Wisconsin and myself. The Senator from Wisconsin seems to think that there has been a change in the situation. What is the change in the Far East?

Mr. LENROOT. I was not speaking of the Far East; I was speaking of world opinion, which will no longer tolerate the exploitation of one people by another without protest and without trying to stop it, without bringing world opinion against such practice; and that did not exist in the past.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is being done in Syria to-day by one of our allies? The most complete exploitation of a subject people, who were taken into the confidence of the Allies during the war and promised their independence. What is going on in Mesopotamia? The exploitation of the oil interests of Mesopotamia and the exploitation of the natural resources of Mesopotamia, a subject people, taken under our control during the war, is going on as completely as it ever went on against any nation in the history of the world.

Is there any difference in the situation in the Near East or in the Far East from that which existed 20 years ago? Is not Japan exploiting Siberia? Is she not driving out Russians, burning their homes, depopulating the country, so far as the people are concerned—not 20 years ago, not 20 days ago, but now? Is not the same thing going on in Manchuria? Who denies it?

The Senator asks me to have faith. Whenever the nations support their faith by acts, by works, then I will pin my faith to their conduct; but permit me to call attention to the fact that when these four nations met here there was not another nation upon the face of the earth to challenge them from a military standpoint. Germany was disorganized and demoralized. Russia was on the verge of starvation. Austria was totally disabled also. There was no nation to challenge the military supremacy of these four nations, or any one of them. Yet the four nations here assembled would not agree to discharge a single soldier, or reduce the size of their armies a single battalion, or cut down their fighting forces in the least, notwithstanding the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin says that the world has entirely changed. To-day these four great nations of the earth, whose supremacy or power there is no one to dispute, are more thoroughly armed than any four nations were ever armed in the history of the world. They have powerful navies, they have vast armies. They are armed upon a stupendous scale, notwithstanding the naval treaty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just in the interest of accuracy, is not the Senator willing to concede that Great Britain has reduced her army?

Mr. BORAH. I said she had not as a result of the conference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has she not done it since the conference?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know about that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the Senator has not seen the official reports from London.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps she has.

Mr. WADSWORTH. She has.

Mr. BORAH. I am speaking of what these four nations did at the conference. The Senator knows that they refused there to disarm by the discharge of a single soldier.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator can hardly say that was what happened at the conference. One of the nations declined to consider that matter with the others, so the subject was dropped. I do not think the Senator can say that each and every nation there specifically, on its own initiative, declared that it would not reduce its army.

Mr. BORAH. I said that these four nations meeting in conference refused to disarm on land in the slightest, and they did. They refused even to take up the subject. They did not deal with it at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That does not tell the whole story.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps we have disarmed. We have reduced our Army, and we are going to reduce it some more, but for other reasons than I am now considering.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator will find that, without any doubt, the others are reducing.

Mr. BORAH. France is not reducing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so. I received my reports very lately, and I am satisfied I am accurate in that statement. I know there has been some shifting of scene, but I do not believe any real disarmament.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will be glad to hear the Senator's reports when he presents them.

Mr. BORAH. We will get to that when we come to consider the military appropriation bill. The Senator must agree with me that so far as the conference was concerned there was nothing done in regard to land disarmament.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is perfectly true——

Mr. BORAH. That is what I was discussing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As far as the conference was concerned; but the Senator's first intimation was far more sweeping than that. His first intimation very clearly was that every one of these nations refused to discharge a single soldier. They have been discharging their soldiers.

Mr. BORAH. They did not do it by reason of the conference, or by reason of any agreement reached at the conference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It makes no difference why they did it; they have done it.

Mr. BORAH. It does not make any difference to the Senator, perhaps. I was discussing a particular proposition. Four great nations met here for the purpose of reaching some agreement as to disarmament. There was no other nation to challenge their supremacy from a military standpoint, but the conference could not come to an agreement to disarm by land even in the slightest degree. Whatever the nations might do individually by reason of their distance from other nations, by reason of isolation, or on account of ocean protection, or anything of that kind, would be a different proposition; but so far as reducing their armament on land was concerned, they took no steps toward disarmament by land at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, while the Senator from New York desires to speak in the interest of accuracy, I think it will be an addition to the record to state that whatever reduction has occurred in Great Britain has been far less than was recommended by the commission which was appointed to make recommendations to effectuate economies in the army, the navy, and the civil administration.

Recently, when the army was being discussed before Parliament, it was confessed that they could not make the reductions in the army which had been recommended months ago in virtue of the commission which had been appointed; so that instead of reducing to what was recommended before the conference they have kept the army at a higher level than was recommended by the commission, which made a very full investigation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is not the net result a decrease?

Mr. KING. I am not sure whether there is a decrease in the net result.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator know there is a net decrease in the official report of the budget to the House of Commons?

Mr. KING. In the aggregate for the coming year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what I said.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will keep in mind recent revelations he will find that with the possible recrudescence of outbreaks in India and the unsettled condition in Ireland, they are holding in abeyance some of those recommendations.

Mr. GLASS. May it not be said that if decreased at all it was not in the interest of peace, but in the interest of economy? It did not reflect a less warlike spirit in Great Britain than otherwise.

Mr. BORAH. Of course they have elections in Great Britain the same as they do in the United States, and they have to consider these things, and undoubtedly they do consider them. But that was not in my mind at all. I think the Senator will find, as I found in reading the report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning upon that subject, that the decrease has been very slight indeed in England. I am satisfied there has been no real disarmament in France. I am quite certain there has been none in Japan. There may be some slight decrease in England on account of economy, though I do not know. However, taking the group as a group meeting there in conference, they did not deal with the subject and refused to make any regulations in regard to it upon which the conference was willing to act. I think that is correct. As I said, the Senator may be correct about the individual nation. We have reduced some ourselves, but very slowly.

Now, Mr. President, I believe I shall not venture upon any further discussion of this matter to-day, but I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that some time during the week I propose to discuss more fully what the conference did in the way of straightening out China, and also what it did in the way of dealing with these matters which foment war in the Far East. There was no war in the islands. There was no disturbances in the islands. The disturbance was on the mainland. There is where the disturbance is now. If the disturbance on the mainland results in war, it will soon spread to the islands. So as I view it very little was done and much promised.

I do not criticize the American delegates for not doing more. I am satisfied the American delegates would have been glad to have settled all these questions. I am satisfied the American delegates would have been glad to see complete disarmament—that is to say, general disarmament by land. But we are called into a group, and we are asked to sign a treaty with four powers. I am dealing with our friends, our neighbors, or associates, our allies, and I am saying that as a group, as an alliance, they have not dealt with those subjects, and it was not the fault of the American delegates.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho is even more pessimistic than I had expressed myself as believing that he was. I had supposed that even the Senator from Idaho believed that some progress had been made in world thought toward peace growing out of the late war, but evidently the Senator from Idaho thinks nothing has been accomplished with reference to the thought of the world along that line, that the nations of the world, other than the United States, are just as militaristic as they ever have been in the past.

Why, Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Idaho that if he is correct in his view of the aims and ambitions of the other three powers to the treaty, and if his views should obtain that the United States should keep hands off, remain isolated from the rest of the world, take no interest in the peace of the world, and admitting what he said was true, that those four powers can by their force control the world to-day, why do not England, France, and Japan carve up the rest of the world? It would have been done once in history. If any group of powers had the power that these four nations had, there would not have been anything left on the face of the earth that would not have been under the direct sovereignty of one of those four nations.

Mr. BORAH. When we consider the secret treaties which were made in 1915 and 1916, how much was left of the world that was not carved up? China was dismembered and the territories of the Far East were practically distributed. What part of the world was not carved up by the secret treaties?

Mr. LENROOT. I am speaking of conditions since the World War being governed by world opinion. With respect to those secret treaties that obtained, the Senator knows, if there had been no change in world thought, that the treaties that had never been carried out in so far as direct sovereignty is concerned would have been carried out. It was because the thought of the world has changed, growing out of the tremendous losses in the war, that a different view is being taken to-day. They are compelled to take a different view. That is revealed in the Washington conference. If there had been no change in the world thought, instead of a part of China being restored to her, a conference of these four powers would have carved up China among them, the sovereignty of China would have gone, and China would have gone down into history as a nation that was but is no more.

That is the difference, Mr. President. When the Senator says there has been no change in world opinion, that our position of isolation should continue in the future as it did in the past, that we should take no interest even in using our influence in the way of treaties such as this to secure peace in the world, I say to him that the answer is found in the 50,000 American boys who fell upon the fields of France, in the 200,000 American boys who are disabled to-day, and in the $26,000,000,000 of indebtedness that exists to-day. That is the answer to the splendid isolation for which the Senator from Idaho contends.

Mr. BORAH. The United States was drawn into the situation in Europe by reason of the very condition of affairs which the Senator from Wisconsin is seeking to create in the Far East. I have no doubt at all if it had not been for the antagonistic alliances existing in Europe that there would have been no World War. We were drawn into it by reason of that condition of affairs. The Senator seems to think that the creation of this alliance or grouping will not result in the creation of another group. There is where we differ. I think it will result in just that thing. Inevitably it will result in that if we judge the future by the past. By building up this same old bloody system of alliances the same old grouping of nations we are preparing the world for more world wars, for the sacrifice of more boys, for more misery. Why try again the old system, whose history is written in blood?

The 400,000,000 Chinamen who are upon the outside, the 180,000,000 Russians who are on the outside, and the other people who may have or want to have an interest in the Pacific who are on the outside will naturally group themselves together and we will have precisely the condition of affairs which took our boys to Europe and which left a large number of them there and sent a large number of them home disabled. In my opinion, instead of proceeding along the right line we are simply adopting the old European system and going into it and transferring it from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator will admit, or does he not believe that at least until that other group is formed peace will be maintained by the powers within the group?

Mr. BORAH. Possibly that may be true, but if so, it would be so, anyway.

Mr. LENROOT. Ah, it would be, anyhow?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator evidently gives no weight to the many, many speeches that have been made by his coleader upon the other side, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], concerning the wickedness of Japan, and how we should fortify Guam and how we should fortify the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho is trying to take care of himself, not the rest of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes, that is true; only the Senator will admit that whenever a naval appropriation bill comes before the Congress there is immediately held up the menace of war with Japan. He has been one of the strongest in denouncing those scares. But two nations in a race for armament may so create an enmity between themselves, through suspicion, that it leads to war. The Senator will admit that, and the Senator must, therefore, it seems to me, admit that if we were to go on with constant misunderstandings between Japan and the United States, if Senators are to repeat on the floor of the Senate the attacks upon Japan that have been made frequently in the past, that it may, although there be no cause for it in the first instance, lead both countries to believe that each is a menace to the other and that each has designs upon the other that may lead to war.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator complains that these intimations are thrown out here upon the floor. That is what started the debate this afternoon. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] said that he was not willing to trust to this political pact for peace, that he was in favor of building a navy which was equal to any navy in the world, and to take care of the United States from the standpoint of naval force. He could not have had in consideration Germany. He could not have had in consideration Russia. It is not likely that he had in consideration Great Britain. It is not likely that he had in consideration France. I do not know what nation he did have in consideration.

Mr. LENROOT. That was preceded by the statement of some Senator that, in his opinion, no promise that Japan might make was worth the paper upon which it was written. That is what started the Japan controversy in the debate to-day.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know who started that part of it. I only know that the able Senator from Washington was very clear in his statement that he did not propose to rely upon this agreement, but that he proposed to rely upon a navy.

Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin, just as a matter of prophecy, that inside of a few years we will hear advocated upon the floor of the Senate the increasing of our Army and the increasing of our Navy, the building up of our Army and the building up of our Navy, for the very reason of the obligation which is imposed upon us by the four-power treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. That might be so if the argument of the Senator from Idaho and his associates shall prevail in this country that a solemn promise is of no value.

Mr. BORAH. It will be so if the solemn promise is of any value or not.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is of value, the Senator has admitted that until a new group is formed peace is assured.

Mr. BORAH. I said as between these powers; it might be so—not as to other powers.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. But it will be found inside of the next few years, in my opinion—in fact, the debate here was started to-day upon that point—that our obligation under this treaty and our relationship to the outside world, not those who are in the treaty, impose upon the United States such an obligation that we must have an increased Army and an increased Navy. Instead of bringing soldiers home from these islands, we will be asked to send more over there. Instead of decreasing our Navy, we will be asked to increase it inside of two years.

Mr. LENROOT. When that time comes, I think, the Senator and I will be in agreement.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; we will stand together, and the Senator from Wisconsin will confess then that his political pact is not worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Senator will not. The Senator will rely upon this pact as doing something at least to prevent war. The Senator from Idaho will not, but nevertheless he will take the same position with reference to the Army and the Navy as if he believed it was of some value.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, when the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was urging the Senate to ratify the treaty I took several notes of statements made by him because they astonished me very much, and I expected to comment upon them as soon as I could obtain the floor.

One of those notes reads as follows:

If the treaty fails, the outlook is dark indeed.

Another one reads:

Are we to look always to war?

Another one reads:

Clouds of war.

Another reads:

Let us not blight this new hope.

Another reads:

Let us not break the heart of the world.

I was again surprised this morning, Mr. President, when the Senator from Massachusetts disclaimed having had in his mind any idea of saying that we were in danger of war with the parties to the Anglo-Japanese alliance. I will read what the Senator said as it appears in the RECORD of March 8 last, and I will submit to the judgment of the Senate whether I misconstrued his words:

It is sufficient to say that in my judgment the Anglo-Japanese alliance was the most dangerous element in our relations with the Far East and with the Pacific.

That is exactly what I attributed to the Senator. I addressed my speech to that. The Senator heard the speech or a part of it, as much as he could stand, and he should have corrected me then, if I was misrepresenting what he had said.

The sands are shifting a good deal, Mr. President. When Senators make statements here which do not go down well with the country, when they are taken up on this side of the Chamber, such Senators are a little bit inclined to do what the sands do—shift. The Senator proceeded:

The Anglo-Japanese alliance caused a growing feeling of suspicion not only in the United States but in Canada. On the other side it tended to give a background to Japan which encouraged the war spirit and large preparations, both by land and sea, for future conflict.

With whom?

It immobilized England and prevented the exercise of her influence in the East for the cause of peace, and peace is distinctly in her interest in that great region. That menace to peace is removed by the four-power treaty.

In what stronger language, in what plainer language, could the Senator from Massachusetts have assured the Senate that we were in danger of war then from the Anglo-Japanese pact?

Where? In the East? After having referred to the World War, the Senator from Massachusetts proceeded. I quote again:

The misery and horrors of the Great War must never come again.

Come to whom? Come to us. By way of what? The Anglo-Japanese alliance. His words can not be construed in any other way, when they are taken together. He proceeded:

If we fail, the outlook for the future is dark, indeed.

Whose outlook, if not ours? For whom are we on duty here in this Chamber if not for this country?

If we can not do this, then no one can, and the clouds of war will again settle heavily over the future of civilization.

Exactly as I quoted—the clouds of war will hang over our civilization as well as that of other countries.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as a general rule, I do not ask not to be interrupted—in fact, I rather welcome interruptions in connection with matters which are up for discussion—but to-day I desire to discuss a couple of matters in my own way. I do not expect to convince any of the Senators against their will, and so I shall ask to proceed without interruption.

Mr. KING. Would the Senator from Washington like to have a quorum present?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, indeed. I expect to occupy the floor for just about an hour. I give that information to the Senators so that they may govern their actions accordingly.

Mr. HARRISON. Did I understand the Senator from Washington to say that he did not want any interruption during his speech?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator did, for that was the understanding I tried to give him.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, evidently the Senator is going to speak on the alleged accomplishments of the Republican administration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no doubt the Senator from Mississippi can surmise pretty well what I am going to do.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is evident that the Senator from Washington did not expect he would be interrupted on his side of the Chamber, because there is not anybody over there to interrupt him.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And, of course, I did not expect interruptions from the other side of the Chamber before I got started.

Mr. President, the pending treaty is so clear that any attempt to make it plainer is apt to obscure its meaning. The preamble states that it is made by the four powers "with a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean." There is no agreement, no covenant, no obligation in this. It is a simple, plain statement of the object to be attained through the agreement that follows.

What is that agreement? In article 1 the parties agree "as between themselves to respect their rights relating to the insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean." What is there uncertain about this? It seems to me to be so plain that the wayfaring man can not help but understand it. It promises nothing that a self-respecting nation will not do without any express agreement, and yet there is no more perfect way to preserve peace among nations as well as among men, than to agree to respect and then to respect each other's rights. If any strife arises between any of the parties involving any of these rights, what is to be done? Are the contending parties to go to war? No. It is agreed that all parties are to be invited "to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment" if it can not be "satisfactorily settled by diplomacy." Can anyone have any doubt of the meaning of this? Here is no "entangling alliance." Here is no provision to use force. It simply calls for free, face to face conferences, where honest differences may be settled.

Article 2 provides a way to deal with the situation when "the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power." What is to be done then? No conference is required, but the parties "shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken jointly or separately to meet the exigencies of the particular situation." This is all. There is no obligation or agreement except to "communicate with one another fully and frankly." No one can find any force, any entangling or offensive or defensive alliance in this article.

This entire agreement simply embodies in written words the obligation that rests upon all nations to respect the rights of others and points out the honest and fair way to deal with any differences over such rights. The great thing about this agreement is not what is in it, but the great moral force behind it. The spirit behind and in this agreement was expressed with wonderful eloquence by Viscount d'Alte, when he said:

I can add but little to all that my distinguished colleagues who sit around this table have so ably said to-day; but I may perhaps be forgiven if I endeavor to draw attention to a notable feature of the agreement which has to-day been the object of our thoughts. Even more than the words in which it is written, it is the spirit in which this memorable agreement was conceived that will fill the whole civilized world with high hopes for the future. It would, of course, be easy to evade any of the clauses of the treaty of which I am speaking; it would even seem as if the men who have drafted it have tried to signify that they did not place their main reliance and the achievement of their aims in a long series of carefully worded clauses. Only four powers, who repose the most implicit trust in the honor and integrity of each other, could sign a treaty such as this. And it is this fact that gives the agreement its tremendous binding power. The confidence so fully given no nation would dare to betray.

Instead of arousing jealousy and fear on the part of other nations this agreement points the way through the centuries to come to avoid strife and bring peace throughout the world.

If there were any doubt as to the meaning and purpose of this agreement—and in my mind there is none—what took place upon its presentation at the conference ought to dispel such doubt and make plain the purpose. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] presented it to the conference in an address that in lofty sentiment, clear statement, broad vision, poetic fancy, genuine eloquence, and wide learning has seldom been equaled. There in the presence of the representatives of all the powers he told them what this agreement is and what it means. After stating the terms of the treaty he said:

Each signer is bound to respect the rights of the others and before taking action in any controversy to consult with them. There is no provision for the use of force to carry out any of the terms of the agreement, and no military or naval sanction lurks anywhere in the background or under cover of these plain and direct clauses. * * * This is an attempt to remove causes of war over a great area of the globe's surface by reliance upon the good faith and honest intentions of the nations which sign the treaty, solving all differences through the processes of diplomacy and joint consideration and conciliation. * * * We make the experiment here in this treaty of trying to assure peace in that immense region by trusting the preservation of its tranquility to the good faith of the nations responsible for it. * * * Our surest appeal in order to prevent wars in the future must be to the hearts, the sympathies, the reason, and the higher impulses of mankind. Such an appeal we make to-day by this agreement among four great nations. We rely upon their good faith to carry out the terms of this instrument, knowing that by so doing they will prevent war should controversies ever arise among them. If this spirit prevails and rules we can have no better support than the faith of nations. For one, I devoutly believe the spirit of the world is such that we can trust to the good faith and the high purposes which the treaty I have laid before you embodies and enshrines. * * * If we enter upon this agreement, which rests only upon the will and honor of those who sign it, we at least make the great experiment and appeal to the men and women of the nations to help us sustain it in spirit and in truth.

If any reservation making clear the meaning and purpose of this treaty were necessary, this frank and definite statement by the Senator from Massachusetts is the best reservation that can be framed. It was uttered in the presence of the delegates of all the parties to the treaty. There was no dissent. These statements must be taken as a part of the treaty, and the construction given must be accepted by all. Not only was there no dissent but there was an express acceptance. Mr. Viviani, representing France, said:

Gentlemen, in the name of the Government of the French Republic, which to-day has conferred on me its authority and which speaks through my voice, I assent, without reticence and without reservation, to everything implied in the agreement just read by Mr. LODGE, who has followed it up with an analysis at once so simple and so powerful. * * * He has pointed out that when four great powers are determined that peace shall prevail in a given part of the world the concert of these powers, without provision for naval or military action, is all that is needed to assure the preservation, the guaranty, and the protection of that peace.

Mr. Balfour said:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the conference, you have heard an exposition by Senator LODGE of the contents of this treaty, admirable in its clarity, perfect in its literary form, and you have just heard the way in which this treaty strikes a great Frenchman in its world relations. * * * So far as I am concerned, I would most gladly leave the matter in their hands, for I have nothing to add to what they have said upon the general aspects of the treaty.

Prince Tokugawa, speaking for Japan, said:

The terms of the important pact assuring mutual security and friendship have just been made known. It is needless for me to say that all Japan will approve the consummation of this work.

These statements from the representatives of the powers that signed the treaty leave no room for doubt or question as to the meaning and purpose of this treaty.

China, though not a party to the treaty, is vitally interested in it and the other treaties made. Mr. Sze said:

The Chinese delegation notes with gratification the intention of the powers agreeing to the draft treaty reported this morning to preserve general peace and to adjust by peaceful means all matters of controversy that may arise between them with reference to their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific.

There is no commitment to armed force or force of any kind. There is no alliance of offense or defense. There is no obligation to join in any defense in this treaty. It is simply the solemn expression of the confidence that these four great powers have in the honor, integrity, and good faith of each other, and their conviction that upon these great moral qualities rests the peace of the world rather than upon military or naval forces.

The Brandegee reservation adds nothing to the treaty, and I hope takes nothing from it. I do not like it. I think it can only dim the luster of the Senate in the eyes of the world. If I can be sure that the treaty can be ratified without it, I will gladly vote against it. If it seems to be necessary to secure ratification, I will vote for it.

Yes, Mr. President; I want to see this treaty ratified. I wish it could be done without a dissenting vote. I know that our country needs no written promise to make it respect the rights of other nations, but I am glad to have it put this obligation in solemn and enduring form as an example to others. It requires no plighted word to lead it to consult over differences, but it rejoices in leading the way for this kind of settlement of questions that threaten the peace of the world.

RECORD OF REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Mr. President, the Republican Party has been in power a year. Does the record justify the confidence placed in it by the people at the last election? The Democrats say it is a failure and that the people are anxious to repudiate it. The Republicans claim it to be a success and that the people approve. It is easy to denounce and it is easy to boast. The people will judge by the record, which they will know pretty well, and they can be depended upon to render a just verdict.

Every ill that affects the people will be laid at the door of the Republicans by the Democrats. That is politics in this country. There is too much of it, but it can not be helped. We can with confidence appeal to the justice and good sense of our people to give us credit for what we have done and take into account the conditions we have had to meet. We have not done all we should have done; I admit that. We have made mistakes; but, taking it all in all, we have a record of actual accomplishment that we can point to with confidence and, to use a Democratic phrase, "with pride."

On the 4th of last March the Republican Party took charge of every branch of the Government. For a little over two years after the armistice the administration had been drifting in the midst of war problems. These problems were hard enough when the war ended, but they got worse and worse as time passed and neglect continued.

While the war was on everything else was neglected. Peaceful pursuits were forsaken and all labor and business effort was turned to war. War demands brought prices of everything to an abnormal level. Everybody, rich and poor, got upon an entirely different plane of living from that theretofore enjoyed. When the war ended war activities ceased. The end came so suddenly that the people were dazed. They did not know what to do. Everything seemed to be out of joint. Congress looked to the President for guidance and leadership, but it got neither; and so it was that when the Republican Party took charge it found the problems of the war made much more difficult by two years of peace drifting.

It is much easier to carry on a war than it is to solve the problems growing out of it. It is not difficult to carry on war. Partisanship is laid aside; differences of opinion are waived; mind, heart, and soul go together to do one certain thing—whip the enemy. Men and money are needed. The strong hand of the Government reaches out and takes the boy from the home and puts him on the battle front, whether he will or no. The same strong hand takes in taxes the money required to buy supplies of every kind. We can not solve the problems of peace in that way. Reason, experience, and judgment must guide instead of power and force. Partisanship flames up fiercely; opinions are held with great tenacity; conflicting interests of section, community, and individual demand their rights, and obstructions are placed in the way of the majority everywhere and at all times. This is being done now.

I know that the Republicans are being blamed for the delays in passing legislation. Much of this delay is caused directly by the Democrats, as the record will show. They act as if they think they owe nothing to the country now, but all to their party. Party advantage is sought at all times and upon every question. I may be wrong, but in my judgment this is not right. We really need an intense patriotism more now in solving the problems of peace than we did to solve the problems of war. In war the unpatriotic man can be forced to serve his country. In peace, this can not be done except through public opinion.

The Republican Party is in control, and is therefore primarily responsible for what is done and for what is not done. Our Democratic friends seem to think this fact relieves them from all responsibility. They give us no help in solving these problems. A very prominent Democratic Senator said a few days ago, referring to these problems, "Why should we worry? These are nuts for you to crack, and not for us"; and so they oppose, delay, obstruct, hinder, and criticize. I submit that such action does not and will not commend them to the people. They can not escape their duty as the people's representatives. The problems we face are their problems, the same as they are ours. The people will not overlook these things when studying the record we have made and in weighing the tactics of our Democratic friends.

The burdens the people bear come from the war and from Democratic incompetency, and not from us. If they are heavy, we can not help it. If any have been lightened, we have done it. We are criticized because we have not reduced appropriations or lowered taxes. We are not responsible for either. The $29,000,000,000 we spent during the war is the debt of to-day. We must meet it in some way. We can not refuse appropriations without repudiation. No matter how unwise the obligation, no matter how wasteful the expenditure, we must fulfill our agreements and pay our debts. War materials that cost us billions must be paid for in full, even if we must sell what is left for a song.

The war has been fought and now we must pay for it. Taxes must be taken now from the pockets of the people to pay for the cost and waste of war, and the needed appropriations must be made. While the war was on we borrowed money to pay the expenses. These loans and the interest must be paid, and it is utterly impossible to reduce appropriations or reduce taxes to the prewar or even the war level.

It is said that the people are impatient with Congress. It may be so; but who encourages that impatience? The Democrats themselves, who should be the last ones to complain. We must build up what they tore down. We must reorganize what they disorganized. We must collect what they spent. We must pay what they owed. Under Democratic leadership things done in hours can not now be cared for safely in months. For instance, the Senate, with two hours' debate, voted $640,000,000. This money, according to a Democratic committee, was wasted, but the people must pay it. We sold for $120,000—and were surprised to get that much—what cost us $80,000,000. We must raise these millions now in taxes. Can we say in a few hours or a few days how that shall be done? Is it not wisdom, is it not our duty, to be careful and take time to weigh well what we do, so as to cause as little injury as possible, and make a heavy burden as light as we can? We would be justly censured if we took less care with the many difficult questions we face. Hasty action would make more waste and increase our taxes and our burdens.

Let us see what we have done. Let us see what the record shows.

For many years good men and women have done much to promote world peace. They sought to have an organization among the nations of the world to secure and enforce it. A strong sentiment had been created and high hopes were held out that world peace would be insured. When the World War came to a close President Wilson placed himself at the head of this movement and sought by solemn treaty to do this great thing. His effort ended in failure—why, I will not say—but as the years go by the greatness of his aims and sacrifices will hide the causes for his failure. He left us in a humiliating position. Without seeking a cause it is enough to say that on the 4th of March, 1921, the United States was without a friend in the world. No people trusted us; no nation honored or respected us. That is all changed. We lead the nations of the world. They honor, respect, and trust us, and seek our advice and counsel. This is due to the tactful, wise, statesmanlike, and patriotic conduct of the administration, and is an achievement deserving of the highest commendation.

A new but simple policy has been started that means much for the peace of the world. Nations have been brought together about the conference table to talk and reason over their differences and devise ways and means to promote mutual understandings and remove the causes of war. Its wisdom is now clear. That it will be a permanent practice among nations is certain. This very great thing has been brought about by this administration, and it will loom larger as the years go by. If nothing else were done, this alone justifies last election's verdict.

The calling of the arms conference met a glad response from every heart in the land that hopes for peace. The selection of the delegates to represent this country evidenced a rare judgment, while the confidence placed in and the position given to his Secretary of State by the President showed a statesmanship of the highest order and a manliness that must profoundly impress every high-minded man. That conference is epochal in the history of the world. The success it attained was beyond the dreams of the most hopeful. Its work will loom larger with the passing of time. It will lighten the burdens of humanity through the centuries, and save generations yet unborn from the horrors of war. What man or woman can now regret a vote cast for Warren G. Harding?

While the executive branch of the administration has been doing these great things, the legislative branch has not been idle; and when its record is studied in the light of the facts and conditions that it had to face, and the problems it had to grapple with, the people will conclude that it has done well, too.

Congress was called in special session to revise the taxes and the tariff. It has not yet been able to complete both. Maybe it should have done so, but the Democratic minority is not blameless. They consumed a great deal of time in what many would term useless talk, but I would not be so harsh. They acted wholly within their rights. We do not need to rely on this. The problem to be met fully justifies the time taken to work it out. The expenses of the Government to be met by taxation could not be reduced except by the most rigid economy. Three or four billions must be raised by internal taxes to meet the expenses imposed upon the people during the war and under a Democratic administration. About all we could do was to revise the law, and levy the taxes more justly, and so as to disturb business and industry the very least.

The tax laws we have had to revise were passed in the hurry and stress of war. Taxes were levied upon business that was prospering, and that was sure to prosper while the war lasted. Revision was a stupendous problem. From three to four billions of tax must be taken from business in time of peace to meet the demands of the war that had just closed. It was most patriotic to try to take this money in such a way as to do as little harm to business as possible, and at the same time take it from those best able to pay. Every individual, every business, and every section of the country would be affected. Hearings were asked by many. It would not have been right to disregard these requests. It was not safe to do so. These hearings took months. A bill was finally passed. It is now the law. It did not wholly meet the wishes of anyone. No tax bill raising three or four billions can be prepared by anybody that will wholly satisfy anyone. This law has many injustices in it, but they are the injustices of the Democratic law. It places no more burdens upon the people, but it does relieve them of many. We not only revised the tax laws more equitably but we made a great reduction in the taxes.

Under this law, even with the great demands upon the Government, the tax burden on the people will be over $800,000,000 less next year than this. That is, we have relieved the people of the country from paying over $800,000,000 taxes annually that they would have had to pay under the Democratic law. Confronted with the necessity of raising almost as much tax as during the war, this, it seems to me, was a great thing to do. The wonder is not that we did not get a better bill, but that we got one so good. We are seeking, through economy and efficient service, to reduce the demands of the Government so it can be further reduced and more equitably adjusted.

"But," they say, "you have not yet passed the tariff bill." True. Tariff bills are not framed in a day. They are not passed overnight. It took from 7 to 10 months to pass tariff acts under normal peace conditions. Why should there be so much impatience if it takes us a year to pass these two great tax and tariff measures? Not alone uncertain, unsettled, and disturbed conditions at home, but disturbed conditions of exchange and business abroad, make the task almost a superhuman one. Extreme care must be taken not to injure business. The great need is to foster and encourage it. Labor, agriculture, industry, transportation, and business of all kinds must be guarded from every angle, and it is far better to move slowly but surely than to move swiftly and hurtfully. We shall pass this tariff act after due consideration of all the varied interests of this vast country. We will not follow the Democratic theory in framing our bill. American labor, capital, and enterprise will again have the aid of the Republican policy of protection and we will surmount the hard conditions that now seem so dangerous. Republican capacity and statesmanship will again vindicate itself and justify the people's verdict and command approval when they are called upon again to express themselves.

We passed a resolution declaring a state of peace between this country and Germany. We went further and did what our Democratic friends said we could not do; we negotiated and had ratified a treaty of peace with Germany, saving all our rights without entangling ourselves in the troubles of Europe or impairing our sovereignty in the slightest degree.

The Budget law was passed and has been put in operation so well that many millions of dollars have already been saved to the people of the country in the running of the Government, and when it is fully worked out it will be a great instrument of economy.

We reduced the Regular Army to a hundred and fifty thousand men and thereby reduced the military expenses of the Government hundreds of millions of dollars. This should be all the more appealing to the people when they recall that a Democratic President vetoed a bill passed by a Republican Congress reducing the Army to 175,000 men, and that his Secretary of War recommended a Regular Army of over 500,000 men, which would have burdened us with more than $500,000,000 yearly.

We passed a law greatly restricting immigration, not because of any antagonism to the peoples of other countries who have given so much of their blood to make this country and people what they are, but in defense of the prosperity and stability that every people owes to itself to defend.

Special consideration has been given to the American farmer, not because of any enmity to any other industry but because upon the prosperity of the farmer depends in a great degree the prosperity of every other line of endeavor. Agriculture felt the first reaction from the abnormal war conditions. Its products dropped almost overnight to prewar prices and below them while all the things the farmer had to buy remained high. The emergency tariff was passed to aid him. No one, of course, will ever know how much worse off he would have been if we had not taken this action. No one can prove that it was of any benefit, but I am sure it helped him greatly. Another act for his relief was the revival of and the granting of permission to the War Finance Corporation to issue a billion dollars of securities to extend the sale and export of agricultural products. The so-called packers law was passed. It provides for the regulation of commerce in live stock and other farm products and makes it possible for the Secretary of Agriculture to prevent abuses long complained of by farm producers. A law has been passed prohibiting gambling in grain futures and seeking to prevent speculations deemed injurious to both producer and consumer. We provided $25,000,000 additional for the Federal Farm Loan Board, enabling it to function again in behalf of the farm producers. We have passed a law making legal farmers' organizations and marketing associations, a measure long sought and deemed of the utmost importance to the farmers. If these measures aid the farmers to prosper, they will be fully justified and they will do much to bring prosperity to every other industry.

The Veterans' Bureau has been created, consolidating all the agencies for the soldiers' relief. Action upon claims has been simplified and expedited and an efficient and economical system is being created.

Permanent and comprehensive legislation for highway development has been passed and $75,000,000 for Federal aid for this fiscal year has been provided, insuring great development of our roads, the employment of thousands of our people, and increased economy in the marketing of our products.

We passed the maternity law, so earnestly sought by the mothers and women of the country. It will do much to alleviate the sufferings of maternity and to conserve infant mortality.

The effective enforcement of the eighteenth amendment has been provided for, and despite the desperate resistance of a strongly intrenched outlaw traffic the blessings of prohibition are being shown more and more in better food and clothing for wife and children, fewer inmates of jails and almshouses, better health, more comforts for the home, less brutality, more home companionship, larger savings, and more of joy and happiness in American lives and homes and the development of a better American citizenship.

Provision has been made for the refunding of the debt of foreign nations. This is a long step toward settling conditions in Europe and toward the improvement of our own financial condition. Under it the debts owed to us by our associates in the war will be put in definite form, and as soon as they are able to pay they will begin to pay. Not a penny owing from them will be remitted, but we will not act the Shylock toward them, but will give them the time that is necessary for them to prepare to meet their obligations without humiliation. By such a policy we not only show them proper consideration but we also best serve our own interests. This shows clearly, too, how different our problems are from those of the last administration. It was easy to make the loans to our associates in the distress during the war. It did not take long to fix the terms. It was no trouble to them to sign these I O U's. It is not so easy to collect this money or arrange for its payment by bankrupt peoples.

We have passed long-needed legislation for the relief of the Patent Office. This has been strongly urged by the business interests of the country because of the great delay in dealing with patent applications. This act will bring the business of the Patent Office up to date.

We have made ample provision for our disabled soldiers and greatly increased hospital facilities.

Let me tell you of a few of the outstanding acts of some of our departments.

The Department of Commerce has been made what it was intended to be, an aid to the business public. It is now a Federal agency to which any business man can come to get adequate and reliable advice, information, and cooperation in meeting and handling his current business problems. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has been so organized that the little man in American business now has virtually the same opportunities abroad that heretofore have been enjoyed only by the big man with his own organization abroad. Now the little man, like the big man, is a unit in a national manufacturing, exporting, and selling scheme and in a real sense the bureau is his sales organization or agent. The more generally this is known the greater benefit it will be.

The Census Bureau has been reorganized so that production and consumption data are gathered at frequent intervals, presented in commodity as well as dollar figures, and published in the main within 10 days after gathered. The elimination of waste in commerce and industry is being done by two new divisions, Building and Housing and Simplified Practice. Efforts to relieve home shortage are promoted, proper zoning of cities and towns is fostered, the establishment of uniform building codes is encouraged, and the alleviation of the burden of seasonal and intermittent building operations is sought. Earnest and effective efforts are being made to assist in the reduction of size and varieties in those commodities where either the manufacturers, distributors, or users will receive marked benefit from such simplification. For instance, in the paving-brick industry where 66 varieties were manufactured now only 11 are made. In the field of dry-cell batteries 32 sizes have been reduced to 8. Such work as this is of real practical value and will reduce repair and maintenance costs and enlarge foreign commerce.

The War Department has been put upon a fine military as well as an economic business basis. The framework of the organization developed during the World War is being perpetuated so that its tremendous cost will be a permanent investment for all time. This is being done largely through the allocation and the development of the National Guard and organized reserves. Enrollments in Reserve Officers' Training Corps units have been greatly stimulated and the citizens military training camps have been made a great success. The discontinuance of some activities, the consolidation of others, and the elimination of many duplications have brought economy and efficiency and contracted the Military Establishment to the requirements of peace on a basis of sound business principles.

But a glance can be given to the wonderful work of Postmaster General Hays in transforming the Post Office Department in his brief year of service. The department, through reorganization and other economies, has been able to make material saving in expenditures. The total appropriations for 1921–22 were $586,000,000. The appropriation which the department has asked for 1922–23 is only $562,000,000, making a saving of approximately $24,000,000.

Restoration of the morale of the postal workers has been accomplished through the personal interest of the Postmaster General in the welfare of the postal workers. He established the "open-door" policy with them and invited in the fullest manner their suggestions for improvement and their participation therein. Individual initiative and intelligence have been brought into play, and the human element from personal contact has permeated the whole force with the result that the greatest tasks have been met in the most successful way. The primary result of the helpful spirit is the vastly improved service to the public. This was demonstrated in the most remarkable cleaning up of the Christmas rush without delay or congestion of the mail in the records of the Postal Service. It seems that the postal workers themselves were eager to establish this record, and the public was no less interested in assisting. The great arteries of the Railway Mail Service were at no time congested, and at 6 o'clock Christmas Eve reports came in from every part of the country showing unanimously that everything was cleared up at that time. Not only did the public cooperate in mailing Christmas parcels early but they packed the parcels so securely that there was less damage than ever before recorded.

Notwithstanding this remarkable record, the Christmas mail was 20 per cent heavier than ever before, and the postal receipts were the largest on record. Among the service betterments the Railway Mail Service is prominent. This is the great artery of the Postal Service where approximately 90 per cent of the weight of all the mail is carried, and of this a large part is distributed or handled by this service on the railroads en route. This service is one vast traveling post office, functioning simultaneously throughout the entire country, and in which the necessary separation, distribution, and dispatches of mails that could otherwise be made in the post offices are made in the swiftly moving railroad post office cars. Thus the mails are advanced in delivery in the greatest time, and the post offices are relieved of a work the magnitude of which they would be unable to handle. The other departments have been doing equally good work, though probably not along so constructive lines, notably the Labor Department, that has adjusted disputes involving almost 1,000,000 men.

No more striking proof of the benefits of a Republican administration can be seen than the action of Liberty bonds. They were issued during the war. The people paid for them their full face value. What happened to them? They went below par. They kept going lower and lower until they were from 10 to 15 per cent below par. In other words, they were from a billion to a billion and a half dollars less in value to the people who bought them than they had paid for them. What has happened during less than a year of this administration? These bonds have risen in value until they are all nearly to par, and some of them are above par. The holders of these bonds are richer by a billion dollars or more now than they were on the 4th of last March. Why? It is largely because of the confidence of the people in the Republican Party and in its ability to put the Government on a business basis. You say the people are losing confidence in us. Maybe so, but are the millions of Liberty bond holders going to risk losing on their bonds by putting the Democratic Party into power? I do not think so. It will take more than talk to lead them to do it.

Economy: That word was unknown to the Democratic administration before and during the war. They spent the people's money in the most reckless fashion. Not only did they build up a wasteful and uselessly large organization but they secured the money they spent by the sale of bonds. No matter how wastefully this money was used these bonds must be paid in full and the interest is an annual charge that we must meet. We can and we must change the organization. We must reduce its expense and increase its efficiency. This we are doing. No more earnest effort was ever made in this line than the President is putting forth. He is insisting that his Cabinet chiefs reduce their force to the minimum consistent with efficiency. They are doing so and at the same time instilling in their employees the spirit of emulation. Thousands of employees taken on during the war have been taken from the Government pay roll and far better service is being rendered by the balance. Concretely, January 1, 1921, there were 643,833 civil employees in the Government service; July 1, 1921, 637,767; and January 1, 1922, 588,018, or a reduction since July 1 last of 43,749. Probably we can do more in this way. But we can not do much in other ways to lessen expenses. In my judgment we will do well if we can hold them where we are. The obligations that we must meet were created by or under the Democratic administration. We can not escape them. We can not diminish them. We must provide for meeting them, and it ill becomes Democrats now to berate us for the appropriations we make or the taxes we levy, because we are doing it only to meet their obligations. Will they tell us how we can escape paying annually $975,000,000 interest on our bonds? Can we refuse to provide $381,000,000 for the sinking fund? Would they have us refuse to provide $489,000,000 for the compensation, hospitalization, insurance, and payments to dependents of dead or wounded soldiers? How can we avoid paying over $200,000,000 for pensions? These amounts will get larger rather than smaller.

We are cutting appropriations to the bone. In order to economize I fear we are neglecting needed improvements that in the end mean waste and loss to the Government. The people want internal improvements. The Democrats berate us for not making them. They can not be made without money. The money can not be gotten except from taxes or the sale of bonds, and they and the interest on them must be met by taxes. We appropriated $75,000,000 for good roads. We could have refused to do so, but in my judgment it was real economy to spend it. Many people urge increased reclamation activity. It costs money to carry on reclamation work. To do so we must add to our appropriations and that means more taxes. I believe it will be real economy to provide something like $250,000,000 for systematic development during the next 5 or 10 years. That sum will complete economically the projects now under way and being carried out wastefully from lack of funds. Some new projects can be started and hundreds of thousands of acres of land now waste, barren, and unproductive can be made a source of power, wealth, and taxes as well as furnishing employment for thousands and homes for as many more. We have had only small sums during the last seven years for river and harbor work and aids to navigation. Is it real economy to neglect these things? We have been doing so and we may continue to do so in the interest of economy and to save the people from added tax burdens. During the last two years of the Democratic administration we had a Republican Congress. All efforts at economy were made by it in spite of the efforts of the administration to add to expenditures. Democratic officials sent huge estimates of their needs and in two years the Republicans cut their estimates over $3,900,000,000. In other words, if we had appropriated Democratic estimates nearly $4,000,000,000 more would have to be raised in taxes than we now are raising. We have just passed a tax bill that reduces the tax burden on the people by about $800,000,000 a year. If Democratic estimates had been carried out, we would have had to increase taxes by three or four billions instead of decreasing them. And yet our Democratic friends think the people are tired of the change. The people may groan under the burdens they bear. They may growl at the troubles they face, but they understand the causes of them and it will be a long time before they go to the Democratic Party for relief.

The Democrats say we are drifting. Not at all. We have a definite program.

The treaties, that will go a long way toward making the world a fit place to live in and to undo the harm done by Democratic leadership, will be ratified, and the United States will take its proper place as the leader of the world's thought for peace.

Supplemental shipping legislation will be passed which will make certain an adequate merchant marine.

Legislation will be passed under which reclamation work will be broadened so as to include swamp lands and the work under way will be hastened.

Legislation will be passed that will express the Nation's gratitude to its soldiers of the World War without placing any undue or disturbing burden on the people or on business.

Government salaries will be reclassified and put upon a fair and just basis.

The commission created to reorganize and coordinate the various activities and agencies of the Government will report, and legislation will be passed to carry it into effect, and thus do away with much duplication and produce efficiency and economy.

We may not and probably will not be able to complete this program this session, but we will do much of it, and we will present such a record of real achievement to the people this fall that they will confirm the verdict of the last election.

I have tried to make a fair and concise statement of the record of the Republican Party during the first year of its service. I prefer to appeal to the good judgment and common sense of our people rather than to their passions or prejudices. They are fundamentally just, and in their aggregate and ultimate verdict they are right. In reaching a conclusion they will take into account not only what we have done and the conditions under which we have done it but also the results of the first years of the Democratic administration under Woodrow Wilson. We were in normal peace times. The war had not begun. No one expected it. If the Democratic Party can run the country well, it should have done so then. How did it succeed? Have the people forgotten? This is what the facts and the record show: We had business depression, idle labor, curtailed markets, reduced revenues, greater appropriations, increased transportation rates, special direct and multiplied taxes, and a higher and increasing cost of living. The party that made such a dismal failure then and showed such poor leadership after the war can not be trusted to solve the great and difficult questions that face us now.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, we speak and act here on this treaty and the companion treaties for the most powerful Nation on the planet, the wealthiest, the Nation whose credit and income and resources remain intact after a convulsion that has brought near to insolvency every other great power in the world.

It is natural, therefore, that we hear the demand from every part of the land and from all classes of the people that we shall not refuse our approval here of arrangements with other great powers, the sole purpose of which is to promote peace in the world, the curtailing of ruinous armaments, and the ending for at least the next 15 years, as provided in the treaties, of the remorseless rivalry in naval armament that we all recognize as the one outstanding menace of peace and recovery.

On what grounds can we reverse this universal judgment of the people that it is our national duty to make this contribution, great as it is, with so small a sacrifice of our sovereign power to determine particular questions from our own interest solely, if they should arise under these treaties? Is any nation not associated in these agreements likely to attack the United States? We look over the face of the earth and what do we see? One great power, the United States, solvent and a creditor of all the rest, with undiminished man power, with no enmity to any other, with no designs upon others, and with the reputation among all nations of friendly good will toward them all, and every other important power crippled in its resources of credit, wealth, and man power, sick of war and of the causes of war, desiring nothing but a chance to regain its solvency and restore its industrial life, and looking anxiously and eagerly to us to point the way, and to lead the way, to a better order.

Mr. President, the dangers from which we would escape we are all familiar with, and they were the cause of the President's invitation to the other great powers to join in this conference. We were confronted with an offensive and defensive alliance of the two other great naval powers of the world, which there were reasons to believe was a menace directly to our policy of the open door in the Far East. Because of this alliance we felt bound to erect a naval power equal to or greater than any other. Thus the naval rivalry grew, until our own expenditures for naval power alone threatened to reach the collossal figure of twice the ordinary cost of the whole Government 10 years ago.

The conference was called. The limited scope defined for it by our distinguished Secretary of State was finally agreed to. The purpose was to put an end to this insane and ruinous rivalry in battleship construction and to the menace to the world's peace that it necessarily involved. We desired to go further and to establish, if possible, our principle of the open door in China. We hoped to see the Province of Shantung, in which its two great philosophers and sages, Confucius and Mencius, were born, restored to the Chinese. We intended to ask our friends, the British and Japanese Governments, to abandon their treaty of alliance that for 15 years had been to us as a thorn in the side.

And every one of these splendid objectives was attained by our President and Secretary of State, with the brilliant cooperation of the members of the peace commission, including the Republican and Democratic leaders of this body.

The great conference proved to the people not only of our own country but of the world that there are alternatives to war and force and rivalry in arms to obtain justice and right among nations. It was such a demonstration of the worth of conferences on particular questions that the people everywhere have been enormously impressed by this method of international dealing in all disputatious questions and issues. No wonder that every telegraph wire, every mail that reaches this Capital, is freighted with messages of delighted approval of the President, of Secretary Hughes, and of the commissioners who accomplished this splendid thing in behalf of the world's peace and recovery, the chance of recovery from the ruin of war, and this impressive reduction in costs and taxes in time of peace to prepare for—yes, and to cause—war.

Mr. President, I can not vote against such an achievement of the true spirit and efficiency of America. The defeat of these treaties or the mutilation of them, as it seems to me, would be a tragedy hardly less appalling than the Great War itself. To dash a people's hopes, raised so high during the memorable, historic, fateful days of the negotiation of these treaties of peace, because of timid doubts or suspicions, or technical and petty criticism of words, or a preposterous fear of attack from some unknown and impossible quarter, or a chronic fear of any sort of agreement among nations requiring our signature and fulfillment of terms, is to assume a responsibility for future misunderstandings, rivalries, and wars that I, for one, do not dare to take.

On the contrary, I feel that in supporting the treaties, in holding up the hands of our President and Secretary of State in their superb success in accomplishing the great purposes of the conference, I act on one of the great privileges of my life to serve my country and all countries.

Mr. President, I support the treaties because I believe in them, confident that they make the greatest single contribution to world peace that has been made in my lifetime, but I support them also because I indorse the striking statement of President Harding concerning the great possibilities for peace and understanding, good will, and intercourse and commerce and happiness and profitable industry on the earth, in his farewell address to the armament conference. "I once believed," he said, "in armed preparedness. I advocated it. But I have come now to believe there is better preparedness in a public mind and a world opinion made ready to grant justice precisely as it exacts it. And justice is better served in a conference of peace than in a conflict at arms."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I desire briefly to say a word in reply to the speech of the able Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] recounting the imaginary achievements of the Republican administration. The distinguished Senator seemed to want to leave the impression that the Democrats had not helped but had seriously hampered and hindered the Republicans in their efforts to pass beneficial legislation.

I recall one thing that has been of value to the American people, especially the farmers, the merchants, and the bankers of the South and West, and that is the revival of the War Finance Corporation. This was done by coalition between the Democrats and the western Republicans. It would not have been passed but for this mutual arrangement. The Republicans with 24 majority would not pass it. The papers tell us now that Iowa has secured some $22,000,000, I believe, through the War Finance Corporation, and that Nebraska has obtained some twelve or fifteen million dollars; that some of the other States have received a goodly sum, and that it has aided the local banks in tiding them over. Now, this but proves the contention that I have made here for 16 months that the Federal reserve banks were not supplying the money necessary to meet the needs of the farmers, merchants, and bankers in the agricultural sections.

They tell us plainly and pointedly that this money has enabled the banks to function again, which shows that the great banking system of the Nation that we established has been changed from the course that we intended it to follow, crippled and hogtied by the Federal Reserve Board so that it does not function as we intended it should function.

As the Senator from Washington proceeded to talk about how much money had been expended during the war, that we all had one thought and only one—that of winning the war—I thought of the money appropriated and used in the building of ships, ships costing $600,000 and $800,000 which were put upon the auction block by the Shipping Board under the present administration and bartered to the Shipping Trust for $2,100 each.

Some of us made such an outcry against it in this body and in the other body that those deals have been temporarily held up. Now the administration comes along and suggests that the ships must be sold, and I suppose for a song, and you are not only going to sell them to the Shipping Trust but you are going to give them a subsidy of $30,000,000 to induce them to operate the ships which you will practically give to them.

The Democratic Party under the leadership of President Wilson built up a great merchant marine during the war, and the great ships that we built are now going to be gathered like a flock of ducks and turned over to the Shipping Trust, whose members have agreed among themselves that there shall be no competitive bids. When the auctioneer says, "How much am I offered for this ship?" then all will stand with sealed lips but one, and he will say, "$2,100," and the auctioneer will say, "Once, twice, three times and sold to this man or this concern for $2,100," a loss of $792,900 on each ship. Is the Government helpless? Can it not wait and keep these ships in condition until normal times are restored?

The Ship Trust has decreed it, and they must be gathered together and bartered so that the Shipping Trust may obtain this wonderful bargain and the Government may lose these millions and hundreds of millions of dollars. This is one of the boasted achievements of the Republican administration.

This is one of the things which came to my mind as I listened to the Senator from Washington. There is a great propaganda going on in some of the Republican newspapers. The Washington Post is carrying these articles daily. Kansas has reported, Nebraska has reported, Missouri is getting on her feet again, so the papers say, and they are just boosting prosperity on paper, when, as a matter of fact, there is dire distress all through the South and the West. Corn is selling now below the cost of production. Oats and cattle are likewise selling below the cost of production. Cotton is selling below the cost of production. Yet the Senator from the far western coast stands here to-day and regales our ears with a speech on the accomplishments of the Republican administration.

It has been beneficial to a few people. I thought, as the Senator proceeded, how Wall Street had fattened and flourished upon it. I was reminded of the story of Sut Lovingood, who got his father to get down on all fours and put a pup to playing with the old man, to train the pup to bite and hold. The pup in taking hold of the old man's coat also got hold of pop's flesh. Whereupon the old man told Sut to take him loose, but Sut said, "I know it hurts you, pap, but it's the makin' of the pup." [Laughter.]

Now, that is the present situation. The administration has hurt the masses, "but it is the makin' of the pup." Wall Street has never had such a killing in all its days. It is flourishing in rank luxuriance as never before. We are told that "everything is lovely up there and the goose honks high."

Mr. President, I am going to make a speech during this session of Congress upon the achievements of the administration and upon some of the failures of the administration. I will tell Senators what the Republican administration has produced. Just now let me say that it has reduced thousands, tens of thousands, many, many hundreds of thousands of Democrats and Republicans from a state of bountiful prosperity to a condition of abject poverty. It has destroyed property values by the billions and laid waste the substance of the people like some mighty besom of destruction. It has paralyzed business and driven millions of men out of employment and denied justice to the soldier. It has produced in the ranks of the Republican Party a queer literary genius, and this disgusted and long-suffering Republican, in his distress and desperation, has been driven to write the following mournful lines, which he has sent to me:

President Harding is my shepherd.
He maketh me to want.
He leadeth me beside free soup houses.
He maketh me to lie down on hard benches in the parks.
He forceth me to go hungry in the presence of mine enemies.
Surely unemployment and an unsatisfied appetite shall follow me all the days of his administration.

[Laughter.]

The Republican administration has certainly created conditions that produced this testimonial to its wholesome and beneficial results. Mr. President, I recall another incident which should be of interest to Republican Senators. During this administration a Negro of Republican proclivities was convicted of stealing some bacon and meal and sugar and coffee. They tried him before a Republican judge. The judge said, "You have been convicted of larceny." The Negro said, "Yas, sir; I know I has." "You broke into this man's house and you stole." "Yas, sir." The judge said, "I am going to break this thing up. I am going to teach you Negroes something. I am going to give you one year in the penitentiary." The Negro said, "Judge, could you, please sir, make that three years?" The judge asked, "Why should I make it three?" "Well," the Negro said, "because if I gets out in one year under this here régime, or whatever you call it, I am going to steal again; I know that; but if you makes it three years the Democrats will be in power by that time and I won't have to steal no more." [Laughter.]

And thus the record is written.

As in legislative session,

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to call up House bill 9859, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Jones, Wash.	Moses	Spencer
Broussard	Kendrick	Norris	Sutherland
Capper	King	Oddie	Swanson
Caraway	La Follette	Overman	Townsend
Ernst	Lenroot	Page	Underwood
Harris	Lodge	Rawson	Warren
Harrison	McKellar	Sheppard	Watson, Ga.
Heflin	McNary	Simmons	Willis

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the following Senators are detained from the Senate in attendance on the Committee on Finance:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. SMITH answered to their names when called.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Bursum	Fernald	Keyes	Nelson
Dial	Gooding	McCormick	Sterling
Edge

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, of course I should like to see the Senator from Michigan get up the appropriation bill and have it passed; I recognize that he has been very patient in the matter; but I do not believe there is a particle of a chance of securing a quorum here this afternoon.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am inclined to believe that is so. If I had thought that any Senator was going to ask for a quorum I should not have asked that the bill be taken up. I had stated to several Senators that all I intended this afternoon was to call the bill up, have the first reading, consider items about which there was no possible contention, and allow all other items to go over. It seemed desirable, however, to others that we should have a quorum. I recognize the fact that probably it will be impossible to proceed with the bill this afternoon because of the difficulty of securing a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think a quorum is now within reach.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Every Senator understood, I thought, that no question involved in this bill was to be disposed of this afternoon about which there was the slightest contention; but I thought we could make some progress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wanted to make the suggestion as to the difficulty of securing a quorum, because I thought the Senator might desire to direct the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I realize that this debate is out of order——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is it the Senator's intention to call up the bill on Monday?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is my intention to call the bill up at the very first opportunity which is afforded. I realize that the treaties have the right of way, but I recognize that there may be times when no Senator desires to speak on the treaties, and I intend to take advantage of such opportunities.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it will take a very short time to dispose of the bill. I do not see any reason why it should take long.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not understand that it is going to take any great length of time, but it is going to occupy some time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as the Senator evidently directed his moderate censure toward me, may I say that I made the point of no quorum because I believed that when a bill carrying approximately $300,000,000 was being considered there should be in this Chamber more than four or five Senators. I asked the Senator if he intended to call up his bill before I suggested the absence of a quorum. He said he did. I knew nothing about the fact that he was not going on with its consideration, and consequently I suggested the absence of a quorum. If I had known that he was not going to take up controversial matters I would not have raised the point; but I may say in passing that it seems to me that following a speech of an hour's duration by a distinguished Senator on the other side, extolling the virtues of this administration and recounting its achievements and accomplishments, it comes with bad grace at this time not to have a quorum here so that we can pass a great appropriation bill; and if Senators would stay here we could go on with these bills.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I find no fault at all with the Senator's argument. I am in hearty accord with what he has said. I realize, however, that we do not have a quorum here much of the time; and I felt that we could make some progress on a bill which all want passed, and simply pass over all questions about which there might be any controversy. That is my only object. I have waited all day for this opportunity, and I am not complaining.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, while I am rather sorry that the Senator in charge of the bill should have informed his colleagues that it was not necessary for them to stay here, because he was not going far with the bill, at the same time there is no reason why there should not be a quorum here at this time of the day, on Saturday or any other day, if we intend to do business. While I agree with the Senator from Alabama that probably we would have some trouble in getting a quorum, it strikes me that we should have a quorum here whether it is Saturday or another day, and I sincerely hope the Senator in charge of the bill will insist upon securing a quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what is the use of having a quorum? Senators are going on debating various matters and they can speak just as well without a quorum. Why have one? If we are not going to enforce the rule, let us go on without it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. MYERS, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. McKINLEY, and Mr. CAMERON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators having answered to the roll call, a quorum is present.

PRINTING OF SHANTUNG TREATY (S. DOC. NO. 166).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I find that there is only a committee print of the treaty between China and Japan known as the Shantung treaty. I ask that it be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing, as follows:

On motion of Mr. LODGE it was—

Ordered, That the treaty between China and Japan for the settlement of outstanding questions relating to Shantung, with agreement supplementary thereto, be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate return to legislative session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed legislative session.

INTERNATIONAL REFORM BUREAU.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield to me to make a request?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there is here in the city an institution known as the International Reform Bureau. Its superintendent and treasurer is Dr. W. F. Crafts. Recently there appeared in a publication of this city, and in some other publications in the country, a charge that Dr. Crafts has a slush fund of a million dollars with which to get certain legislation through Congress. I am sure there is no truth in the ridiculous charge. However, it would tend to reflect upon Congress, perhaps, as well as on Dr. Crafts. He has written me a letter denying it, and I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 9, 1922.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your recent letter, I am sending you additional information about the published charge that the International Reform Bureau has attempted to terrorize Congress into support of our "pet bills" by "a million-dollar slush fund," which reflects, you see, not only on the reform bureau as dispenser of the "slush fund" but also on Congress as receiver of it, and especially on the 10 reform leaders in Congress who are on the bureau's board of directors, Senators SHEPPARD, WESLEY L. JONES, STERLING, MYERS, and CAPPER, and Representatives UPSHAW, HERSEY, SMITH, BARCLAY, and BLANTON, who, if the bureau has a "slush fund," would naturally be supposed to be both dispensers and receivers. In this view, one of these legislators has suggested that a denial and disproof in Congress of this charge, which will otherwise be believed by some despite its absurdity, is "a matter of high privilege." Recent letters, subjoined, from some of these legislators, denying this allegation and describing the reasonable methods by which reform measures are secured, may put a check on much reckless talk about alleged use of improper methods in legislative work for home protection laws.

In a quarterly magazine entitled "Liberty" in its issue for the third quarter of 1921, and in press reports in Buffalo Express and other papers of a lecture often given by its editor, the following statement is made:

"Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, the superintendent of the International Reform Bureau, who styles himself a 'professional reformer' and 'Christian lobbyist' at Washington, according to published reports of the Washington papers, recently threatened every Congressman with political beheadal by the churches, whose animosity he would stir up by a slush fund of a million dollars which was at his command, if Congress did not pass his pet Sunday bills which were then pending."

The truth or falsity of this charge is a concern, you see, not only of the reform bureau and of Congress but also of the "Washington papers," especially if they really said what is attributed to them, if it is not true.

When Prof. Charles A. Longacre, the editor who made the serious charge above, was asked to prove it, he quoted, in a letter dated December 2, 1921, the actual statements of "Washington papers," which he had professed to summarize. The first quotation was from the Washington Times of December 10, 1920, where it was not stated that I had "a million at command" but was "expecting" it (I thought the interview sent out widely to the press might prompt some millionaires to give it), and desired to use the million for promoting many reforms, no reference being made in the Times to any "Sunday bills" pending but only to indefinite "blue laws" as a part of our program with "safeguarding prohibition," "putting the Bible in the schools," etc. In fact, no "pet Sunday bills" of the bureau were pending; no Sunday bill at all except one for the District of Columbia in charge of a local society, a bill that corresponded to Sunday laws in force in all States save California. Our efforts as to Sunday are to maintain State Sunday laws and improve Sabbath observance by the churches.

Prof. Longacre's second citation was from the Washington Star of December 10, 1920, page 18. This quotation also described the "million dollars" not as at my "command" but as "expected."

These were the only citations Mr. Longacre could quote from "Washington papers," and in neither of them was there any reference to a "slush fund" or any intimation that the money was to be used for anything but open promotion of legislation that, in the words of Edmund Burke, "makes it harder to do wrong."

The "slush-fund" charge, even before it was published in the Liberty Magazine, appeared in exactly the same words in the Buffalo Express of May 9, 1921, in a report of a lecture by Mr. Longacre the night before to a large audience, which had no knowledge that he was really a sectarian defender of the Saturday Sabbath, for the Religious Liberty Association, for which he spoke as secretary, posed as a nonsectarian champion of American liberty. That the charge was in exactly the same words as in the magazine showed that Mr. Longacre furnished the press report. The same lecture was given in many cities, where the miscellaneous "antiblue law" forces, bootleggers, prizefighters, gamblers, and Sunday profiteers gathered, apparently glad to find one religious body that would furnish a chaplain for the motley crowd, the aims of the other members of the alliance being too manifestly selfish to make any appeal to outsiders.

The Jewish Sabbath Alliance had deliberately declined to defend people of any race that observe neither Saturday nor Sunday but continue their business seven days a week.

That Mr. Longacre, on the platform and in the press, joined in the nation-wide cry that a Puritan "blue law" was "pending in Congress for the whole country" was the more reprehensible in that he was living almost at the door of Congress, and by a mere telephone call to the document room of House or Senate might have learned that no national Sunday law, drastic or otherwise, has been introduced by anyone in Congress in the quarter century of the Reform Bureau's history.

Mr. Longacre having found nothing in the Washington papers about the "slush fund," and having a wholesome fear of the consequences of making such a charge out of his own head, printed in Liberty magazine of the first quarter of 1922, page 27, what he labeled "A denial and corection," but in fine print and on an obscure page and with a specious plea that "slush fund" is not defined in dictionaries, and that he "did not mean to imply Dr. Crafts obtained it or was going to use it in a corrupt way," as if "slush fund" was not a well-known synonym for a legislative bribery fund of dirty money, to be used in ways that would not bear the light. There was nothing in the correction like the manly frankness with which Frederick the Great showed his greatness by saying unqualifiedly, "I made a mistake."

The correction would not in any case be expected to reach 1 per cent of those who heard and read the original charge against the Reform Bureau and Congress. My demand for a further correction in the daily press was frustrated by Mr. Longacre insisting on discussing a lot of other Seventh Day Adventist theories and quarrels under which the false charge to be retracted would have been buried out of sight.

Mr. Longacre's most libelous charge, that the Reform Bureau "had at command" a "slush fund of a million dollars," could not fail to interfere with the much needed support of the bureau in two ways: First, by the charge that the funds were improperly used; second, by giving the public to understand that in any case the Reform Bureau had more than enough funds, and needed no help from anybody. In fact, the bureau's audited report of the year ending June 30, 1921, showed that its total receipts, plus funds on hand at beginning of the fiscal year, were only $55,000. The previous year it was $56,000, which is as large a sum as it ever collects in a year for its manifold reform work, now including law enforcement, suppression of gambling, marriage and divorce amendment to the Constitution, investigation and regulation of motion pictures, and placing Bible readings and commandments in the schools.

For more than a quarter century this bureau has helped Congressmen to carry good bills, including 18 that were introduced on the bureau's request, two of them by the present Speaker, Hon. F. H. GILLETT, one on divorce, the other to protect savage islands having no civilized government against American traders bringing them rum, opium, and firearms. Mr. GILLETT, on hearing of the "slush fund" charge, wrote to Dr. Crafts the following letter under date of March 6, 1922:

LETTER FROM SPEAKER F. H. GILLETT.

"I have known you well for many years and I never have seen any evidence of your threatening Congressmen or using any improper influence, either by what your critics call a slush fund—of whose existence I never had any suspicion—or in any other way."

One of the bureau's bills, skillfully carried to victory by Congressman Sims, put the Benning race track on the scrap heap. Another, introduced by Mr. Roddenbery, of Georgia, prevented fight films of the Johnson-Willard match in Habana from brutalizing the boys of the Nation. Senator NORRIS has certified in writing that the war prohibition act as finally passed was in the main the work of the Reform Bureau, which has always cooperated with its big temperance allies, the Anti-Saloon League and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, as Belgium fought with France and Britain.

That phrase "professional reformer" used by Mr. Longacre, as if it were a term of reproach, is a curious illustration of how people pick up counterfeit phrases and give them undeserved currency through failure to test them by a moment's clear thinking. When people want a doctor they want a professional doctor, not a quack; and when they want a lawyer they want a professional lawyer, not a shyster; and so when they want reform, which means restoration to normalcy, as when a doctor sets a leg that was out of joint, they should want a professional reformer, not an amateur.

And the "Christian lobby," also spoken of disparagingly by Mr. Longacre, is simply the place where legislators meet Christian experts for counsel. Selfish men may get into the lobby, but in a representative government the people have a right to consult with their public servants, who ought to be able to resist a knave even better at the door of a legislative hall than in the privacy of a house or hotel.

Seventh Day Adventists' lobbying is near insanity, because based not on facts of history but on their "pet" theory of prophecy, which is that if work and business is stopped in Washington by law on the national rest day it will necessarily lead right on to compulsory church-going on Sunday on penalty of death, though Sunday laws now existing in all our States, save California, are having no such effect.

These Seventh Day Adventists have just sent out—so Mr. Longacre told me in a recent letter—a million copies of an "extra" edition of the "Liberty" magazine, each copy attacking two Sunday bills and a 6-day bill for the National Capital, in the nature of city ordinances against conducting labor and business on seven days a week. In each of these magazines there is a printed petition to Congress that confuses the ignorant with the assumption that "prohibition of secular labor and business on any stated day of the week" is a "union of church and State" and "the enforcement of a religious observance" and therefore "subversive of religious liberty" and "should be opposed by every lover of liberty"—all this in face of the fact that religious liberty, civil liberty, and "personal liberty" for one free day every week are all found in largest measure in those countries where Sunday laws have long been in force.

Talk about threatening Congress with "a million dollar slush fund"! What about flooding Congress with a million of such disguised sectarian petitions, that hide opposition to American Sunday rest under the unspoken assumption that if Congress stops Sunday work it must ere long compel Sunday worship under penalty of death?

The Washington Star of March 12, 1922, published, no doubt from copy furnished by the Seventh-day Adventists, whose national headquarters are at Takoma Park in this city, an article headed, "Protest of Blue Laws." Liberty, a magazine of religious freedom, which is vigorously opposed to "blue-law legislation, not only in the District of Columbia but in the States as well, is to be distributed throughout the city the coming week by the Religious Liberty Association of America, with headquarters at Takoma Park." Not a word to intimate that the Liberty Magazine is published by Seventh-day Adventists, who control the Religious Liberty Association as one of their agencies. What do the people and Congress think of such a camouflage in sectarian warfare?

I will show you, if desired, a copy of Seventh-day Adventist book of "Bible Readings," whose sectarian purpose is disguised, that will solve for many legislators and others the puzzling question why Seventh-day Adventists devote more money, zeal, and effort to fighting Sunday rest in law and Sunday observance in practice than to fighting the great social evils which they oppose when not absorbed in fighting Sunday.

In spite of their persistent efforts they expect Sunday laws will prevail because they think the Bible so foretells. One chapter in this official Seventh-day Adventist book teaches that the United States Government is "the third beast" of Revelation xiii, 11–17, which "had two horns like a lamb but spake as a dragon," and is to repeat, they hold, the persecution, unto death, of the first and second beasts, "pagan and papal Rome." This lamb-dragon, that is to take the place of the American eagle as our symbol, they say will make a law of Congress to compel everybody to go to church on Sunday—including all Congressman themselves—on penalty of death. Here is a representative sentence from this book which is a key to all the intense activity of this sincere but obsessed people:

"The voice of the dragon (that is, the United States Government) is the voice of intolerance and persecution. This indicates that this Nation, which for over a century has stood as a beacon light of liberty to all the world, will repudiate its mild and lamblike professions of civil and religious liberty, and become a persecuting power."

There is in this publication reference to a photo-engraving facsimile of this "third beast" from a Seventh-day Adventist chart. I call it "a horned hog," because the head of this imaginary beast looks to me like the head of a wild boar. The body, they tell me, is intended to look like a lion. Certainly the whole imaginary symbolic figure does not look like a "lamb-dragon." But the drawing is not important and should not divert attention from the amazing devotion to a fanciful theory of prophecy that makes a whole denomination believe more than anything else in their creed that history is going back fifteen to twenty centuries and a nation of whom only half go to church is going to inflict capital punishment on everybody who does not go to church on Sunday—as if such a church-going could be secured, and as if it would be of any use if it could be secured.

We admit the sincerity of these Seventh-day Adventists, and their industry and generosity, and their loyalty to prohibition—except when they have to choose between helping prohibition or hitting Sunday. But surely we ought not to allow people so crazed by the "beasts" of Revelation to influence us against American institutions and American associations.

I subjoin the letters previously referred to, from national legislators who are also International Reform Bureau directors, and in that capacity and as national legislators have long been familiar with the bureau's legislative work.

Yours for a "better world" here and now.

WILBUR F. CRAFTS.

LETTERS FROM SOME LEGISLATOR-DIRECTORS OF REFORM BUREAU ON "SLUSH FUND" CHARGE.

[From Senator WESLEY L. JONES, of Washington State.]

Your favor of March 1 with reference to the charge that you had a "slush fund" of a million dollars and "threatening Congressmen" to do your will with reference to bills, etc., at hand.

These charges are so ridiculous that they do not deserve any attention whatever. You have conferred with me often with reference to matters of legislation in which you are interested, but you never suggested or intimated in any way, manner, or form that if I did not do as you wanted me to do you would try to injure me politically or otherwise. You have always presented your matters to me upon their merits and left them with me to do as my judgment dictated.

[From Hon. ADDISON T. SMITH, of Idaho.]

I am surprised to learn that a charge has been made that you ever threatened to antagonize the reelection of Congressmen who were not in sympathy with legislation which you have so ably sponsored. My acquaintance with your activities extends over a period of a quarter of a century and at no time have I ever observed that you attempted to influence Senators or Members in any other way than by arguments appealing to their intelligence. There are many laws on the statute books, through your initiative and influence, which have been for the benefit of the general welfare of the people which otherwise would probably never have been enacted.

[From Senator HENRY L. MYERS, of Montana.]

As a Member of Congress who is well acquainted with you and your congressional work, I utterly repudiate the statement that you ever threatened with defeat every or any Congressman who does not vote for bills which you advocate or who does not obey your behest or work in conjunction with you. I am surprised that anyone would make such a charge. I am sure it is absolutely false and unfounded.

Those are not your methods. I have known you long and intimately and am well acquainted with your congressional work. I know you are or have been interested in many measures, all measures for that matter, for the betterment of humanity, for good government, for better morals, and for cleaner living, but in advocating such measures you only use argument and persuasion and you deal only in facts. Your work has been strictly legitimate, highly honorable, and of a clean nature. I have never heard of your having at command a slush fund of $1,000,000 or $1 or any money at all except for your few needs and very moderate legitimate expenses.

So far as I know, there is pending in Congress no Sunday bill for the Nation at large. Congress has no jurisdiction of such matters. I believe there are two or three Sunday observance bills for the District of Columbia pending in Congress, and, so far as I know, you have had nothing to do with any of them. I introduced one, and it was not at your suggestion. I did it purely of my own volition. I am sure you are doing a good work, and I am sure that no improper motive or improper methods with which you may be charged can be substantiated.

[From Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas.]

I have had a number of conferences with you regarding legislation, and I have never known you to use threats or improper arguments of any kind. I have never heard of your pursuing this course with anyone else.

The statement that you were or are connected in any way with a slush fund is, of course, entirely without foundation.

In connection with legislation relating to enactment and enforcement of national prohibition and restraint of race gambling, I have had frequent occasion to confer with you, and have also met you and your associates in the Reform Bureau management at annual councils, and have never seen anything to suggest that either money or threats were used to influence the action of legislators.

The Reform Bureau's plan is, as I understand it, to have reform experts outside of Congress bring the facts in the case to those in charge of bills on the inside, and to rally public support to bills that are regarded by both groups as at once desirable and practicable.

[From Hon. IRA G. HERSEY, M. C., of Maine.]

I have your letter of the 2d instant, and note what you say. Do not be disturbed by these unwarranted criticisms about your work here. Our enemies, of course, have to say something from time to time, but I do not pay any attention to them, as we know practically all their statements are unfounded. They can not hurt you, in my opinion. Come in any time and talk it over with me if you feel there is anything I can do to help you. I would not pay any attention to these slurs about what your enemies think.

[From Hon. WILLIAM D. UPSHAW, M. C., of Georgia.]

I am glad, indeed, to have your letter of March 2, but I am possessed with a feeling that is a cross between outrage and amusement to learn that some blind or designing "phule" has been charging that you have been "threatening every Congressman" who didn't vote for Sunday restriction laws, and yet more solemnly amused at the suggestion that you have a "slush fund" for the purpose of intimidating and submarining "poor defenseless Congressmen."

As one of the directors of the International Reform Bureau, I know that the story about the "slush fund" is an unmitigated, unfumigated lie, while the claim of your carrying a bloody guillotine for wayward Congressmen is the same kind of an article, needing a disinfectant.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2897) to appropriate $1,500,000 for the purchase of seed grain to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

AGRICULTURE IN THE SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement of Dr. H. A. Morgan, the president of the University of Tennessee, for a long time the head of the department of agriculture at the University of Tennessee, on the subject of agricultural investigations and research, especially as applied to our southern part of the country. I think it will be interesting reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UNIVERSITY OF TENNESSEE,
Knoxville.

The Nation owes a peculiar obligation to the South. This can, for the following reasons, be better paid in support of agricultural investigations and research than in any other way.

1. For more than three-quarters of a century the Southern States have produced practically all of the Nation's cotton, and prior to the advent of the Mexican boll weevil the major supply of the world. As I shall point out presently, this has been done by an enormous loss of soil fertility and the development of agricultural, social, and economic problems very difficult of solution. Twenty-five years ago the United States produced 90 per cent of the world's cotton, but in 1921 not more than 50 per cent. To lose our position in cotton production means a loss of world prestige that no other crop or combination of crops grown in this country can equal. If our cotton production influence is to be maintained, more extensive investigations must be inaugurated in soil restoration, plant selection, systematic rotation, and in methods of controlling insect pests and cotton diseases. To relinquish our position in the production of cotton would most seriously affect the agricultural, industrial, commercial, and domestic life of the Nation. The by-products (cottonseed meal and oil) are nearly as national in their distribution as cotton fiber, and while substitutes may be found for these by-products their place can not be filled without expensive economic adjustment and liberal investigation.

2. Special crops, other than cotton, produced only in this territory enter into the commerce of the whole country. Sugar cane, dark tobacco, citrus fruits, peanuts, cowpeas, velvet beans, and Japan clover are among the most important.

3. From November to May the Nation is dependent upon the Southern States for the major supply of all fresh vegetables and strawberries, and during May and June for all spring lambs. Investigations conducted in connection with the economic production and marketing of these commodities by the experiment stations of the South are of vital importance to the marketing agencies and to the consumers in the States of the North, East, and West.

4 The South and Southwest are rapidly becoming the supplemental hog and cattle producing area for the feeders of the corn in the States of the Middle West.

5. For many years the States of South Carolina, Florida, and Tennessee have been the Nation's source of phosphate. This material has formed the dominant part of the mixed fertilizer industry available alike to the whole country. Through lack of adequate investigations and organization millions of acres of our own land fundamentally weak in phosphorus have become less productive, while the high-grade rock phosphate was shipped abroad. The experiment stations have clearly shown this element to be the limiting factor in crop production and are largely responsible for the more intelligent use of phosphate and the interest in its conservation.

6. The feeders of dairy and beef cattle north of the Mason and Dixon line have found the thousands of tons of cottonseed meal and cake one of the chief and also cheapest sources of protein food.

7. On the other hand, the cotton States have always been an important market for the surplus corn, wheat, small grains, hay, beef, pork, dairy products, orchard fruits, and pure-bred live stock of all classes. Ninety per cent of the draft mules of the South are purchased as weanlings in Indiana, Missouri, and Illinois.

For these reasons the whole Nation is vitally interested in the South's agricultural prosperity. The main source of this prosperity is restoration and maintenance of soil fertility. All of the States join in the request for additional support for agricultural investigations that cotton in spite of the weevil may be economically produced and marketed and the social conditions of the grower may be very greatly improved.

In the production of this national crop the waste of soil fertility has been enormous and is not generally realized. More than $70,000,000 worth of plant food are annually removed, largely through the seed. This loss of plant food is based upon a 10,000,000-bale crop and prevailing prices of commercial plant food. If this loss could be recovered, it would soon pay for operation of Muscle Shoals as a source of power or as a fertilizer-producing organization.

Land producing 450 to 600 pounds of seed cotton and 15 to 18 bushels of corn per acre is an agricultural menace. To remedy these conditions agricultural experiment stations have put forth every effort with the comparatively limited resources and facilities at their disposal. Apparatus for the measuring of fertility has been devised and soils from various areas have been placed under chemical control so as to determine the actions and effects of various plant foods (fertilizers), limes, legumes, and systems of cropping. The returns are of incalculable value, but soil problems are complex and results slowly achieved. (See news-letter attached.) With additional support, now that technical methods have been worked out, dozens of other soil plants in as many States would be put into operation.

The returns from the agricultural stations of the South have more than justified the investment. Some of the results I shall here enumerate.

SEC. 1. The larger part of the Southern States is especially adapted to dairy and beef cattle production. This large part of the country has been deprived of a profitable cattle industry because of the prevalence of the cattle tick. In the effort to produce cattle in spite of the tick from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 were annually lost in the infested territory. In addition, large amounts of money have been spent in carrying out quarantine and protective measures. Life history and habit studies of the cattle tick revealed methods of control and eradication. Already more has been saved in one year from these investigations than will be spent on the entire eradication program. In a few years this pest will be eradicated from the United States, many millions saved annually, and a vast territory opened to profitable dairy and beef husbandry. This means successful crop rotation and pasture areas that have heretofore been denied this territory and in turn assures the South of permanent cotton production without the social and economic penalties associated with a single crop system.

Since tick eradication was inaugurated four grand championship prizes in the beef classes of Shorthorn, Hereford, and Angus at the International Live Stock Exposition have been awarded to animals raised in what were formerly tick-infested States.

SEC. 2. Twenty years ago grain sorghums, plants usually productive in the dry areas of the Southwest, were practically unknown in that region. As the result of careful plant selection and breeding by the experiment stations in cooperation with the United States Department of Agriculture, more than 80,000,000 bushels are now annually produced.

SEC. 3. A few years ago the Louisiana stations undertook the introduction and selection of sugar-cane varieties from lands where the season was adequate for the maturing of seed. So successful were these experiments that the entire cane-producing territory of the South has been planted to one or more of these introductions. The qualities sought and procured in these experiments were storm resistance, greater tonnage per acre, and an increase in sugar content. The success of this work stabilized the sugar-cane industry and assured the continuance of this important crop in a territory better suited to cane growing than any other crop. It also saved the State large amounts of money invested in equipment for production, manufacture, and distribution of cane sugar.

SEC. 4. Cotton production has been threatened many times by insect and plant-disease attack. Anthracnose and angular leaf spot, two destructive seed-bearing diseases, have been investigated by the experiment stations of the Cotton States and means of control discovered. Through years of patient study of the life histories of these diseases it was found that the spheres (seeds) of these parasitic plants were carried over from one season to another on the cotton seed and planted with it. Exhaustive laboratory tests proved that these spores were easily destroyed by drying, and the simple method of keeping seed in thoroughly dry places for more than one season or drying by artificial heat killed the spores and saved the crop.

SEC. 5. Investigations by stations proved that a part of the life of the organism known as the apple rust was spent on common cedar. By the eradication of cedars to within 2 miles of the orchards the great losses accruing from rust were prevented.

SEC. 6. The citrus interest of the Nation have been twice threatened by enemy invasion, first by the cottony cushion scale, which was controlled by the introduction of the Australian "ladybug," a predaceous beetle, then again a few years ago by a most destructive disease known as canker. The researches which were begun at the Alabama Experiment Station clearly indicated the methods of extermination that finally eradicated the disease and saved a most profitable industry in a territory better adapted to citrus production than anything else.

SEC. 7. The stomach worm is a serious enemy to sheep. Investigations have revealed methods of control by systems of cropping and pasture changes that guarantee in grain and crimson clover areas a profitable spring-lamb production otherwise impossible.

SEC. 8. Throughout the South the weevil is the most destructive pest to stored corn. Large investments have been made to develop equipment to prevent this loss. Methods of preventing this weevil damage have been developed by experiment-station workers. Resistant strains of corn have been produced, and from habit studies of the insect a system of trapping the hibernating weevils has proven an excellent method of control.

SEC. 9. For many years serious loss occurred on sugar plantations and in factories from sugar inversion caused by molds that lived upon the sirup which enveloped the sugar grains. Experiment-station laboratory studies revealed the fact that extra drying destroyed the molds. At slight expense additional drying was provided and the loss prevented.

SEC. 10. Tobacco-plant beds have been ravaged by flea beetles. This insect has been one of the chief enemies of young plants. From recent studies it was found that the suckers or second growth produced from the stump after the crop was gathered supplied sufficient food to carry the beetles to the winter or hibernating period. By the destruction of the suckers, which are of no value, the beetle perished and the attack upon spring plant beds prevented.

SEC. 11. Throughout a large area of the Southern States the growing season extends through the winter months. From 10 to 20 per cent of the entire growing season is between the time of harvesting and planting of summer-grown crops. Barley, under such conditions, is an important crop. The beardless varieties were unable to endure the minimum temperatures, as were the bearded varieties. The latter, however, were unpopular and little grown. By cross breeding beardless barley varieties were produced upon the Tennessee Experiment Station. These productions are being extensively used for winter grain, thus utilizing the land during the winter growing season, preventing land erosion, and making possible the production of two crops a year. The barley provides winter pasture and a grain crop the equal of corn in feeding value and yield per acre.

SEC. 12. One of the great achievements of station investigations was the study and the discovery of the cause of so-called "clover sickness." Thousands of dollars were annually invested in the preparation and seeding of red clover, only to be lost by the "clover sick" disease. Both remedies and resistant strains were finally obtained, and clover again established in States where for more than a quarter of a century it had proven a failure. In addition to the value of the plant for hay, clover had been the main legume used for the recovery of nitrogen from the air. Its reestablishment upon the farms of the South is of incalculable value in forage production, soil restoration, and economical system of crop rotation.

SEC. 13. The soft-pork losses are under investigation. Peanuts and soy beans are vital to southern pork production. Discrimination against peanut-fed hogs is about one-fifth of the present value, which amounts to millions annually. A complete corn ration at the close of the fattening period gives promise of an early remedy for this serious loss.

I wish now for a few moments to call your attention to some conditions which are not only forcing changes in projects of research and investigation but a readjustment of our teaching and extension programs. These changes mean ultimately a very great revision of the agricultural practice in the South, which in turn will react upon the entire agricultural topography of the Nation.

1. The spread of the Mexican boll weevil over practically the cotton-producing area. One living outside this region can not realize what this means. Farms which for generations were devoted to cotton are now changing to pasture and hay crops or the growing of winter grains or are abandoned. Silos are under construction for the use in dairy and beef farming. Cooperative creameries producing products formerly imported from the North. Efforts in the production of fruit and vegetables are proving successful, and larger areas are being devoted to corn, beans, peanuts, and alfalfa for pork production. The experiment stations are the sources of information related to these adjustments. Unless investigational institutions can develop this information under conditions peculiar to the States involved, and in turn pass the information on to the extension forces, complications will arise and serious losses are inevitable.

2. The emphasis placed during the war upon the production of feed and food products necessary for home consumption, to make available the surplus for overseas and to lessen the congestion of railroad traffic, has become more or less of a fixed economic policy in the South. This has stimulated even home markets for surplus products. Commodities formerly imported from other sections of the country are less in demand. This is particularly true of hay, forage, corn, pork, dairy, and poultry products. The greatly increased freight rates have promoted the live-at-home policy.

3. There has been a remarkable change in the rural population of the South. Thousands of negroes migrated to the cities of the North and South during the war and the year immediately succeeding. Through southern winter resorts and otherwise the agricultural opportunities of the South on cheaper lands have become more generally known. The tide of immigration is gradually shifting from the West to the South. Economic changes are inevitable. The northern farmer must have information about the changes that a larger growing season and different climatic and soil conditions have upon the farm practice he brings with him. His social setting is different. He applies to the experiment station for assistance. His coming produces a new condition. He brings the experiment station's problem with him. I therefore submit, gentlemen, that these factors generate new problems for investigation. The investment of additional funds seems necessary by the conditions that are presented, and I feel sure that these supplemental funds will bring even greater returns to the agriculture of the Nation than the original amounts Congress appropriated under the Hatch Act.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask that the Post Office appropriation bill, House bill 9859, be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for the consideration of the committee amendments first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will read the bill for action upon the amendments of the committee as they are reached.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, under the head "Post Office Department, Washington, D. C.," on page 2, line 18, before the words "at $1,800 each," to strike out "18" and insert "26"; in line 19, after the word "and," to strike out "78" and to insert "86"; in line 24, before the word "assistant," to insert the word "two"; in line 25, before the figures "$1,000," to strike out "mounter" and to insert "mounters, at"; in the same line, after the figures "$1,000," to insert "each"; on page 3, line 14, before the figures "$1,200," to strike out "1" and to insert "3 at"; in the same line, after the figures "$1,200" to insert "each"; in line 16, before the figures "$1,000," to strike out "1" and to insert "3 at"; in the same line, after the figures "$1,000" to insert "each"; in line 19, after the words "at $660 each," to insert "6 chauffeurs at $1,000 each"; and in line 23, to change the total appropriation from "$1,798,730" to "$1,835,730," so as to make the paragraph read:

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator tell us how many new places are created and how many places have been allowed increased salaries in this provision?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is only one case of an increase in salary in the bill. That is where we cut out the position of clerk in charge and substituted the position of assistant superintendent. There was one assistant superintendent. Formerly there had been two assistant superintendents, but it was changed in a previous bill to one assistant superintendent and one clerk in charge, the salary of the latter being $2,250. This official is doing as important work as the assistant superintendent, so we raised him to the same salary and gave him the title of assistant superintendent, making two assistant superintendents in this division.

Mr. HARRISON. He is getting $4,000 now?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; we increase his salary to $3,000 and change his title from clerk in charge to assistant superintendent.

Mr. HARRISON. Is that the only place where an increased salary is provided for?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is my recollection now.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice that the House provided for 118 employees at $1,800 a year, and the Senate committee has made it 126 employees, an increase of 8 places.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not answer the second question the Senator asked. The first was as to how many salaries had been increased. The Senator then asked me how many new places had been created. We created 16 clerkships, because the increase in the business of the Post Office Department required it. It is not out of keeping with the usual annual increase of places.

Mr. HARRISON. Six of those new places were at $1,800 each.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Eight of them, and eight of them at $1,400. The latter is the salary those clerks are receiving now. We put them in that grade.

Mr. HARRISON. Are these six chauffeurs at $1,000 new employees?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They are. Those are places which are now filled by clerks who are paid much more than $1,000 a year. Clerks are detailed to do this work, and they are detailed in other places for mechanical work, as carpenters, and so on.

After looking over the whole situation, and listening to all the evidence, it was thought that it would be better to create places, paying the employees smaller salaries. These chauffeurs are not for the officers of the department, but are for the service of the department, taking the mail from one place to another.

Mr. HARRISON. These places were recommended by the Budget Bureau?

Mr. TOWNSEND. All of them are, and many others were which are not in the bill.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator how many new positions were created by the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was just trying to answer that, and had not finished when the Senator from Mississippi sat down.

We have provided in this bill for 100 inspectors. We have added a hundred post-office inspectors to the bill, and that is a question I will be very glad to discuss when we get to it. If the Senator desires to have me discuss it now, before we reach it, I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. KING. I should be glad if the Senator would state the aggregate number of increases in the personnel.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know that I can tell the Senator, but I have mentioned practically all of them. There may be a few more, but I think not. I do not recall any. I have not in mind any other places which have been created.

Mr. KING. Are most of the increases with respect to work in Washington, or do the increases relate to work outside of Washington, in various grades of the service?

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have made increases in a lump sum, as we always do; for instance, in Rural Delivery Service the usual amount made necessary by the growth of that department. That necessarily means the employment of carriers to cover the routes which are established; but we have created no new positions except those I have already mentioned. We created the position of chauffeur, instead of allowing clerks, drawing higher salaries, to do that work.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator state the aggregate number of increases for all purposes, inside of Washington and outside of Washington, including the number of increases for rural delivery, for activities upon the mail cars, and in all of the branches of the service?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I could not tell the Senator that.

Mr. KING. It would be a number of thousand, would it not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, no. We have necessarily had to provide for an increased number of clerks in the post offices due to the growth of the system, a growth which we have to meet every year. We have to make provision for the salaries. We do not mention the number of employees that can be secured, but carry it in the usual way.

Mr. KING. Is there any way of determining the number of increases in the personnel for all purposes, including rural free delivery, mail carriers, mail clerks, and so on?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can not tell that. When we get to the items I can give a better estimate.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator advise the Senate as to the increase in the aggregate appropriations carried by the bill over the appropriation in the bill of a year ago?

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator has the report——

Mr. KING. I have it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. He has the whole story there beginning on the first page. I want the Senate to understand that the bill is carrying items which were not carried in the last bill. We are carrying items of appropriation for the Post Office Department in Washington which have never been in our bill before. We are doing some things which necessarily add to the total appropriation, but the receipts and the disbursements are set forth on the first page of the report, and I think the Senator will find his answer there.

Mr. WARREN. The present bill carries the employees of the department in Washington who formerly were carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. How much does that amount to, may I ask the Senator, if he has the figures? What is the total amount carried in that item?

Mr. TOWNSEND. For the city of Washington?

Mr. HARRISON. I understand there are items carried in this bill that heretofore have been carried in another bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the total amount of those items?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not able to answer the Senator. I have not figured that up. I think it is something over $4,000,000, but I am not certain.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Michigan, in answer to the question of the Senator from Utah, states that he would find on the first page of the report the amount carried in last year's appropriation bill. I do not find it here. Will the Senator state it so that it will appear in the RECORD? I refer to the amount carried in the last Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The total amount is $576,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. That includes deficiencies?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; it includes everything that was in the bill that was used by the department.

Mr. HARRISON. What was carried, if the Senator has the figures, in the last general Post Office appropriation bill, not counting the deficiencies?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not had that given to me in separate items. I have it here as the total amount appropriated for the Post Office Department.

Mr. HARRISON. The total amount carried in the bill is how much?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Six hundred and twenty-three million dollars.

Mr. HARRISON. And the amount carried in the general appropriation bill last year, including deficiencies, was $576,000,000?

Mr. TOWNSEND. But that did not include any appropriation for good roads. That was simply for the Post Office Department proper. The present bill carries not only the amount for the Post Office Department proper but for roads.

Mr. HARRISON. How much is the amount carried for roads?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Fifty million dollars. We have increased the amount carried in the bill as passed by the House about $19,000,000.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether the deficit shown here of $166,671,064.44 is the deficit for the current year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That was the excess of expenditures over receipts for the last fiscal year.

Mr. KING. One hundred and sixty-six million dollars?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. KING. Then, stripped of all extraneous matters, we lost $166,000,000 in the Post Office Department during the past year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That included some items of deficiency which existed prior to last year. For instance, we fixed a rate by law for the carrying of mail by the railroads. We also provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission could review that rate, and if it was found an inadequate rate it could increase it. It did that and carried the increase back for three years. In the deficiency item that amount is charged, and it aggregates something like $76,000,000. Then there are some other items carried over.

Mr. KING. Of course a part of that would be a legitimate charge to this year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The expenditures chargeable to the year included the year's increase for railroad transportation, about $30,000,000. This was in addition to the back pay mentioned. The expenditures also included about $41,500,000 increases in compensation under the reclassification act.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Michigan misunderstood the question propounded by the Senator from Utah. I understood the Senator from Utah to ask if the Post Office Department had lost $166,000,000. As a matter of fact, it did not, because the bill does not carry the revenues derived from the Post Office Department which go into the Treasury. It is not a loss.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am talking about the excess of expenditures over receipts.

Mr. KING. That would be a loss, would it not? If the expenditures exceed the receipts by $166,000,000, there would be that much loss.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will take out of the items the amounts charged against the Post Office Department which it had to meet and which were included in its expenditures for previous years due to the railroads, then the whole difference ought not to be charged up to the last year.

Mr. KING. No; but there would be at least one-third of that $70,000,000 which would be chargeable to this year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; which the bill of last year did not have to meet.

Mr. KING. So that there would be considerably over $100,000,000 loss.

Mr. TOWNSEND. After deducting the amounts chargeable to previous years the deficit is shown to be $81,387,000, in round numbers.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that in the coming year the deficiency will be greater?

Mr. TOWNSEND. We do not think it will be greater, and at the same time we have tried to make appropriations so as to avoid deficiencies.

Mr. KING. Has there ever been a year when the deficiency or the loss has been greater than during the past year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Probably not. If there had been a faithful statement of the receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year 1920, it would have approximated the amount that is carried over for the last year.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator advise the Senate the causes of the loss, whether it is in second-class postage or whether it is loss incurred in the parcel post or what particular branch of the service it is in?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can say generally that the loss is caused very largely from the parcel post and the Rural Delivery Service, in neither of which, of course, do the receipts equal the expenses. The parcel post has grown immensely. There is a great loss in the Parcel Post Service.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that if we are to continue the present parcel-post system the expenditures will be greatly increased, because of the need of constructing stations, sheds, and warehouses to care for the enormous freight which is now being placed upon the Post Office Department for carriage?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I believe it will be necessary to have some adjustment of the regulations and the rates. I have not any doubt about it. I do not think we will ever discontinue the parcel post. I think perhaps we have proceeded too rapidly in increasing the quantity allowed to be carried and in reducing the rates. However, that was not during the last year. The Joint Postal Commission is now at work, and has been for some time, in an effort to determine what is the cost of the different classes of mail—first, second, and fourth class. The third class does not amount to much.

Mr. KING. I will state to the Senator that I have had a good many letters, not only from my State but from other States, calling attention to the large warehouses which will be required in order to handle the enormous parcel-post work which is being devolved upon the department.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The parcel-post system is requiring a great deal more space in all of our large post offices. It is a serious matter how we are going to provide accommodations to care for this rapidly growing facility.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that it has become a freight business instead of a mere parcel post. I have observed in many places that all sorts of freight is carried, lumber and flour and fruit, and even coal, and merchandise that formerly was carried by individuals and corporations that were engaged in what we call in the West a freighting business, and by express companies. The Government does so much of this class of business that many private corporations and individuals have been forced to abandon it. Corporations and partnerships engaged in the freight business have gone out of business because of the competition of the Government. The Government has lost millions of dollars in carrying that class of freight. Necessarily it could not be otherwise.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan will permit me, I will say to the Senator from Utah that while there are some losses during the last year on the parcel post, that has not been uniformly the case in the past. If he would devote some of his attention to second-class matter he would come nearer putting his finger on the real causes of the losses in the Post Office Department. There are infinitely more losses in the second-class mail matter than in the Parcel Post Service; but I think we all realize that the parcel post is one of the most valuable agencies of the entire Post Office Department. Surely in these days of enormous rates we ought not to throttle this agency which gives the people the right to send articles at lower rates.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator from Tennessee that I have given a good deal of attention to the question of second-class postage and have introduced one or more bills appertaining thereto, but they do not get any further than the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken about that. In the last year or two we have increased the rates on second-class matter, and a considerable change for the better has been made in that respect. But the Senator was talking about the losses in the department. The greatest losses in the department come from the second-class mail matter.

Mr. KING. I do not pretend to state where the greater losses come from. I know that the losses have been very great on second-class matter, and I have introduced a bill for the purpose of correcting the situation and to relieve the country from the great losses; but I do believe that the losses are very great from parcel post.

I do not agree with the Senator from Tennessee if he means by his position that the Government should conduct a general freighting business. I think it is absurd that the Government of the United States should be carrying coal and flour and all sorts of merchandise, lumber, and matters that belong to the freighting business or the express business. The parcel post is being prostituted to a purpose for which it was never designed, in my opinion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state again that there is a good deal of controversy over the cost of second-class mail matter and fourth-class mail matter and parcel post. We all have our ideas, more or less nebulous, more or less doubtful, as to the facts. The Joint Commission on Postal Service is trying to determine now what the facts are relative to the cost of the various classes of mail. I think it is the most important thing we can establish. I quite agree with the Senator from Tennessee that the parcel post is here to stay, but there are limitations to it. However, it must be made to pay the expenses incurred, the same as second-class mail matter ought to pay its fair proportion of the cost of handling. We do not want to make any money out of it, but all branches of the department should at least be self-supporting.

Mr. KING. Then, if I understand the Senator, the statements which have been so recently put out—at least I have seen the statement in a number of newspapers—that the Post Office Department is paying expenses are not accurate, but, as a matter of fact, the loss for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, will be more than $100,000,000?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the cost in excess of receipts will be in the neighborhood of from $70,000,000 to $75,000,000.

Mr. KING. It is one hundred and fifty-odd million dollars, including the item of $70,000,000 which the Senator has explained.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, the principal items entering into the increased cost are two: One, which the Senator from Michigan mentioned a while ago, is the increase in the rates which was allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and the other is the increase in salaries which was provided a year or two ago. Those are the two items of increase. In my judgment, it is not possible to state accurately what the figures will show during the coming fiscal year beginning July 1, 1922. But certainly this department should not be run on any other theory than that it shall be self-sustaining. So far as I am concerned, I would be unwilling to vote for any bill or any proposition which should violate the principle that the Post Office Department should be run on a self-sustaining basis.

Mr. OVERMAN. Who compose the commission which is making the investigation into postal affairs?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is composed of five Senators and five Representatives. If the Senator desires their names, I will say that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is the chairman, and he, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and myself are the five members on the part of the Senate. The members on the part of the House are Mr. STEENERSON, the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of that body; Mr. ROUSE——

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not care for the names of the Members of the House or the Senate. Are there any outsiders on the commission?

Mr. McKELLAR. There are, I believe, no outsiders at all on the commission.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is one, the chief inspector, from the Post Office Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is an inspector from the Post Office Department, but I am not sure whether or not he is a member of the commission.

Mr. TOWNSEND. He is a member of the commission under the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not recall that fact.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to ask the Senator, if he will yield to me for that purpose, whether the commission is progressing in the work with which it is charged?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not say that it is doing so as to all of its work. Its action is dependent, of course, on the opinions of the members of the commission, and there are some things as to which we differ very materially, but I wish to say that I think the commission has the good of the service at heart and the good of the Government at heart, and is doing a splendid work in making examinations and reporting upon matters which have been committed to it under the law.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the commission has filed reports?

Mr. McKELLAR. It has submitted a number of reports.

Mr. HARRISON. How long ago was it appointed?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not recall the exact date, but I have been a member of the commission for about 8 or 10 months.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The commission was created when the former Senator from Alabama, Mr. Bankhead, was a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, under a law which was passed by the two Houses of Congress at that time. It has been in existence and working on these matters really since a year ago last August. We shall reach the item to which this discussion relates later; but I may say here that the commission has submitted some reports to the Senate and to the other House. It has also made many recommendations to the Post Office Department, which have been followed, and which have resulted in material changes in the administration and conduct of that department.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that my questions do not carry with them any censure of the commission. I have understood that the commission has performed a great work, that it has worked hard, and has made reports and has conducted a pretty thorough investigation of matters which were placed in its charge. That was very gratifying to me, for I have always felt that a joint committee composed of Members of the Senate and of the House could accomplish something; that they could really work and evolve plans looking to the improvement of the conditions under investigation. The history of the postal commission is quite different from that of the Joint Committee on the Reorganization of the Executive Departments, which was appointed a year or more ago, and was composed of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives. If it had been left to that personnel, I have no doubt the joint committee would have investigated the various departments, would have effected certain coordinations, would have eliminated certain useless offices, and would have saved the taxpayers some money. It was, however, thought wise that the executive departments should have a representative on the Joint Committee on Reorganization. They appointed their representative, and he was made the chairman of the Reorganization Committee. He has been making his investigations, but I have seen in the newspapers recently that nothing will be done by the Reorganization Committee during the present session of Congress.

I happen to be a member of that joint committee, and I know that it has done nothing, and it seems to me that it is going to do nothing. That is due solely to the fact that the executive department has interfered in the matter, and has a representative who does not call the committee together. The committee has made no investigation, and of course we might be charged with negligence. I wish that committee could have performed its work, as has the joint commission which has investigated the Postal Service, without the interference of any executive department.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi that in so far as the postal commission is concerned, the executive member of it has had, comparatively speaking, very little to do with the commission. As I have said, the head of the commission is the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who has, of course, taken the lead in everything in connection with the work of the commission, without any interference, so far as I have been able to see, on the part of the executive member of the commission. I believe—and I make the statement without intending to give myself any credit, for I have only been a member of the commission for a short time—from what I have seen of the postal commission that it is a very necessary and a very proper commission; and though generally I am opposed to commissions, and think we have entirely too many of them, it seems to me that the postal commission is doing a very good work.

Mr. HARRISON. That goes to show that the postal commission acted wisely; they selected the distinguished Senator from Michigan as chairman of the commission, and he has called meetings. The Joint Committee on Reorganization, however, did not act wisely. I thought the wise thing to do was to have appointed the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], or the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], as chairman of the reorganization committee. If either of those Senators had been selected as chairman they would have called the reorganization committee together; we would have had hearings, and before now we would have made a report to Congress. Instead of that, however, there was appointed as chairman a man who had no legislative experience, so far as Congress was concerned, who had no knowledge of the various departments which he was charged to coordinate, and consequently he has called no meeting of the committee since April 6 of last year, and I presume there will be none called.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to pursue this inquiry just a moment further.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator about to refer to some matter prior to page 4?

Mr. KING. The inquiry I desire to make is general in its character.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If we can proceed with the bill and bring these matters up in their order, I can give the Senator better information if he will wait until some specific question is before the Senate.

Mr. KING. The questions in regard to which I desire to propound inquiries are of a general character and relate to the entire bill. Now that we have gone into the subject, let us conclude the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the Senator about to read from the report?

Mr. KING. Yes. As I understand the deficit for the fiscal year 1921 was $157,502,398.95. The deficit for the current year will be in the neighborhood of $100,000,000, or, as I understood the Senator from Michigan, perhaps a little less. Assuming those facts to be true, I want to ask the Senator what provision is being made to increase the revenues so as to avoid these great deficits or what economies are being suggested in this bill, so that we may not have such enormous deficits each year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The committee has recommended only such amounts as are absolutely necessary for conducting the Post Office Department. By reason of the increase of salaries under reclassification legislation enacted about a year ago over $41,000,000 additional on account of salaries had to be provided last year. This added to the deficiency. In addition there was something like $30,000,000 in increased compensation to the railroads, making a total of something like $71,000,000 in addition to the back pay of $76,000,000 to the railroads.

If the revenues of the department increase materially—and I think they are increasing and are likely to continue to increase somewhat—they will reduce any probable deficit next year. That will help to some extent, but it will be necessary to readjust some of the mail rates if we are going to get the money necessary to meet the expenses of the department. We are getting from the department now an absolutely honest accounting; there is no misrepresentation being made to Congress as to the receipts and disbursements of the Post Office Department. As I have said to the Senator, we are trying to find out—and I hope we shall find out before another Post Office Department appropriation bill comes before the Senate—what the department is receiving and what it is costing to handle the different classes of mail matter. As soon as that is ascertained it will be for Congress to determine whether it will make the various classes of mail matter self-supporting or whether the department shall continue to handle some of them at a loss.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator, unless great economies are carried into execution during the fiscal year 1923, or unless the receipts are very much greater, there will be a large deficit for the year 1923.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There will be a deficit, but I do not think it will be as large as the one for the current year; I have no reason to believe that it will be. For the Post Office Department we are not making as large an appropriation as we did last year. We have reduced the appropriations where we could and where we thought it would not interfere materially with the administration of the department.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think, in view of the certainty that there will be a great deficit, that this bill or some supplemental legislation ought to provide the money for the deficit rather than withdraw it from the Treasury?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The committee is not in a position to legislate on that matter in connection with an appropriation bill. We have not the information before us. I have tried my best, as have other members of the committee and of the postal commission, to find out what the several branches of the service are costing. Headway can not be made by guessing at the facts; so we are trying to ascertain them and are doing so with the least expense possible.

The experts of the department are assisting us, and, with our experts, we are trying to find out the facts. I hope we shall be able to arrive at a correct ascertainment before we have another Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. I hope so, because I think it is very unfair to the taxpayers to have a bill here every year which carries from $80,000,000 to $150,000,000 more than the amount received from the service, so that there is a deficit which has to be met from general taxation.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is mistaken about that being the case every year. I think the last year was the first year when there was ever any such deficit.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what is the difference between the appropriation bill this year and the appropriation bill of last year?

Mr. McKELLAR. There is a difference of about $3,000,000, as I recall the figures.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the pending bill appropriate $3,000,000 more or $3,000,000 less than the bill of last year?

Mr. McKELLAR. Three million dollars less. I think that is correct; I am merely giving the figures as I find them here.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the service will cost more this year than last year, but that this year the appropriation will be $3,000,000 less than last year. How is that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in this particular bill $573,000,000 are appropriated, exclusive of $50,000,000 for roads, which should not be included as a post-office item. There were $576,000,000 appropriated last year. I am merely giving the round figures.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not understand the question of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I asked why it was that the appropriations for this year for the general expenses of the Post Office Department are $3,000,000 less than for last year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have accomplished a good many economies through the action of the joint commission that I have been talking about. The Senator from New Hampshire informs me that we appropriated something over $1,000,000 to correct errors which occurred in the reclassification bill, the things that had been omitted that we put into this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. That looks as though it would make an increase.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; but it would have been $1,000,000 less than that—less than $3,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the figures on page 2 of the report:

The appropriations for the current year, including deficiencies, amount to $576,680,645.45.

A little lower down the report says:

The bill as reported to the Senate carries $623,773,536.50.

When you take from the last figure the sum of $50,000,000 for roads included in this bill, it will be seen that the present bill carries, exclusive of roads, $573,773,536.50, as opposed to the $576,680,645.45 of last year.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is more than it was last year.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; $3,000,000 less—$573,000,000 as against $576,000,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill as passed by the House carried an appropriation of $554,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, in the items for office of the First Assistant Postmaster General, on page 4, line 18, before the word "assistant," to insert "two"; in the same line, after the word "assistant," to strike out "superintendent" and to insert "superintendents at"; in the same line, after the figures "$3,000," to insert "each"; in line 19, before the word "division," to strike out "clerk in charge, $2,250"; and in line 23, to change the total of the appropriation from "$28,250" to "$29,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

Office First Assistant Postmaster General: First Assistant Postmaster General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,500; division of post office service—superintendent $4,000, 2 assistant superintendents at $3,000 each; division of postmasters' appointments—superintendent $3,000, 2 assistant superintendents at $2,000 each; superintendent, division of dead letters, $2,500; chief, division of correspondence, $2,000; in all $29,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, on page 5, at the bottom of the page, line 23, I want to correct the total by adding the amount that we put in there. I move to strike out "$1,902,880" and insert "$1,940,630."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, under the subhead "Contingent expenses, Post Office Department," on page 7, after line 5, to insert:

For rent of suitable buildings in the District of Columbia for the use of the Post Office Department, including the Division of Equipment and Supplies, not exceeding $35,000; for gas, electric power, light, fuel, and for the expense of removal of such divisions, offices, or parts of divisions and offices of the Post Office Department, as the Postmaster General shall direct, to and from the several Government owned and rented buildings occupied by the Post Office Department in the District of Columbia, $17,000; in all $52,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head, "Field service, Post Office Department, Office of Postmaster General," on page 9, after line 8, to insert:

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to pay a cash reward for any invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions for an improvement or economy in device, design, or process applicable to the Postal Service submitted by one or more employees of the Post Office Department or the Postal Service which shall be adopted for use and will clearly effect a material economy or increase efficiency, and for that purpose the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That the sums so paid to employees in accordance with this act shall be in addition to their usual compensation: Provided further, That the total amount paid under the provisions of this act shall not exceed $1,000 in any month or for any one invention or suggestion: Provided further, That no employee shall be paid a reward under this act until he has properly executed an agreement to the effect that the use by the United States of the invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions made by him shall not form the basis of a further claim of any nature upon the United States by him, his heirs, or assigns: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available for no other purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for office of chief inspector, on page 10, line 21, after the word "and," to strike out "four hundred and twenty" and to insert "five hundred and twenty," so as to read:

Office of chief inspector: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions, at $4,200 each; and 520 inspectors——

Mr. HARRISON. Can that go over?

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator desires.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; there will be quite a good deal of discussion on that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well; let it go over.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I notice on that page an item for compensation of a special assistant to the Attorney General, and so forth. We are not taking up anything but the Senate amendments now, are we?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is all.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask in this connection, anyway, about that item of $6,000 for compensation of a special assistant to the Attorney General to assist in the defense of cases against the United States arising out of the transportation of the mails, and so forth? Is that a new job?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; that is a position that Mr. Stewart has held for a number of years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment on page 10, lines 21 and 22, will be passed over.

Mr. McKELLAR. The other amendments in that paragraph had better go over, too.

Mr. TOWNSEND. They will have to go over with the other one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be passed over.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The items on lines 22 and 23 have gone over, and necessarily they will carry over the amount on page 11, line 5.

Mr. McKELLAR. The total is included down on page 10; but as the expenses in part would affect the other item, they ought to go over, too.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster General," on page 11, line 20, to increase the appropriation for compensation to postmasters from "$43,000,000" to "$43,300,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 26, to increase the appropriation for compensation to clerks and employees at first and second class post offices, including substitutes for clerks and employees absent without pay, from "$100,000,000" to "$103,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 6, before the words "at $1,350 each," to strike out "five hundred" and to insert "nine hundred and eighty-six"; in line 8, before the words "at $1,450 each," to strike out "two thousand six hundred and twenty-five" and to insert "two thousand five hundred and thirty-five"; and, at the end of line 8, to change the total appropriation from "$4,530,000" to "$5,000,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For compensation to watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 986 at $1,350 each; 2,535 at $1,450 each; in all, $5,000,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, in the committee amendment, on page 12, line 8, I move to strike out the word "thirty-five" and insert the word "thirty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And the total should be corrected so as to read "$4,999,600" instead of "$5,000,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 12, line 21, to increase the appropriation for allowances to third-class post offices to cover the cost of clerical services from "$3,900,000" to "$4,250,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 23, to increase the appropriation for rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post offices from "$11,600,000" to "$12,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment on page 12, line 6, go over for further explanation. It is the amendment increasing the number of watchmen, messengers, and laborers from 500 to 986.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think I can explain that to the Senator in just a moment, unless he wants to consider it further. If he does, I have no objection to having it go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think this important bill ought to be considered——

Mr. TOWNSEND. All right. I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted, and ask that the amendment go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I take it there is no objection to the amendment we made striking out "thirty-five" and inserting "thirty," is there?

Mr. OVERMAN. No.

Mr. TOWNSEND. So that that may stand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 12, at the end of line 23, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Postmaster General may use not exceeding $10,000 of this appropriation for adjusting claims arising under section 1 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885: And provided further, That hereafter a lease shall not cease or terminate when a post office can be moved into a Government building unless the Postmaster General deems it to be in the interest of the public service.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question about the last proviso of this amendment:

That hereafter a lease shall not cease or terminate when a post office can be moved into a Government building unless the Postmaster General deems it to be in the interest of the public service.

Do these leases now provide that in the event the Government erects a building the leases shall be terminated?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Every lease must provide that.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the present law, is it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is the present law.

Mr. WARREN. It has been, I will say to the Senator, for a great many years.

Mr. HARRISON. Then why should it be changed, so that that rule will be changed?

Mr. TOWNSEND. For this reason: Several Postmasters General have been before our committee and before the Congress asking that they be relieved of that requirement, except at the discretion of the Postmaster General, because in many of these places—the great mass of them, 99 per cent of them—there never is any possibility that the Government will erect a building into which they can move out of the rented premises; and yet the very fact that that clause is in the lease makes it impossible for the Government to get as low a lease as it could obtain if that provision were not in it. Wherever it is likely that within the 10-year period for which the lease is made the Government will erect a building of its own there, the Postmaster General will insert that clause; but where it is not at all likely, it is simply adding a burden of expense upon the Government to include it in the lease. That has been the recommendation of Mr. Burleson, the present Postmaster General, I think Mr. Hitchcock, and others. They have stated that it has always prevented them from getting as low a lease as they could have obtained if that were left out.

Mr. HARRISON. And this proviso is unanimously reported?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is; and the joint commission recommended that that be done after thoroughly investigating it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 13, line 10, to increase the appropriation for miscellaneous items necessary and incidental to post offices of the first and second classes from "$700,000" to "$775,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 13, to increase the appropriation for pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for letter carriers absent without pay, City Delivery Service, from "$70,000,000" to "$70,500,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 22, to reduce the appropriation for village delivery service in towns and villages having post offices of the second or third class, and in communities adjacent to cities having city delivery, from "$1,500,000" to "$1,300,000."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, why is that reduction in the appropriation for village delivery service made?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Post Office Department for some time has believed that it was an unwarranted cost to the Government to maintain free village delivery. The House added $200,000 to that appropriation for the extension of village delivery. The committee felt that we ought to continue that service where it is now being rendered, but that we ought not to enlarge it at the present time; but we objected to discontinuing any service where it already exists, and for that reason we fixed the amount at the cost of the present service.

Mr. HARRISON. So the service will not be abolished where it exists now?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There will not be a change in any existing office.

Mr. HARRISON. But this is the beginning of the policy not to extend rural free delivery in these villages?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is the policy until we can know more about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 13, line 24, to increase the appropriation for car fare and bicycle allowance, from "$900,000" to "$950,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General," on page 14, line 23, to increase the appropriation for mail messenger service, from "$6,500,000" to "$7,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 25, to increase the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes, from "$86,000,000" to "$93,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 3, to insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That not exceeding $500,000 of this appropriation may be expended for mail messenger service in lieu of payments to railroad companies for side and terminal service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 9, to insert:

For the operation and maintenance of aeroplane mail service between New York, N. Y., and San Francisco, Calif., via Chicago, Ill., and Omaha, Nebr., including necessary incidental expenses and employment of necessary personnel, $1,900,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether this airplane mail service has been a success? I remember the Senator's statement here before, that the appropriation was for experimental routes. Is the service to be extended?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it a success?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, it has been a success in this respect: It has demonstrated the possibility of maintaining airplane service under all possible conditions. They make a flight from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We cut out last year all the side lines, because we wanted to make this one demonstration complete. During the last year, as I recall—perhaps not quite so long, but I think it is a year—there has not been a single fatality in this service, and their connections have been very close indeed. They have demonstrated that they can carry the mail in that way.

If we are talking about carrying the mail at a profit by the Airplane Service at the present time, of course we are talking without the facts. It costs more to carry the mail by airplane than by rail. There is some expedition in it, however, and it is demonstrating the possibilities of this service. Moreover, in a manner its operation pays quite a large percentage of the cost of operation.

Furthermore, it establishes a line of defense across this continent from east to west. The airdromes and the landing places established, which are generally furnished by the people who live along the line, make this, to my mind, and in the opinion of the committee, a desirable thing to continue. Furthermore, we will not get private enterprise to invest the money necessary to develop this facility, the possibilities of which no man can see. We feel that it will be a mistake now, after our experience and with the success we have had during the last year, to discontinue this project for another year. We want to continue it for one year. The House cut it out, but we felt it ought to be continued, and I take it that the House will leave it in when it comes to vote in conference.

After the demonstration has been made, after the experiment has been fully completed, it is altogether possible that arrangements can be made with private enterprise to take hold of this service by airplane throughout the country. They can not do it now, although one enterprise which the Government is paying for, under contract, is running a line from Key West, in Florida, to Cuba. That is by hydroplane, and it is very successful.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 15, lines 10 to 14.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for Railway Mail Service, on page 15, line 23, to strike out "$43,600,000" and to insert "$44,580,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

Railway Mail Service: For 15 division superintendents, 15 assistant division superintendents, 2 assistant superintendents, 1 assistant superintendent in charge of car construction, 121 chief clerks, 121 assistant chief clerks, clerks in charge of sections in the offices of division superintendents, railway postal clerks, substitute railway postal clerks, joint employees, and laborers in the Railway Mail Service, $44,580,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General," on page 17, line 7, to increase the appropriation for manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, special-delivery stamps, books of stamps, and for coiling of stamps from "$1,200,000" to $1,400,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 9, to increase the appropriation for manufacture of stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers, "$4,500,000" to "$5,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 17, to increase the appropriation for payment of limited indemnity for the injury or loss of pieces of domestic registered matter, insured and collect-on-delivery mail from "$4,365,000" to "$4,500,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead, "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General," on page 19, line 7, to increase the appropriation for miscellaneous equipment and supplies, etc., from "$900,000" to "$1,500,000," so as to read:

For miscellaneous equipment and supplies, including the purchase and repair of furniture, package boxes, posts, trucks, baskets, satchels, straps, letter-box paint, baling machines, perforating machines, duplicating machines, printing presses, directories, cleaning supplies, and the manufacture, repair, and exchange of equipment, the erection and painting of letter-box equipment, and for the purchase and repair of presses and dies for use in the manufacture of letter boxes; for postmarking, rating, money-order stamps, and electrotype plates and repairs to same, metal, rubber, and combination type, dates and figures, type holders, ink pads for canceling and stamping purposes, and for the purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriting machines, envelope-opening machines, and computing machines, copying presses, numbering machines, time recorders, letter balances, scales, test weights, and miscellaneous articles purchased and furnished directly to the Postal Service, for miscellaneous expenses in the preparation and publication of post-route maps and rural-delivery maps or blue prints, including tracing for photolithographic reproduction; for other expenditures necessary and incidental to post offices of the first, second, and third classes, and offices of the fourth class having or to have rural-delivery service, and for letter boxes, $1,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 12, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That not exceeding $500,000 of this appropriation shall be available for the purchase and shipment of post-office equipment for use at first, second, and third class post offices.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 10, to increase the appropriation for rental, purchase, exchange, and repair of canceling machines and motors, mechanical mail-handling apparatus, and other labor-saving devices, etc., from "$350,000" to "$376,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 10, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That not exceeding $26,500 of this appropriation shall be expended for completing the purchase and installation of one letter-distributing machine, if upon test such machine is found by the Postmaster General to be satisfactory and efficient, and for no other purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 24, to increase the appropriation for the purchase, manufacture, and repair of mail bags and other mail containers and attachments, mail locks, keys, chains, tools, machinery, and material necessary for same, etc., from "$2,050,000" to "$3,050,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 6, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That $1,000,000 of this appropriation may be used for the purchase of canvas from the Atlanta Penitentiary.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is another item I would like to ask the Senator about. We had some discussion in the Committee on Appropriations as to whether we could make canvas in a penitentiary at a profit, or whether we could make it at all, and what it would cost.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We are making the canvas at the Atlanta Penitentiary at a profit. I have forgotten how much, but it is quite a substantial profit. That profit now all goes to the Department of Justice. There must be some arrangement made whereby under this provision part of it shall go to the Post Office Department. We have established that industry at the Atlanta Federal prison, and unless we continue the manufacture of canvas for the needs of the Post Office Department that activity will go out of existence and those men will have nothing to do. It was investigated very thoroughly, and it was found desirable to keep the prisoners at work, and we can put them to work making this canvas, make a profit for the Government, and save the Post Office Department a large amount of money.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what was predicted. I remember it went into one of the appropriation bills, and there was quite a discussion about it. So I wished to inquire whether, as was predicted, it would save the Post Office Department some money.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is doing that, and I notice by the record they made this last year $200,000 profit at the Atlanta prison in this work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 11, after the word "offices," to strike out "$12,750,000" and to insert "$12,950,000. And the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to investigate conditions arising from contracts in the star-route, screen-wagon, and other vehicle service entered into prior to January 1, 1918, with a view to determining whether any adjustment should be made in the compensation for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1918, June 30, 1919, June 30, 1920, and June 30, 1921, and make a report of his findings to the Congress not later than the first Monday in December, 1922," so as to make the paragraph read:

For inland transportation by star routes (excepting service in Alaska), including temporary service to newly established offices, $12,950,000. And the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to investigate conditions arising from contracts in the star-route, screen-wagon, and other vehicle service entered into prior to January 1, 1918, with a view to determining whether any adjustment should be made in the compensation for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1918, June 30, 1919, June 30, 1920, and June 30, 1921, and make a report of his findings to the Congress not later than the first Monday in December, 1922.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I offer an amendment on line 12, page 21. I move at the end of the line to strike out the word "investigate" and to insert the word "ascertain," the idea being that the department might feel justified in going into a big investigation, whereas they can ascertain the facts and report them to us without such an investigation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 23, after the word "thereof," to strike out "$86,800,000" and to insert "$87,185,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For pay of rural carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual and sick leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, and for the incidental expenses thereof, $87,185,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 10, to insert section 2 in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the joint commission authorized under section 6 of the act approved April 24, 1920, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," is hereby continued until June 30, 1923, to complete the investigation and to prepare a detailed report containing a summary of its findings thereof, and such recommendations as to legislation as it may deem proper: Provided, That the said commission shall not expend a greater sum that $125,000 during the fiscal year 1923.

Mr. OVERMAN. I notice an item on line 19, page 22, of which I would like to have some explanation, the language being, "That the said commission shall not expend a greater sum than $125,000." That means it will spend $125,000, of course. What is it to be spent for?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It does not mean that that amount will be spent, Mr. President. In the first place, when this commission was first created, it had an unlimited amount of money to expend, and it did not expend a large sum. The next year it had $150,000 to expend, and it did not expend $150,000. My recollection is that it spent not over $100,000. We would not ask for this amount now if it were not for the tremendous job we have on our hands of ascertaining the cost of carrying the different classes of mail, which I think will be one of the most valuable things for the Congress to know in connection with the Post Office Department.

Mr. OVERMAN. The commission employs experts to investigate this matter, and, of course, it has to pay them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We now have two expert engineers who are working with the department on the determination of this cost. When we first started, we had several expert engineers, the first year. We went over the cities of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Detroit, and some others, to determine the conditions as to the parcels post, the conditions of the buildings where new buildings were asked for, where we had to move out of the old ones, and also to determine what the vehicular conditions were as to the machines which are handling the mail. We went into all those things from a scientific, careful standpoint.

We have besides that what is known as the postal expert committee, which serves without pay, because we take them from the department. We send them to make investigations where we want investigations of particular subjects made. We are confining our paid assistants to the two expert engineers, who are working with the Post Office Department and the postal commission. That, however, is going to require some additional postal help in the various post offices, temporarily. When we come to make a compilation we can not take all the force we need from the Post Office Department clerks without materially interfering with their work; but it will not exceed $125,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is this money disbursed by the chairman of the commission?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The disbursements are made under the direction of the chairman, and are audited by the Post Office Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 20, to insert section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That post-office inspectors and superintendents and assistant superintendents of the Railway Mail Service are hereby authorized to administer and certify such oaths or affirmations of office as are required by law to be taken by persons employed in the Postal Service. That post-office inspectors in addition to the power to administer such oaths and affirmations are also hereby authorized to administer in the exercise of their duties as inspectors oaths and affirmations required by law or by the rules or regulations of the Post Office Department.

Mr. HARRISON. If I understand this section, it means that these inspectors may administer oaths.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; that is true.

Mr. HARRISON. I make a point of order against the amendment, that it is new legislation on a general appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, this item was recommended by the department. Undoubtedly the Senator must have some good reason for making his point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose the Senator does not contend it is not subject to the point of order?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall not contend about it either way, as far as that is concerned. It is immaterial to me. It was contended by the department, and has been for some time, that it would save a lot of expense and a lot of time if the men who are making these investigations could administer oaths to the various employees who have to take oaths at different times. It would be an economy and a great accommodation if these officers on the ground, sent out to make investigations, could administer oaths, instead of calling somebody else in.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is not very much interested in that item. Especially when we are about to create positions for 100 new inspectors—which job is largely political, always has been, and I presume always will be—I should very much dislike to see a law passed authorizing those officers to go around and administer oaths to people when they could carry out whatever prejudices they might have against certain individuals. Therefore I make the point of order against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator state his point of order more at large?

Mr. HARRISON. This is a general appropriation bill. The amendment is certainly new and general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator have in mind the last provision of the new rule, which reads:

That this rule shall not apply to the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Presiding Officer will look at the first part of the rule, he will find that it merely reincorporates the language of the old rule—that no general legislation shall be incorporated in a general appropriation bill. Of course I am not contending that if the point of order should be sustained the bill would go back to the committee under the new rule, because it was expressly provided in the new rule that it should not apply to this bill; but certainly the exception which was made in the rule adopted a short time ago would not prevent a point of order being sustained where there was new legislation or general legislation on a general appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 5, to insert section 4, in the following words:

SEC. 4. That the paragraph of the act entitled "An act to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis," approved June 5, 1920, providing for leaves of absence, be amended to read as follows:

"Employees in the Postal Service shall be granted 15 days' leave of absence with pay, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, each fiscal year, and sick leave with pay at the rate of 10 days a year, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, to be cumulative for a period of three years, but no sick leave with pay in excess of 30 days shall be granted during any three consecutive years. Sick leave shall be granted only upon satisfactory evidence of illness, and if more than two days the application therefor shall be accompanied by a physician's certificate."

Mr. TOWNSEND. In order to make that comply with the intention of the Congress heretofore, I move to amend, on line 11, by inserting the word "Hereafter" before the word "employees."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 20, to insert section 5, in the following words:

SEC. 5. That the sentence which reads "Receipts $400,000, but less than $500,000—assistant postmaster, $3,000; superintendents of mails, $2,900; assistant superintendent of mails, $2,200; foremen $2,000," of the paragraph providing for the annual salaries of employees, other than those in the automatic grades, at offices of the first class, of the act approved June 5, 1920, entitled, "An act to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis" be amended to read as follows:

"Receipts $400,000, but less than $500,000—assistant postmaster, $3,000; superintendents of mails, $2,900; postal cashier, $2,300; assistant superintendent of mails, $2,200; foremen, $2,100."

Mr. OVERMAN. I would like to have the Senator explain the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will ask the Senator from Tennessee to explain it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take pleasure in doing that.

The reason for the amendment is that as to post offices the receipts of which were more than $400,000 and less than $500,000, in the salary readjustment bill, which was passed in June, 1920, cashiers were given no promotion. All other employees were promoted. It was a manifest error and injustice as to cashiers in about half a dozen offices.

By the way, one of them was in the State of the Senator from North Carolina. I do not recall exactly which one it was, but there was one. This makes a difference of $200 in the salaries of cashiers. That is all there is to it. It is merely to correct an injustice that was done to cashiers in those offices.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There are 12 of them, I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 9, to insert section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. That no part of the moneys appropriated or made available by this act shall be used or expended for the purchase, acquirement, or repair of any commodity, article, or thing which, at the time of the proposed purchase, acquirement, or repair, can be manufactured, produced, or repaired at the nearest available Government arsenal or navy yard of the United States for a sum less than it can be purchased, acquired, or repaired otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 13, to insert section 7, in the following words:

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of extending, continuing, and further carrying out the provisions of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, and all other acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923; and the sum of $65,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for such purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924; and the sum of $75,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for such purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925; and the sum of $7,500,000 is authorized to be appropriated for the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of forest roads and trails for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924; and the sum of $7,500,000 is authorized to be appropriated for the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of forest roads and trails for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask that this amendment may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 9, to insert section 8, in the following words:

SEC. 8. For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices in the city of New York, including the Borough of Brooklyn of the city of New York, at an annual rate of expenditure not in excess of $18,500 per mile of double line of tubes, including power, labor, and all other operating expenses, $513,911.50: Provided, That the provisions not inconsistent herewith of the acts of April 21, 1902, and May 27, 1908, relating to the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, shall be applicable hereto: Provided further, That either party to the contract for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices may apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission at any time after October 1, 1922, and before July 1, 1923, for a revision of this rate, its decision to be effective after July 1, 1923, but in no case shall the rate exceed $19,500 per mile.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is desired that section 8 shall be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be passed over.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator think we had better adjourn at this time?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think there will be any objection to the remaining sections. Sections 7 and 8 have gone over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, at the top of page 26, to insert section 9, in the following words:

SEC. 9. That the provisions of that paragraph of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1921, which amends the act to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, approved June 5, 1920, and which provides that postal employees and substitute postal employees who served in the military, marine, or naval service of the United States during the World War and have not reached the maximum grade of salary shall receive credit for all time served in the military, marine, or naval service on the basis of one day's credit of eight hours in the Postal Service for each day served in the military, marine, or naval service and be promoted to the grade to which such postal employee or substitute postal employee would have progressed had his original appointment as substitute been to grade one, shall be amended by adding the following: "shall apply to such postal employees and substitute postal employees who were in the Postal Service on October 1, 1920."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 22, to change the section number from "2" to "10."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments are completed, except those which were passed over.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That completes the bill, with the exception of the items which have been passed over.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, anyone who wants to offer an amendment to any other provision can do so?

Mr. TOWNSEND. When we get through with the committee amendments, of course other amendments will be in order.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, took a recess until Monday, March 20, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 18, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, the Shepherd of mankind, we turn to Thee again. Grant us all to feel that we are in the presence of a God who cares. Surely Thou dost love us with all our human frailties. Enable us never to forget that the highest reach of manhood is the protection of the weak, the poor, and the unfortunate. Be with us in the exercise of the privileges of this Chamber. Always show Thyself as the radiant Lord of life and glory. At the end of the week may we take love, joy, and peace to our homes. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SOLDIERS' BONUS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the membership who are here and those who may be necessarily absent, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming what information he can give the House with reference to the probable time of considering the bonus bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to my friend that there is no way of determining that far in advance. Frankly I can not tell the gentleman, but I will say to him what I have said to those on our side who have to do with such matters that I thought our people ought to be here next week, beginning Monday.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman then can not give any definite idea about the date of the consideration of the matter? But if I gather from the gentleman's statement it would be well for this side of the House to follow his action and notify everybody to be here on Monday?

Mr. MONDELL. There are various important matters pending, enough so that I think gentlemen ought to be here.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, well, that is a very indefinite answer. Does the gentleman state that we should notify everybody to be here to consider the bonus bill Monday?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman can do as he likes. I am advising gentlemen on our side that I think the business of the House is sufficiently important so that they should be here next week, beginning the first day of the week.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Ask him if that is all he knows about it.

Mr. GARNER. Is that all the gentleman from Wyoming knows about the subject?

Mr. MONDELL. That is all—that I am telling.

Mr. GARNER. That is all you are telling. That is right. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority may have until the adjournment of the House on Monday afternoon to file minority views not to interfere with the consideration of the bonus bill. I do this at the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the minority may have until adjournment Monday to file minority views on the bonus bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the War Department for the next fiscal year.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the War Department appropriation bill, H. R. 10871, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill from the point where he left off last evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENCIES OF THE ARMY.

For all contingent expenses of the Army not otherwise provided for and embracing all branches of the military service, including the office of the Chief of Staff; for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, including the employment of translators and exclusive of all other personal services in the War Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., or in the Army at large, but impossible to be anticipated or classified; to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of War, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, including the payment of a per diem allowance not to exceed $4, in lieu of subsistence, to employees of the War Department traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts, $95,000: Provided, That not to exceed $67,000 of the money herein appropriated shall be expended for the payment of salaries of civilian employees connected with the sale of war supplies and the adjustment of war contracts and claims: Provided further, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to sell to any foreign State or Government with which the United States is at peace, upon such terms as he may deem expedient, any foodstuffs now on hand and found to be surplus, which are not needed for military purposes, or which are likely to spoil, and for which there is no adequate domestic market: Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for the payment of expenses connected with the transfer of surplus property of the War Department to any other activity of the Government where the articles or lots of articles to be transferred are located at any place at which the total surplus quantities of the same commodity are so small that their transfer would not, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be economical: Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated or made available under this act shall be used for the payment of any salary in excess of $5,000 per annum to any civilian employee in the War Department, unless otherwise specifically provided by law.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order.

Mr. WALSH. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas what foods were sold to foreign Governments during the past year?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have no record that any foods were sold. The department tried to sell a large quantity of dehydrated vegetables that were accumulated during the war, which they hoped to sell. My understanding is that they are still on hand.

Mr. WALSH. Are these dehydrated vegetables liable to spoil?

Mr. ANTHONY. They say not. It is stated that they will probably keep for some time, but the department has been unable to make any practical use of them. The soldiers will not eat them. They are probably tasteless, although it is claimed that they have the same nutritive value that fresh vegetables have; but as the dehydrated vegetable is an article of diet that people in this country are not accustomed to, it looks as though these dehydrated vegetables would probably stay on hand in the War Department, unless they are sold for hog feed or something of that kind, which the department recommends.

Mr. WALSH. If the soldiers will not eat them, how did the department come to have such a quantity on hand? What did they get them for?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the dehydrated vegetable is one of the freak products of the war. It was thought they would solve the problem of food supply, and then they found that was a mistake.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, this is not limited to dehydrated vegetables. It applies to any surplus foodstuffs. Are they selling them to people in this country?

Mr. ANTHONY. The principal other foodstuffs were canned meats, and they have made a constant effort and have sold a large quantity of them. I understand they have still some on hand, but not much.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that when we come to the finance department in the bill, pay of officers, and pay of enlisted men, the matter may be allowed to go over until Tuesday; but that the reading of the bill other than those items be continued. This is the situation. There are quite a good many Members on this side of the House, and I assume also on the other side of the House, who would like to participate in the discussion about the size of the Army and the number of officers.

There are many provisions which can be read, about which there will be no objection whatever, but there are a certain number of Members who would like to discuss these items as to the size of the Army when we come to them. They did not know that the bill was coming up to-day when they made their engagements. I think it would be only proper to allow these two items to go over until Tuesday. They are found on pages 15 to 23.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman makes his request that the items be passed until Tuesday.

Mr. KAHN. Monday will be unanimous-consent day, so I supposed the matter would not come up on Monday. On Tuesday morning there is nothing whatever to stand in the way of further consideration of the Army bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman sure that there will be nothing on Tuesday?

Mr. MANN. Had not the gentleman better make his request that the items go over until the next day the bill is under consideration?

Mr. KAHN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I see the bill is going to have some hard sledding. I will make the request at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his request.

Mr. KAHN. That the items under the finance section of the bill, beginning on page 15 and continuing, I believe, to page 25, go over until the next day that the bill is under consideration.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think the gentleman's request covers quite as much as it should in order to include all the items that might be affected by the size of the Army. For example, the very item we are now considering—I had intended to rise for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that if the Army should be reduced to 100,000 men we could reduce this $95,000 carried in this bill to $92,000, and if you increase the size of the Army that $95,000 should be increased. This is not simply my own conclusion, but is the conclusion of the War Department, as I had them to assist in making the figures. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from California provided it includes those items where the size of the Army affects the size of the item.

Mr. KAHN. That is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. MANN. Take the Quartermaster Corps; all these items depend upon the size of the Army.

Mr. SISSON. That is true, but not all.

Mr. MANN. Not all, but most of them.

Mr. KAHN. I think if we take up the items under the Finance Department we will reach most of the matters that are in controversy.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. ANTHONY. May I say that I am sure the committee has no idea of trying to preclude any gentleman from having an opportunity of passing on any items in the bill, but can not the gentleman modify his request so as to pass over the pay of the officers and the enlisted men and let us proceed on the smaller items? Those are the two material items, and we can correct the others afterwards.

Mr. GARNER. What is the object of letting it go over? Why not consider it to-day?

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand there are Members from New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey who are absent to-day.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman from Wyoming said that they all ought to be here.

Mr. MANN. Next week.

Mr. GARNER. Why are they not here to-day?

Mr. KAHN. Because——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California should not reply seriously to that facetious remark following the request the gentleman from Texas made the other day on account of an absent Member. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. I am merely using the language used by the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from Illinois; I always like to adopt their language. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. The fact of the matter is that these absent Members had expected the bill to come up for some days before it was taken up. They had no idea that there was so much business that would delay the consideration of this bill. They asked me whether I could succeed in having the items for the pay of the officers and enlisted men go over until the next day.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will it be satisfactory if we pass over the two items for the pay of the officers and the enlisted men?

Mr. KAHN. I think there is one other item, so if the whole provision for the pay of the Army can go over it will cover the whole thing.

Mr. SISSON. Reserving the right to object, I want to state that there are quite a number of these items that will be affected by the size of the Army. If you increase or decrease it, these items will be affected. If I can get unanimous consent, coupled with the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from California, that these items may be changed so as to conform to the size of the Army, in the event the size of the Army is changed, I have no objection. I do not believe you are going to save much time, however, by this process, because the principal debate on this bill, in my judgment, is going to be upon the size of the Army and the number of officers. All of these other measures, except a few items, will be as a matter of course. When you fix the size of the Army and the number of officers, you have virtually written the balance of the bill, except in so far as these special units are concerned.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, permit me to submit a request for unanimous consent, that the items relating to the pay of the officers and enlisted men of the Army, and any other item in the bill which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] in charge of the bill, or the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], of the minority, shall hereafter request, be postponed for further consideration, to be taken up in order on the next day the committee is in session for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SISSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to pass over for the time being those items relating to the officers and enlisted men and such other items as are requested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] or the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] until the bill shall again be under consideration. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to ask that this item under consideration be passed over, because this is one of the items which will be affected by the size of the Army, unless the gentleman from Kansas is willing to reduce it to $92,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be merely a change from $95,000 to $92,000 in case the gentleman's suggestion about 100,000 in the Army be approved by the House.

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is manifest that if the gentleman's amendment should prevail, we undoubtedly would change that figure.

Mr. SISSON. I have no objection to that, with that understanding.

Mr. MANN. But you can not go back and change an amendment which has been agreed to in the committee except by unanimous consent. At the request of the gentleman the matter could be postponed now.

Mr. SISSON. I am willing that this may be agreed to, but in the event I ask unanimous consent to go back, of course, some one might take advantage of that and not grant that request. In the event there is no change in the size of the Army carried in the bill, this item ought not to be changed.

Mr. MANN. It would simplify matters to pass the whole thing.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I think so. I object to this being considered at this time, Mr. Chairman, because this is involved in the size of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to know from the gentleman from Kansas in charge of the bill at what point the Clerk will begin reading?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would say for the information of the Chair that practically every item in the bill is dependent upon the size of the Army, if gentlemen insist upon the request that has been made. I suggest that the Clerk read from where he left off.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question about the paragraph which has just been read.

Mr. STAFFORD. That has been passed over for further consideration.

Mr. ANTHONY. At the request of the gentleman from Mississippi, we have passed that over.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The entire paragraph?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will begin reading then at line 22, page 5.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, in view of the statement made by the gentleman in charge of the bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARMY WAR COLLEGE.

For expenses of the Army War College, heretofore known as the General Staff College, being for the purchase of the necessary stationery; typewriters and exchange of same; office, toilet, and desk furniture; textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers and periodicals; printing and binding; maps; police utensils; for lighting the Army War College Building and grounds; employment of temporary, technical, or special services and expenses of special lecturers; and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, including $25 per month additional to regular compensation to chief clerk for superintendence of the Army War College Building; also for pay of the following: Chief clerk, $2,000; clerks—two at $1,800 each, seven at $1,600 each, seven at $1,400 each, eight at $1,200 each, four at $1,000 each; chief engineer, $1,400; assistant engineer, $1,000; captain of the watch, $900; six watchmen, at $720 each; four firemen, at $720 each; packer, $840; four messengers, at $720 each; laborers—one $720, one $600; gardener, $720; five charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $70,380.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is it not a fact, exactly in line with what the gentleman from Kansas stated a moment ago, that if we assume there will be a substantial reduction in the personnel of the Army provided for, then all of these items we are now reading might be affected?

Mr. ANTHONY. That was perhaps an exaggerated statement. Probably not all of them. For instance, the one just read relating to the Army War College would not be affected, but nearly all of them would be.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In view of the fact that nearly all of them would be affected, are we not pursuing a very illogical course?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not, because they would be affected so slightly, some of them, that it would be a very easy matter to adjust them to the size of the Army.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But we are adopting these items.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. We are not under any rule or agreement that would enable us to reconsider, and we might reduce the number very substantially below the number contemplated by this bill, and we might not be able to retrace our steps to make the changes in these incidental items.

Mr. ANTHONY. There has been nothing read so far that I believe in the judgment of the gentleman from Mississippi or myself would be affected, unless the size of the Army was very materially reduced or increased from the figures that have been submitted in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I may say to the gentleman that before asking the question I had a talk with the gentleman from Mississippi and he seemed to agree with the gentleman's view, that this is a very poor way to proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUARTERMASTER SUPPLIES, EQUIPMENT, ETC., RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS.

For the procurement and issue, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, to institutions at which one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are maintained, of such public animals, means of transportation, supplies, tentage, equipment, and uniforms as he may deem necessary, and to forage at the expense of the United States public animals so issued, and to pay commutation in lieu of uniforms at a rate to be fixed annually by the Secretary of War; for transporting said animals and other authorized supplies and equipment from place of issue to the several institutions and training camps and return of same to place of issue when necessary; for the establishment and maintenance of camps for the further practical instruction of the members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and for transporting members of such corps to and from such camps, and to subsist them while traveling to and from such camps and while remaining therein so far as appropriations will permit; or in lieu of transporting them to and from such camps and subsisting them while en route to pay them travel allowance at the rate of 5 cents per mile for the distance by the shortest usually traveled route from the places from which they are authorized to proceed to the camp and for the return travel thereto, and to pay the return travel pay in advance of the actual performance of the travel; for pay for students attending advanced camps at the rate prescribed for soldiers of the seventh grade of the Regular Army; for the payment of commutation of subsistence to members of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, at a rate not exceeding the cost of the garrison ration prescribed for the Army, as authorized in the act approved June 3, 1916, as amended by the act approved June 4, 1920, $2,750,000, to remain available until December 31, 1923: Provided, That uniforms and other equipment or material issued to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps in accordance with law shall be furnished from surplus or reserve stocks of the War Department without payment from this appropriation, except for actual expense incurred in the manufacture or issue, in so far as said stocks are in excess of actual requirement of the Regular Army for the fiscal year 1923: Provided further, That in no case shall the amount paid from this appropriation for uniforms, equipment, or material furnished to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps from stocks under the control of the War Department be in excess of the prices current at the time the issue is made: Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for the organization or maintenance of additional mounted, motor transport, tank, or air units in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask one question? I notice that so far as uniforms are concerned the gentleman says that we have made up for the lack of appropriation by allowing the issue of uniforms, but this covers also the procurement and the transportation of horses to camps and to officers' training camps. Horses are something that can never be got again if they go. I want to know whether the change in this appropriation affects the ability to carry horses?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it does not. There is no restriction on the transportation. There is a limitation that provides that they shall not add any increased number of mounted units. It will permit them to maintain those they have.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is that in this paragraph?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but we do not propose to permit them to organize any more mounted units or any more motorized units if we can help it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Where is that proviso?

Mr. ANTHONY. The last proviso.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the proviso.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the reservation comes too late.

Mr. CRAGO. It is not too late.

Mr. STAFFORD. Discussion has been had on it for nearly five minutes.

Mr. CRAGO. You can make a point of order on it at any time until you pass it by.

Mr. STAFFORD. I contest that. Discussion has already been participated in for several minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late. Discussion has been had on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. CRAGO. No; there was merely a question asked, and I was on my feet.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman was on his feet when I spoke.

Mr. CRAGO. I was on my feet ready to make a point of order when the gentleman asked a question, and I did not like to interrupt. I insist that is a very poor way to attempt to get legislation through.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not have pressed my point of order if the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not stated he was in his rights in making the point of order.

Mr. CRAGO. I was trying to be courteous to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. STAFFORD. The point of order comes too late, but I will not press the point of order; but the reservation of the point of order is too late.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it came too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair certainly thinks that discussion has been had on the item.

Mr. CRAGO. If the Chair will remember, I was on my feet ready to make a point of order and did not like to break in on the gentleman from New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman did not make it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. He did not make it while I was asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. He was not entitled to under the gentleman's pro forma amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I did not make a pro forma amendment.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso beginning with line 12, page 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAGO moves to strike out the proviso beginning in line 12, page 11, after the word "made."

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, if we are to have such tactics as have been displayed here it only means that all of us will be on our feet all the time and take proper care to call the attention of the House, at least, to the inconsistencies of this bill. Now, it is clearly subject to a point of order under the decisions in a number of cases on appropriation bills. I do not care to discuss that now, because it will be discussed later when this same proviso occurs with reference to the organizations in the National Guard. Now, I take it, in this bill the main points will be the size of the Army, not only the officers' personnel but the enlisted personnel, and appropriations made for the National Guard. Now, in this reserve training corps we are asking those men who had training in the World War to come to these training camps and receive instruction and to impart instruction in the kind of organizations where they served during the World War, and I insist——

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman just made the statement that this would interfere with the training of the veterans of the late war in the branches in which they had served.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would call his attention to the fact that this appropriation is for training in schools and colleges and only affects school and college boys and high-school boys.

Mr. CRAGO. This is the Reserve Officers' Training Corps?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. This is the reserve training corps for schools and colleges where they train them to become officers of the reserve corps and does not affect veterans of the late war.

Mr. CRAGO. I insist that the gentleman is mistaken. I know he is absolutely honest in it, but he speaks here of the units in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. That is what has been referred to.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is to say, this reserve officers' training school corps at schools and colleges.

Mr. CRAGO. This is schools and colleges reserve——

Mr. ANTHONY. In other words, let me say to the gentleman, this trains boys in schools and colleges, gives them a military training to make them eligible to be in the Reserve Officers' Corps in the same way we train boys at West Point to make them eligible in the Regular Army.

Mr. CRAGO. This has no reference to the training given annually to officers already in the officers' training corps——

Mr. ANTHONY. No relation whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAGO. I can see the distinction between the organization of these highly technical units in the schools and having them organized in the National Guard and in the training which you give to the organized Reserve Officers' Corps.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill, through you, if I am right in the understanding that this does not refer to citizens' training camps?

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not.

Mr. CRAGO. And refers to nothing except the training given in schools and colleges.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. On page 10 it refers to several institutions and training camps. All through there it seems to cover camps.

Mr. CRAGO. With that clear understanding of the meaning of the proviso by the chairman of the subcommittee I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the reason that the committee put this limitation on to prevent the organization of further mounted and tactical units was because we find 11 troops of cavalry maintained. It is a pretty soft thing to have Uncle Sam furnish those schools with 32 horses and with their care and feed for the use of those students. There are schools that have mounted units but that maintain their own horses, their own cavalry troops, such as Culver, in Indiana, whereas there are a large number of others imposing on Uncle Sam for that purpose.

Mr. CRAGO. As long as it only applies to this section, I have no objection.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. HILL. As I understand the gentleman, this simply applies to the units of the Officers' Training Corps in educational institutions?

Mr. ANTHONY. And the summer camps of those institutions.

Mr. HILL. And that there are now about 11 mounted units maintained in schools?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. But that this does not in any way apply to the training of reserve Cavalry regiments or National Guard Cavalry regiments?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The gentleman making the point of order, I think, was in error, and I should not have said anything except for the unnecessary remark scoring this committee, when it is not necessary to do so. I think, as a matter of fact, the chairman of this committee and the subcommittee know a great deal more about this bill, evidently, than the gentleman who has thought it so fitting and proper to be gratuitous in his criticism.

Mr. CRAGO. I sincerely hope they do.

Mr. SISSON. If I did not know more about it than the gentleman appears to know, I certainly should not have criticized gentlemen who have spent so much time in their efforts to know something about it. I do not believe you are going to get anywhere by gratuitous criticism of this committee. If you are a militarist and have got the German military system in your mind, if you differ with this subcommittee, you differ with the majority of the people in this country, in my judgment. Therefore, in view of the fact that we did not bring in that sort of a bill, we ought not to be subjected to that sort of criticism, as if we did not know what we were doing.

Now, while we are discussing this character of service, I want to say to my friends of the National Guard that if you want to destroy the National Guard and permit a program that certain Army officers want to be carried out, the people will help destroy it, because the program will make the National Guard as expensive as the Regular Army. You can not, in my judgment, have the tank units, the chemical-warfare units, and cavalry regiments unless there is some special exception, especially as to the latter, where the boys are willing to furnish their own horses. You can not, with the consent or indorsement of the people of this country, maintain these expensive cavalry units and these adjuncts of the Army with men who are supposed to give but a few hours a week to the training. And your committee, in doing this, was endeavoring, in my judgment, not to make unpopular but to remove a great deal of unpopularity that is lodged against the Army by this expenditure, which we think is a useless one, and for that reason we did the same thing here in this particular activity.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDNANCE STORES, EQUIPMENT, ETC., RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS.

For arms and ordnance equipment, including overhauling and repairing of personal equipments, machine-gun outfits, and horse equipments for use in connection with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, established by the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, $100.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee what is expressly covered by this section?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say that, as to the item mentioned, the department did not take more than $100 for the purpose of keeping it alive. They have so much equipment in surplus that they do not need any money to buy additional equipment.

Mr. HILL. This does not in any way mean the reduction of horse equipment or horses?

Mr. ANTHONY. None whatever.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, as a preliminary to making some comments on what has been said by the member of the committee who spoke a few moments ago about the National Guard, I wish to say that I know at the present time there is a very natural reaction against everything having to do with the Army. However, we can not dispense with the Army at present, and so we must keep it efficient. And I, personally, having gone over very carefully these hundreds of pages of testimony which have been taken by the subcommittee, do not rise in any spirit of antagonism, but merely to present certain points of view with reference to this bill. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has said that certain plans which were advocated by the War Department in reference to the National Guard would end in the abolition of the National Guard. The National Guard has repeatedly been said to be, under the present program of national defense, the chief reliance in the theory of national defense, but the gentleman has referred to the objection to having mounted units in the National Guard.

I should like to take this occasion to read to the House some comments of the adjutant general of Maryland on several matters relating to the National Guard, and I do that at this time for the reason that it is very difficult to consider this bill under separate paragraphs. The bill is one coherent whole. I desire to read this now in order that the Members who expect to participate in the debate on this very important question of the appropriations for the National Guard may have these suggestions before them for consideration.

I know that the committee has labored most industriously and has brought forth a bill based on a certain point of view. Personally, as a person who believes in an Army of 150,000 men and 13,000 officers and an adequate National Guard and reserve, I feel that it is necessary that changes be made in the bill. I believe that the system of Reserve Corps and National Army training recommended by the War Department should be carried out, and I therefore believe certain changes should be made in the bill; but I do not feel that this committee that has brought in this bill is actuated by anything except the same patriotic motives on behalf of the national defense which have characterized the gentlemen of the committee who have spoken. I therefore would like to put into the RECORD, for the benefit of the committee and those who shall discuss this very important matter, this letter from the adjutant general of Maryland, and I might say to the committee that this adjutant general of Maryland is the gallant colonel who commanded the One hundred and fifteenth Infantry north of Verdun in the World War. He belongs to the opposite party to that to which I belong and so there is no politics in this. He speaks from the standpoint of a man who believes that the citizen army should first be coordinated in the National Guard and, second, coordinated in the National Reserve, and he speaks from the viewpoint of those of us who are deeply concerned about certain features of the bill. This letter is addressed to me. I read:

STATE OF MARYLAND,
OFFICE OF THE ADJUTANT GENERAL,
Annapolis, March 16, 1922.

Hon. JOHN PHILIP HILL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HILL: Appropriation H. R. 10871 makes such drastic cuts in appropriations affecting the National Guard that I am compelled to call same to your attention, and to ask that you use your influence to keep the appropriations at amounts that will enable the National Guard throughout the United States to properly function.

For your information certain features are listed below. May I not hope for your cooperation and assistance?

"No item for purchase of animals.

"Page 79, lines 24 and 25, provides forage for 4,000 animals, whereas 8,009 have already been issued to the National Guard.

"Page 80, lines 3 and 4, care of material, animals, and equipment, $750,000, provides for caretakers for 4,000 animals and a balance of $100,000 for other caretakers and mechanics.

"Estimates submitted for 9,740 animals, caretakers, $1,910,500.

"Page 80, line 5, camps of instruction: $6,500,000 will provide for only 115,000 men for 15 days; National Guard has now a strength of over 145,000; $9,500,000 minimum requirement.

"Page 80, lines 6 and 7, expenses officers and specially selected men, $250,000. Item may send 155 officers and 156 men only. Last year 220 applied to attend Benning alone.

"N. B.: No funds under section 81, national defense act.

"Page 80, lines 12, 13, and 14. Travel of noncommissioned officers, $200,000. Insufficient present year and $500,000 needed for 1923.

"Page 80, line 17: Transportation, equipment, and supplies, $375,000. Inadequate this year and $200,000 additional needed under provisions of bill for 1923.

"Page 80, line 20: Armory drill pay, $9,000,000; estimated $11,000,000 minimum requirement.

"Page 82, lines 7, 8, 9, and 10. 'The mounted, motorized, and tank units of the National Guard shall be so reduced that the appropriations made in this act shall cover the entire cost of maintenance of such units for the National Guard during the fiscal year 1923.'"

Thanking you for your attention, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

MILTON A. RECKORD,
The Adjutant General.

I am not speaking merely for the National Guard of Maryland, because we speak of the National Guard as a whole as one of the lines of defense. I might say that when the proper moment is reached I propose to offer certain amendments suggesting amounts that ought to be appropriated to the National Guard instead of the amounts to which they are cut.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a few moments more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Now, gentlemen of the committee, with reference to those horses for the National Guard, here is the situation, referring to the item of 4,000 horses. For four Cavalry divisions, which the National Guard at present has, omitting new units proposed, a sufficient complement of organizations to complete would require 6,784 horses at 32 mounts per proposed unit. I might say it is a very difficult thing at the present time to get former National Guard members and men who served in the war as officers and men to come into the National Guard or to come into the Reserve Corps. They have had all they want of war, and they do not want any more. It is a very difficult thing to organize at the present time National Guard units, and it is a more difficult thing to organize at the present time Reserve Corps units. There is a very strong apathy among ex-enlisted men and ex-officers which prevents them from coming back into the reserve organizations or the National Guard. Their attitude is the same attitude as that of the whole country. They do not want to be bothered by war any more. But, my colleagues, I want to say to you, the thing that the United States lacked when the war came was a proper military policy, and at the present time we are confronted with the question of keeping alive a skeleton organization which can be properly expanded if the need arises.

Now there have been organized in the National Guard—and I am speaking especially of that at this time—certain units which require horses. There have been certain 3.2 Field Artillery units which are still mounted and to which 32 horses per unit have been allowed. There are a certain number also of Cavalry units. All of them need these horses for training.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. May I have one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. It is perfectly true that on the roads of France and Germany motor transportation was primarily used, but cavalry were used by Allenby on one occasion very successfully. If the Germans had had as many as four cavalry divisions they would have been able to follow up their success in one case where they failed to do it. If there is ever trouble on our borders in this country, cavalry will be necessary, because, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] knows, who represents the Laredo district along the Mexican border, you can not use motor transportation along the border except in rare cases.

I therefore shall present amendments to give to the National Guard the appropriations for which the War Department has asked. To give less will discourage the splendid work of organization of the National Guard. We may need them again some day. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVILIAN MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS.

For furnishing, at the expense of the United States, to warrant officers, enlisted men, and civilians attending training camps maintained under the provisions of section 47–d of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, uniforms, including altering, fitting, washing, and cleaning when necessary, subsistence, and transportation, or in lieu of such transportation and of subsistence for travel to and from camps, travel allowances at 5 cents per mile, as prescribed in said section 47–d, $1,800,000: Provided, That the funds herein appropriated shall not be used for the training of any person who is over 35 years of age: Provided further, That uniforms and other equipment or material furnished in accordance with law for use of civilian training camps shall be furnished from surplus or reserve stocks of the War Department without payment from this appropriation, except for actual expense incurred in the manufacture or issue, in so far as said stocks are in excess of actual requirements of the Regular Army for the fiscal year 1923: Provided further, That in no case shall the amount paid from this appropriation for uniforms, equipment, or material furnished in accordance with law for use at civilian military training camps from stocks under control of the War Department be in excess of the price current at the time the issue is made.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise simply to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question as to the age proviso—

Provided, That the funds herein appropriated shall not be used for the training of any person who is over 35 years of age.

Is there a provision of law at the present time containing that requirement?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the same age as was specified in the bill last year. The idea is to prevent older men from taking this training and thereby crowding out younger men who would be really available for military duty in case of war.

Mr. CRAGO. Was the age of 35 years specified in the last bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. It was.

Mr. CRAGO. Was there any criticism of that limitation?

Mr. ANTHONY. Only from men of 40, 45, and 50 who wanted to take the training, but who would be of limited military value in case they were called upon for active service in war.

Mr. CRAGO. I know quite a number of splendid, patriotic citizens who, like the gentleman from Kansas, are physically fit to take this training.

Mr. ANTHONY. "Treatment" is the correct expression.

Mr. CRAGO. I am wondering whether there is much criticism of that limitation or not.

Mr. ANTHONY. We have heard very little.

Mr. MANN. There are quite a number of young men in the House here who think they are boys, but nobody else does. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] is a great advocate of military training, and I hope he will note the liberality with which our committee have treated this question of military training. We have doubled the cash appropriation from $900,000 to $1,800,000, and in addition we provide them with about half a million dollars in supplies to be furnished without charge, and we are going to treble the number of civilians who will be able to take this training.

Mr. CRAGO. From my own limited experience in attempting to impart military training and discipline to men I believe you do not accomplish very much when you try it on persons over 35 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses incident to completion of the work of furnishing to adjutants general of States statements of service of all persons from those States who entered the military service during the war with Germany, including the employment of clerical and other help in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army, $100,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL: Page 14, line 8, after the word "States," insert "a history of the units."

Page 14, line 8, after the word "service," insert "and a record of deaths and burial places."

Page 14, line 9, after the word "who," strike out the word "entered" and insert "served in."

Line 12, after the word "Army," strike out "$100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$302,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the amendment that I have offered I would like to have the Clerk read the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read in the gentleman's time.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 24, 1921.

Hon. A. B. CUMMINS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to your recent personal call at this department in company with Col. Frank E. Lyman, secretary-director, Iowa War Roster Commission, Des Moines, Iowa, who desires (a) statements of service of those officers and enlisted men for whom no statements have been previously prepared; (b) the place of death of those who died while in the service during the World War in addition to the information on the statement of service cards; and (c) a tabulated statement showing a brief history of each unit that belonged to the Army during the World War; and in response to your request for an estimate of the probable cost of furnishing the information desired, I have the honor to inform you as follows:

(a) It is estimated that there are 132,000 officers and field clerks and 340,000 enlisted men who performed military service, but for whom no statements of service have been prepared to date. Based on past experiences and the best data now available, it is estimated that the cost of completing the statements of service in the 472,000 cases would be approximately $225,000.

(b) Based on the results of actual tests made by searching 175 cases for place of death, it is estimated that the cost of furnishing the place of death in all cases would be approximately $26,000. In this connection, I desire to invite your attention to the fact that had this part of the work been undertaken when the statements of service were prepared the cost would have been prohibitive, because the records from which the place of death could be secured were in many cases inaccessible, many of them not having reached the War Department at that time.

(c) It is estimated by the historical branch of the Army War College that the preparation of a tabulated statement showing a brief history of each unit that belonged to the Army, 8,500 in all, will cost between $51,000 and $100,000, it being impossible to determine at this time with any degree of certainty what the approximate cost would be. This estimate of cost does not include the cost of printing the organization histories after they shall have been compiled.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this amendment conforms with the appropriations you have been making for this service. However, these records have not been completed. The fact of the matter is that we gave them $2,000,000 to complete these records, which are 90 per cent completed to-day. What you have is of no value unless you complete the records. Anyone can understand that. These records to-day are liable to be destroyed by fire. They are down here in some place that might burn up. In that case the records of the individual soldiers of your State would not be available. If you give them only $100,000 to do the work that they say they will have to do, and that they say will cost $352,000, you will still be lacking some of these records.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Who has the records?

Mr. HULL. The Adjutant General. He had an organization working on these records a year ago. They had a little money left, but they did not have enough to complete them. You will notice that my amendment also includes a record of the place where the boy was killed, or where he died, and the place where he is buried.

This should be done, because no record is complete unless such data is included. It was originally intended to do this, but at the time of making the individual records they found it would be cheaper to wait until they had all the records of death compiled, and then they could put these records out and complete the service records with the details of the death and burial.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. MANN. Is that the purpose of the gentleman's amendment, to provide for a record of the place of burial, and so forth?

Mr. HULL. Well, it completes the records that are 90 per cent completed with the record of the place where the boy was killed and buried.

Mr. MANN. Have none of these records been furnished to the different adjutant generals?

Mr. HULL. Ninety per cent.

Mr. MANN. Bodies are just being brought home. Does the gentleman mean that that will have to be all done over again?

Mr. HULL. The place of death and burial will have to be made out, but the record has been completed on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. As shown in the letter of the Secretary of War, it will only take $26,000 to complete the record of the death and burial, and that could be done cheaper now than before.

Mr. MANN. How can it be done cheaper now than it could have been done before?

Mr. HULL. Because the data is compiled.

Mr. MANN. It will be compiled; what they want is to get the record of the data.

Mr. HULL. That is true, and a record without showing the place of death and burial is not complete.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it is complete or not, but that can be furnished hereafter. They would have to make out a new record on these bodies that have just been brought home for burial. I thought the letter the gentleman had read was not very intelligible; at least it was not to me.

Mr. HULL. It was intelligible to me, for this matter has been before us for two years. We have been trying to get the records made in this war, and we have not got them to-day. They tell us how much it will cost. My proposition is to give them the minimum amount of money—I have cut it from the maximum—and then say to them we want the records and you must furnish them complete.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. The ex-service men of Missouri are particularly interested in this, because they have recently been granted a bonus under an amendment to the constitution of the State, and the adjutant general of that State has been unable to pay out the bonus on account of not being able to get the records from the War Department. What I want to ask the gentleman is, How much of an additional appropriation will it take to enable them to furnish the information?

Mr. HULL. To furnish the information to all the States the minimum amount would be $302,000, as is shown by the letter which I have had read, and that includes the place of death and burial and a history of the units.

Mr. ROACH. That calls for additional data than what has been furnished. Will that delay furnishing this other information?

Mr. HULL. Not a minute, because it is all compiled in a separate place.

Mr. ROACH. How much was the appropriation heretofore for this work?

Mr. HULL. Two million dollars.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understand if the amendment is adopted the record will be completed to date and will be in the different States, so that whatever might happen to the records here in Washington the States will have a complete record.

Mr. HULL. Each State will have its own record, and that is what the State wants. They can not pay the bonus to-day because of the lack of these records upon which to make the payment.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. How long will it take to furnish it?

Mr. HULL. Six months.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. The adjutant general of the State of Illinois has stated to me, and I presume to my colleague, that inasmuch as Illinois is going to vote on a $55,000,000 bonus next election these records are very essential for them to have, and they are most interested in the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Iowa. But is it not a fact that a great portion of the $2,000,000 appropriated by Congress has been frittered away on filing and recording, simple questionnaires to men who were not in the service at all, and that the money if properly used would have been sufficient for the work which they now want done, if not wasted in this manner?

Mr. HULL. I think that is not true. As far as I know, it is not true. I think they performed a wonderful service. The gentleman wants to remember that in order to complete the record they had some 20,000,000 records to go over. Now I want to appeal to Members of the House not to allow the amount to be cut down for the sake of economy. Let us give them the money they ask to complete these records.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A point of order was reserved on the amendment by the gentleman from Wisconsin. I would like to know if it is his purpose to press it?

Mr. STAFFORD. It certainly is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I regard this as an important proposition to all of us. If we are going to have just a moot discussion of the merits of the matter, then it is a waste of time. It seems to me that the point of order should be disposed of. I call for the regular order in order that we may find out whether we are going to vote upon the question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is not authorized by existing law and is in violation of that rule which inhibits legislation in an appropriation bill. I call the Chair's attention to the fact that the authorization for this activity is found in the Army appropriation act for the year 1921. The Chair will find that the appropriation there made was for the purpose of authorizing the compilation of these records containing the statements of the service "of all persons from those States that entered the military service during the war with Germany." Permit me to read a part of the paragraph referred to:

Including the employment of the necessary clerical and other help for duty in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army in connection with the arrangement, operation, and maintenance of the files of those records, and for the employment of clerical help required to furnish—to the adjutant generals of the several States statements of service of all persons from those States who entered the military service during the war with Germany.

And here is the important part—

Later on there is the use of the same language—for all expenses, including the employment of clerical and other help in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army necessary for the completion and preservation of the selective service records and the completion of the work of furnishing statements of service to the adjutant generals of the States.

What is sought by the gentleman from Iowa? He wants, in addition to the statements of service, a history of the units to be furnished to the adjutant generals of the States, and in addition thereto he wants a record of the deaths and the burial places.

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman object to furnishing the place where a man died? That is the supreme service that he rendered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we gave the gentleman from Iowa a hearing before our subcommittee, and although this item was not recommended by the War Department, we carried this item of $100,000. That is the judgment of the subcommittee.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a legal question?

Mr. STAFFORD. In just a minute. Getting back to the question before the committee, Mr. Chairman, and that is the point of order, there is no authorization providing for the history of the units of these respective Army services in the World War.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question on the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I promised to yield first to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman read the statute which authorizes the furnishing of the statements of the service. Would not that include how that service was terminated, either by honorable discharge or by death?

Mr. STAFFORD. It would not include a history of the units.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am not inquiring about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I well remember replying to the remark of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], when this was originally proposed by the legislative subcommittee. The subcommittee, as I did, favored an appropriation that would bring these records of service to completion and as quickly as possible to the adjutant generals of the States, but our subcommittee did not consider it advisable, because of the delay that would be entailed, to require of The Adjutant General the furnishing of the record of deaths and the burial places. They are not in possession of that information in many instances. There is being prepared under the supervision of the Medical Corps a history of the activities of the various units in the World War.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman contend that giving the date and the place of the death of the soldier in the service is not included in the statute under the language "statement of service"?

Mr. MANN. That is a provision carried in the present bill. If it includes it, it is included.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is chiefly what my colleague wants.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. The gentleman's colleague wants to have a history of the units.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am not speaking about that now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am speaking of that, particularly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. As a matter of fact, the only new thing in the proposed amendment is that the department shall write this history of the war. The committee is providing for practically everything that the gentleman from Iowa proposes. This history of the war is a new proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Absolutely new.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Under existing law and under the paragraph here carrying the appropriation, is The Adjutant General authorized to furnish the date of the death and the place of the burial of the soldier?

Mr. MANN. If he has it; but under the gentleman's proposed amendment he has to furnish it or wait until he gets it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the information is not available, he can not furnish it, but if such information is available it should be furnished.

Mr. MANN. He would have to wait for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is why we do not want to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. I do not think there can be any question but that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa is not in order under the authorization heretofore carried for this particular work.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard?

Mr. HULL. Certainly. As I understand it, the gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws the point of order on the record of the death and the burial?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not withdraw anything. I make the point of order for the reason stated, and leave it to the Chair to make the decision.

Mr. HULL. Then the gentleman still contends that that is not a part of the service record?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have made my argument.

Mr. HULL. Certainly, the Chair will understand that the record of a man's death and the place he is buried is a part of the service record.

The history of the unit is also necessary to complete the record of a boy who served in this unit. You can not write a history of this war unless you have a record of the unit. It is in the nature of a service record, and was so considered in the Civil War. Every State has written a history and they have that data from the Adjutant General of the United States——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If these things which are covered by the gentleman's amendment are part of the regular statement of service, what did he offer his amendment for?

Mr. HULL. Simply because I want the matter cleared up. I want it to conform with the Secretary's letter. I want the amount put in there just as they state they would have it, and I want them to furnish a record——

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about the amount. The Secretary of War, I judge from the gentleman's statement and the letter, does not consider the language, statement of service, in the way the gentleman does. He thinks he can not do that. Is that the case?

Mr. HULL. Yes; but I want them to understand what they are expected to furnish.

Mr. MANN. Here is the law which says they shall furnish a statement of service. If that includes all the things, what is the use of adding to it? If they are not included in this language, I take it that the amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HULL. To make a matter clear and well defined does not subject it to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I do not know the merits of it at all.

Mr. HULL. It is a great deal better to have it clear and know exactly what you are asking for. I think everything I have asked for is a statement of the service of the soldier.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. If I understand the gentlemen from Iowa it is that while it might possibly be covered he wants it specifically included, so that there will be no chance to exclude it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What part of the increased appropriation the gentleman asks will be required to comply with the terms "history of the unit"?

Mr. HULL. $100,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And if it is eliminated from the amendment, it would still leave an increased appropriation of $102,000?

Mr. HULL. $202,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; $102,000 if that is eliminated.

Mr. HULL. $202,000, including the $100,000 already in the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the gentleman, in the event the Chair sustains the point of order, would reoffer the amendment with that feature eliminated, so that we may have an opportunity of increasing the appropriation for the individual records of the men.

Mr. HULL. I can not imagine the point of order being sustained, but if it is I will reoffer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair has not before him the statute, but he gathered from the reading of the statute by the gentleman from Wisconsin that the activities provided for in this paragraph are confined to the furnishing of statements of service. No mention is made either of a history of units or records of deaths and burial places. The gentleman from Iowa has increased the amount provided for in this paragraph in order to include history of units and records of deaths and burial places, which are not in the law. Therefore it seems to the Chair perfectly plain that this is new legislation, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. Strike out "$100,000" and insert "$202,000" at the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 12, strike out "$100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$202,000."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, neither the War Department nor the Bureau of the Budget asked any item for this purpose. As the gentleman from Iowa has correctly stated, the work of preparing the service records is 90 per cent complete. The War Department discontinued the work and money has been turned back unused from appropriations heretofore made because of the delay which would be involved in securing the data which the gentleman from Iowa wants—the place of death and the place of burial of the soldier. It is obviously impossible to bring a record of that kind completely up to date, and the department takes the position in this letter from Secretary of War Weeks——

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. In a moment. In which he stated that if the attempt is made to furnish that information it will delay the payment of the bonus. I presume he means in many of the States which have passed laws making these payments to their soldiers. The department believes they have sufficient records upon which to base the bonus payment. Now, the committee has no objection in the world to the securing of this data and a completion of the records of the soldiers for the States. In fact, the committee was glad to grant the request of the gentleman from Iowa that we provide payment in this bill for this purpose, and we have an item of $100,000 for the completion of these records.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. As a matter of fact, there was no item included in the bill at all as it came to us, and on the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa the committee thought $100,000 would complete these original records and therefore give the information which was needed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. McPHERSON. I would just like to ask the chairman if the statements of service that have been furnished—90 per cent—show the date of death, without regard to the place, of each soldier?

Mr. ANTHONY. My understanding is those statements only show this where they had the information.

Mr. McPHERSON. They certainly have a list of all the soldiers who were killed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Men are dying every day.

Mr. McPHERSON. I mean those that were killed during the war.

Mr. ANTHONY. They undoubtedly have most of those. Perhaps their own records are not complete on that point. But I want the House to understand that it is the purpose of the committee to furnish money enough to carry on this work and to furnish information to the adjutant generals of the States. The committee has inserted $100,000 for that purpose, and it is the hope of the committee that, with the reduction in the size of the Army that this bill attempts, there will be enough slack in The Adjutant General's Department, in addition to the $100,000 and the clerks we provide for here, to complete this work. For instance, the present force of The Adjutant General's office is 1,314. We are providing next year for a total force of 908, and we believe with the provision we have made for clerical and subclerical help in the office of The Adjutant General, with this $100,000, they will be enabled to complete these records, or almost complete them, and if the appropriation we make does not do it, the committee will provide the necessary money.

Mr. HULL. If that is the way you are going to do it, you will be in the position you are in now, where The Adjutant General says you could have completed them if you had appropriated the money, and he will be permitted to do it. Now, it will cost $225,000, according to their own statement.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me remind the gentleman that The Adjutant General is turning money back into the Treasury for this purpose.

Mr. HULL. And he will destroy his organization.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are not to blame for that. We want to set him to work again on this, and if it needs more money than the $100,000 that we provide the committee will furnish it.

Mr. HULL. It will take a year's time to do that.

Mr. ANTHONY. We want the States to have this information as much as does the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I regard this as a very important proposition, not only for the present but for the future records of the service men of the different States. And if I was satisfied that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] was entirely accurate in his statement that the War Department had sufficient funds now for the purpose of furnishing completed records to the adjutants general of the States of every service man from their States, I would have nothing further to say. Does the gentleman assert to us that this appropriation of $100,000 carried in this bill will be sufficient to provide clerical assistance, and so forth, for the purpose of furnishing to the adjutants general of the States, for State use, a complete record of all the State troops—472,000 cases, as referred to here by the Secretary of War?

Mr. ANTHONY. In the opinion of the committee it is pure guesswork. We thought we would furnish sufficient money to start the work.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The chairman of the committee has before him the estimate of the Secretary of War.

Mr. ANTHONY. Estimates do not amount to anything.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know how we are going to arrive at the amount necessary. But what I want to do—and I am sure I reflect the sentiment of the majority of the committee—inasmuch as this is a matter of such importance to the States, is to appropriate now, without further delay, the money sufficient to carry on this work to speedy and expeditious conclusion, without speculating as to the amount. If you appropriate too much for it, I presume they might spend it extravagantly. And my position is based on the proposition that the amendment of the gentleman will prevail before this committee.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just stated that it was the fault of Congress. It was no fault of anyone.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not say that.

Mr. MANN. There has been no lack of appropriation so far, and there has been no request for an appropriation for the next year.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand that this is tantamount to a statement as to the necessity for it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama, like everybody else in the House, knows that the request comes in the form of an estimate. For that matter, the departments are forbidden under the rules of the House to send a letter to a committee of the House. I do not know whether they violated that rule or not. Probably they did. Now, the Committee on Appropriations proposes to appropriate $100,000, with the statement that if that is not sufficient they will furnish more just as soon as it is necessary. Ought that not to be sufficient?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will state very frankly to the gentleman from Illinois that I want to be sure that a sufficient amount will be appropriated, if this is not sufficient, to see that this work is finished, so that we may have the job behind us, because I am sure the gentleman from Illinois appreciates the tremendous importance of having preserved and in the hands of the State officials the records of the troops of our States.

Mr. MANN. Not only that, but they are going to vote on the proposition of a State bonus this year, and they want to get these records. If the bonus is to be provided, the records are essential. Now, the War Department held that—and I am not criticizing it; I do not know—that as to the furnishing of the last of these records they have not been able to do it because they did not have certain information which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] wants them to furnish. So they stopped making up the records. Now, we want to get the records as far as they have them. My State and, I think, other States are in the same position. If the records come in later, they can furnish those, but now they want the records they have got.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have additional time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman mean to assert that The Adjutant General's office is still behind in the compilation of this essential data as to the service records of the men who were engaged in the service three years ago?

Mr. MANN. When it comes to including the death and burial of the men those records are still behind, so I am told.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They could very well furnish, then, the record, eliminating that phase of it.

Mr. MANN. That is what we want to have them do, to furnish the record they have.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the Secretary says in this letter that more money than you appropriate will be required for that purpose.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. They did not ask for any. That is all I can say.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will yield to the gentleman to ask a question.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Do I understand from the gentleman from Illinois that the War Department was proceeding on the theory in making up this record that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is proceeding upon in his amendment, and that they were making these records as to the place of death and burial?

Mr. MANN. I assume—and it is an assumption on my part—that the War Department was furnishing a record of all the information it had, including the death and burial and the burial place, if they have it?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Then the War Department was proceeding under the law as written, as if the language of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa had been written into it?

Mr. MANN. No. The language that the gentleman from Iowa proposes to write into it would require them to wait until they had all that information. We want the information that they have got.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Then why did they quit making up these records?

Mr. MANN. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I have not the floor. I suppose the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has the floor.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; but I presume my two minutes have expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Then I will ask for an extension.

Mr. SISSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not know that the time of the gentleman from Alabama had expired when I rose. I will say to the members of the committee that many millions of dollars have been spent in the preparation of these service records.

Mr. MADDEN. Three and one-half million dollars.

Mr. SISSON. And these records are more complete now than were the records of the Civil War 15 or 20 years after the close of the Civil War. This is the most complete record ever made, so your committee is informed, and the committee, of which I am a member, has had this whole matter in charge.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I can not yield; I can not yield to anyone just now. In our investigation we were assured that the information which they now have can be given to the States. We feel that this $100,000 that we give them will be enough to complete the records which the States need. They themselves made no estimate originally about the matter. This matter was called to the attention of the War Department, I presume, by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]. He then came before our committee. No estimate was before us. We took up the matter and decided that for the service records needed by the States $100,000 would do the work.

This $100,000 is not to be expended in writing the history of a certain company, or a certain unit, or a certain regiment. If you want to depart on that new activity, no one knows just exactly where that may end. But we have all the information that may be needed for private individuals and States to write any sort of history they want.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I am not yielding yet. But I am not willing to embark upon this new activity at this time, and the committee felt that we were liberal in providing $100,000. I suggested to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that in making this $100,000 immediately available, that was subject to a point of order, but in order that they might expend this $100,000 at once, so as to give these gentlemen the service record of these soldiers in the States, the committee took chances on making it immediately available, and recommended the appropriation of the amount of money that we thought was necessary, and there is not a gentleman on this floor who can come any nearer determining the amount of money needed than the committee. There is not a member of this subcommittee who is not just as much in favor of furnishing a complete record to these States as any other Member on this floor, but we do not want to squander money unnecessarily.

Mr. LAYTON. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield now to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. I knew you would, after awhile. The gentleman from Mississippi is the gentleman who can give me the information I am after.

Mr. SISSON. What is the question, please?

Mr. LAYTON. What do you mean by 90 per cent of these records being completed?

Mr. SISSON. As a matter of fact, The Adjutant General informed us—not at this hearing, but at a former hearing—that they were all practically complete, and I know that a great deal of money has been turned back into the Treasury. More was appropriated than was necessary. Now, I am not able to explain to the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. As to the 90 per cent, I do not know exactly what that means. The records of certain individual soldiers might be missing. I do not know how long it will take to dig up all those items, after this record of every soldier should have been completed. The Adjutant General was frank enough to tell use that in the case of the death of many soldiers they will never be able to tell where they died, because in war time, as he explained, a man might be wounded in a certain place on the field and be taken at once to a neighboring hospital, and from that hospital he might be transferred to another hospital, and the information is gone, and forever gone, as to where the man was wounded, and unless he dies in a hospital it may be difficult to determine where the man died.

Mr. LAYTON. Have any of the States been furnished, up to this time, with a complete record?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a friendly question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I understand, in fact I knew before I got out of the service, that they had a historical section of the General Staff working over here at the War College to write the history of this war?

Mr. SISSON. That is true; and they have got that unit. Let us let them alone. They are working, and we are going to let them continue. Why, in the name of God, do you want to spend $100,000 more than is needed?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I do not want to spend it; but I want to ask the gentleman if he agrees with the chairman of the committee that if this should prove not to be enough money he would be willing to give more?

Mr. SISSON. Why, it is the absolutely unanimous vote of the committee. There was not a single objection in the committee. The only question that interested us was to give them enough money and not give them too much. We would rather give them a little too much than to have them cut short. We have done the best we could with all the information and light we had before us to give them every penny that was necessary to complete these records. I do not believe there is a Member of Congress who does not want that done, but we do not want to spend $100,000 unnecessarily, because if you give $100,000 to The Adjutant General it is likely to be expended somehow.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, it is three years since the war closed. They have not got the record complete, and that is partly due to the fact that we have been haggling with the War Department as to how much it would cost to complete them.

Mr. SISSON. That is not correct. There has been no haggling about it.

Mr. HULL. You are haggling now. The War Department have made an estimate of the cost. They have told you how much it will cost, and they have tested it. I want to have these records completed, and if you give them the amount of money that is stated in my amendment you will have your records complete. If you give them half that amount, you will not have them complete a year from now and you will still be debating the question as to how to get these records complete. It is distinctly up to you gentlemen who represent these States that had your boys in this war. Do you want to complete the records? If you do, you will give them the money I have asked for, because that is what the War Department says is the very least that they can do it for. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois). Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 53, noes 20.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

Salaries: Chief clerk and solicitor, $2,500; patent expert, $3,600; clerks—2 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 5 of class 2, 20 of class 1, 2 at $1,000 each; messenger, $840; 3 assistant messengers at $720 each; 4 charwomen at $240 each; in all, $53,060.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question. I notice a provision for a patent expert at a salary of $3,600 in the appropriation for the Judge Advocate General. Just what are the duties of this patent expert?

Mr. ANTHONY. During the war, of course the Government had to make use of articles which were patented. There was no time to straighten out the proper amount to be paid under those patents, and any number of claims have been filed since the war. The legal department of the Government are required to investigate them very carefully. They find they must have a man skilled in patent matters in order to enable them to have any judgment whatever in passing upon these claims.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So it is something that is really chargeable to the expenses of the war?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; it is necessary. There is a patent expert in the office of the Judge Advocate, and not only that, but in the office of the Chief of the Air Service they have a patent expert, and in the Ordnance Department also they have a patent expert to pass upon these matters.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I desire to proceed out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am aware that the committee has agreed to postpone the consideration of the pay of the Army items until next week; but it may be of some interest to a few members of the committee at least if I put into the RECORD to-day in advance of the discussion certain authorities that I have collected with relation to the constitutional propriety of the provision at the bottom of page 22 and the top of page 23 purporting to limit the number of men who may be retained in our overseas possessions for the next fiscal year.

Can the Congress, under the guise of a limitation on an appropriation act, constitutionally compel the President to make geographical distribution of the United States Army according to the specifications of the Congress?

H. R. 10871 (the Army appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923) carries on page 22 the following language:

No part of the appropriations made herein for pay of the Army shall be used, except in time of emergency, for the payment of troops garrisoned in China, or for payment of more than 500 officers and enlisted men on the Continent of Europe; nor shall such appropriations be used, except in time of emergency, for the payment of more than 5,000 enlisted men in the Panama Canal Zone, or more than 5,000 enlisted men in the Hawaiian Islands.

The President of the United States is, of course, Commander in Chief of the Armies and the Navies of the United States. If the Congress can validly and constitutionally tell him that he may not maintain more than 5,000 troops in Hawaii or Panama, it may, of course, with equal validity and constitutionality tell him that he may maintain only a fixed number upon the Texas border or upon the Great Lakes. It follows, then, that if the prohibition just quoted is to be upheld, Congress must have the right to indicate just how many troops may be maintained in a given fort or garrison anywhere in the United States at a given time.

But the Constitution says that "the President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States." If Congress can in fact regulate the movements of troops and their location from time to time in such detail as it sees fit, what is left of the President's constitutional authority over the armies? Clearly, it is only a shadow and not the substance. The defenders of the foregoing limitation in the Army bill call attention to the fact, first, that the United States is at peace, and, second, that the limitation expressly excepts emergencies. But I reply that the President is Commander in Chief of the Army both in war and in peace, and both when there is an emergency and when there is no emergency. If the limitation is valid now it would be valid in war time. Yet I doubt if even the hardiest of the advocates of the language of the bill would care to assert that Congress during the Civil War could have told President Lincoln when and where and how to send his troops to accomplish most speedily and effectively the capture of Richmond.

The proponents of the language rely, of course, upon the authority given in the Constitution to Congress—

To raise and support armies * * *; to provide and maintain a Navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

If the President were not elsewhere in the Constitution expressly made Commander in Chief, naturally enough the language just quoted would have lent color to this argument. But we must undertake to reconcile the two passages from the Constitution. The President could in no true sense of the word be Commander in Chief if he could not control the comings and goings and the operations of the armies. On the other hand, Congress can perfectly well raise and support an Army and make rules for its government and regulation which will in no way conflict with the power elsewhere granted the President. This it has done both in war and in peace ever since the foundation of the Government. Any careful consideration of the evident purpose of the Constitution in this regard will, I think, convince the student that Congress was not intended to have, and does not have, power to control the detailed movements of the armies.

This power is inherently in the President as Commander in Chief.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that it is not within the power of Congress to say whether they will appropriate for more than a given number of men at a certain place?

Mr. ROGERS. There is no question, of course, that the Congress can say whether the Army shall be 200,000 men or 100,000 men, or that there shall be no Army at all; but I contend that under the Constitution and under the authorities which I shall print in the RECORD Congress has no right whatever to tell the President that he may have only so many troops at a given place at a given time.

Mr. MADDEN. We could say that he shall not have any troops at all there.

Mr. ROGERS. Congress can say that there shall be no Army, but Congress has not the right to say that such Army as there is shall be geographically distributed as it pleases. That is a military function and belongs exclusively to the jurisdiction of the Commander in Chief.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the people of the United States, as represented by the legislative branch of the Government, are powerless to regulate the conduct of the Government in any way, I assume, according to the gentleman's argument?

Mr. ROGERS. So long as the Constitution provides that the President of the United States—who, like Congress, is the agent and servant of the people of the United States—shall be the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, Congress can not tell the President where he shall allocate the troops at a given time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In other words, Congress can deny to the Government any army at all, but if Congress provides an army it is up to the President as Commander in Chief of the Army to place that Army where he sees fit.

Mr. ROGERS. That is precisely my view and my contention.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. I find little judicial interpretation which throws light upon the question. Perhaps this is because Congress has been very loath to make even the attempt to dictate as to how the President should to the best national advantage locate the several portions of our land forces. In Chief Justice Chase's opinion in the Milligan case (4 Wall., 2, p. 139) it is said that the power of Congress extends to all legislation essential to the prosecution of war vigorously and successfully—except such as interferes with the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns. That power and duty belong to the President as Commander in Chief. * * * Congress can not direct the conduct of campaigns.

Although this language appears in a dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice and three other justices, it has been frequently quoted, and always with approval, and nothing in the majority opinion is in conflict with the language.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for an interpolation?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, indeed.

Mr. MADDEN. Congress is not endeavoring in this appropriation, to which the gentleman refers, to manage or conduct the campaign. Congress is simply asserting its right, so far as its recommendation goes, to say how many troops there shall be at a certain place. It does not take away the right of the President to conduct the troops and manage them, direct them as to movement, or anything of that sort.

Mr. ROGERS. My contention is that an essential and inherent part of the conduct of a campaign is the location of troops according to the behests of the Commander in Chief. [Applause.]

In Watson on the Constitution, volume 2, page 914, it is said in this connection—

Congress can legislate relative to the number of the Army and the Navy, the compensation of the officers and men, and the term of their service, as well as many other matters, but command of the Army and Navy is invested in the President, and Congress can neither command them or take that power from the President. The power is vested in the President to dispose of or arrange the component parts of the Army and Navy at his pleasure. * * * While Congress can make rules for the Army and Navy, it can not interfere with the President's power as commander of such forces. The line between the exercise of his power as commander and that of Congress is plain, and neither can rightfully or legally invade the other.

In a well-considered Court of Claims case (Swaim v. United States, 28 Ct. Cls. Repts. 173, p. 221) the obviously sound position is taken that "Congress can not in the disguise of 'rules for the government' of the Army impair the authority of the President as Commander in Chief." Congress may, it is there truly said, increase the Army or reduce the Army or abolish it altogether, but so long as we have a military force Congress can not take away from the President supreme command.

Another authoritative text writer (Willoughby on the Constitution, vol. 2, sec. 713) draws precisely the same distinction as that made by Chief Justice Chase and by Judge Watson:

Through or under his (the President's) orders, therefore, all military operations in time of peace, as well as of war, are conducted. He has within his control the disposition of troops, the direction of vessels of war, and the planning and execution of campaigns. With Congress, however, lies the authority to lay down the rules governing the organization and maintenance of the military forces, the determination of their number, the fixing of the manner in which they shall be armed and equipped, the establishment of forts, hospitals, arsenals, etc., and of course the voting of appropriations for all military purposes.

In another Court of Claims case (24 Court of Claims Cases, 230, affirmed by U. S. Supreme Court, 133 U. S., 299) it is said that the power of command and control which the framers of the Constitution placed in the hands of the President is vested in him with only two restrictions—first, that Congress shall have the power already noted of making rules for the government and regulation of the forces, and, second, that the appointment of Army officers shall be subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. The same doctrine is laid down in Fifth Corpus Juris, 309, and in Tenth Opinions of the Attorney General, 462. See also Davis' Military Law, Third Edition, 323.

From the foregoing, both as a matter of principle and of such authority as is available, the limitation in the present bill seems constitutionally indefensible.

In this connection it is interesting to note the testimony of Secretary Weeks when he appeared before the Committee on Appropriations upon this very bill on the 20th of last month. He said (pp. 1472-1473 of hearings):

Of course, Congress does not order the maintaining of a definite number of troops in any one place, because Congress can not do it. * * * Of course, Congress can not direct where the troops are to serve. * * * I want to express the opinion it would be a mighty bad thing for Congress to do it, even if it had the power.

Gen. Harbord (p. 1460 of hearings), one of the ablest and most respected Army officers we have, said, referring to this very thing:

I think if you put that limitation in there you will infringe upon the constitutional prerogative of the Commander in Chief—the President.

In my judgment the President of the United States would feel it to be his duty—and I think it would in fact be his duty—to veto any bill containing the language in question on the grounds that it was an unconstitutional attempt by Congress to limit his constitutional rights, powers, and duties. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who quoted some distinguished jurists as to the constitutional power of Congress in respect to the disposition of troops placed at the disposal of the President, I wish to say I do not think that even the jurists whose opinions have been cited would say that it is not within the power of Congress to provide that no part of an appropriation made for the maintenance of an Army shall be expended except under conditions laid down by the Congress. The conditions laid down in this case provide that the appropriation is to be made for the maintenance of 500 troops in Europe. If I had my way there would not be one soldier left in Europe. [Applause.] I think the time has come when they ought to be back here. Five hundred can do no good there except to make a draft against the Treasury.

I wish further to say that we have had these troops over there now since the close of the war, and there are $241,000,000 due to the American Government that nobody over there seems to want to pay.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman, of course, is discussing the merits of the question, with which I am inclined to agree with him, but I call attention to the fact that in the hearings the Secretary of War says the plan of the War Department was to bring back every one of the troops except a few caring for the graves of American soldiers by the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to help the Secretary of War to carry out his intention. I want the American people to understand that Congress is in favor of bringing these men back and letting them serve on American soil, and we want the people of Europe to know, as far as we can, that we do not propose to let them tell us whether we are to collect the $241,000,000 or not.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The Supreme Court has not decided the question, but if the contention of the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct, I suppose Congress would not be able to recall the troops from Europe by enacting a statute to that effect.

Mr. MADDEN. It would not.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If, again, the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct, the President, even though Congress should enact a statute forbidding it, would have the discretion to send the entire Army to Europe, would he not?

Mr. MADDEN. He would. Under the rules and precedents of the Congress from the foundation of the Government down, the limitations placed on this bill to which the gentleman from Massachusetts calls attention are in order. We have not violated the rules of the House, the laws of the land, or the Constitution of the United States. We have done just what we thought we ought to do, what we had the power to do, what it is within the discretion of Congress to do, and what the people of the United States want us to do, limit the expenses of the Government for the maintenance of the Army. Whatever Army we have, let us have them within the confines of continental United States and quit mixing in the entangling alliances over there. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, in response to the call of Mayor James L. Key, of Atlanta, there was held in that great metropolis of the Southeast last Sunday afternoon a big mass meeting, at which there assembled fully 3,000 people. Addresses were made by former Gov. O'Neal, of Alabama, and several prominent Georgians. Resolutions were passed at that meeting dealing with a great national asset, the development of which we believe will do much to solve the question of unemployment and be a permanent boon to the agricultural interests of the entire country. In consonance with these resolutions which I wish to have read, there are others from patriotic clubs and workingmen's associations which I wish to include. The people of my section believe that a great commercial and agricultural problem of the future is wrapped up in the question presented in the resolutions, which I shall ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable President and Congress of the United States:

We, citizens of Atlanta and Georgia, in mass meeting assembled at City Auditorium, Atlanta, Sunday, March 12, with full confidence in both the justice and wisdom of our President and Congress, do hereby declare:

That while the entire Muscle Shoals stretch of the Tennessee River lies within the borders of our sister State, Alabama, the right to control and regulate the river in the interest of the Nation's commerce has been ceded by the State of Alabama to the Federal Government. We recognize the fact that Muscle Shoals is the property of the Nation, belonging alike to the people of all the States in the Union, and while we claim no greater right than any other State to say what shall be done with Muscle Shoals, we believe that we but exercise the guaranties of the Federal Constitution when we petition Congress that this great national asset be not employed by the Government as an instrumentality for fastening upon us and the future generations the yoke of an oppressive and burdensome monopoly.

We hold that it would be a travesty on legislation if after many years of congressional consideration of how best to conserve the power in our navigable streams for the benefit of all the people, and how most surely to preserve them from being used as instruments of monopoly, the Nation's greater water power should be handed over to the Alabama Power Co. under the national water power act; and we further hold that it would be the quintessence of legislative folly for the Government, after 10 years of investigation as to how best to free the United States from its dependence upon a foreign power for its supply of nitrogen for explosives in the event of war, and after spending millions of dollars in the construction of the greatest nitrogen fixation plant in the world, to turn over the only power capable of successfully operating the nitrate plant to a corporation owned and controlled by foreigners.

We indorse the sentiment "America first," and Muscle Shoals first for Americans and above all for American farmers. Henry Ford is a typical American, who by his genius has done more for country people and country life than any other man of his time. A man who has the trust and confidence of the great masses of the common people, as evidenced by the resolutions adopted by every gathering of plain, ordinary Americans, including the representatives of 4,000,000 farmers, who have given voice to their sentiments in regard to his proposal for the development of Muscle Shoals.

We believe the issue in Congress is clearly drawn. It is a contest between the people and the interests which control the people's fertilizer and power resources.

On behalf of the army of the unemployed, in the interest of the great body of plain American citizens, in the name of millions of perplexed and burdened farmers, we beg our President and the Congress of the United States and its committees to promptly accept the offer of Henry Ford.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UPSHAW. In a moment. Allow me to add that without disparagement to other pending offers, I believe it is worth a great deal to contemplate the statement of Charles S. Burrett, the wise president of the National Farmers' Union, who said to-day that he believed that 98 per cent of the people of the South, if not the entire Nation, have such faith in Henry Ford's honesty and outstanding business ability that they are in favor of accepting his offer. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I would like to know if at this mass meeting, where they expressed a vote of confidence in the President and indorsed these resolutions, they also included a promise of political support for him in the next presidential election if he be nominated? [Laughter.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Of course, the gentleman from New York asks that question in playful spirit, but this is a great question of national commercial importance, upon which President Harding and Congress will be too patriotic to be influenced by sectional considerations or lines of political cleavage.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is it the conception of the gentleman from New York that the President will do these things only in consideration of political support? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by including herewith some strong individual letters and telegrams and petitions from other patriotic bodies in my State.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UPSHAW. The following additional resolutions, letters, and telegrams show the overwhelming sentiment of the people of my section—their faith in Henry Ford's humanitarian purposes and proven commercial generalship, which they are anxious to see dedicated to the largest possible development of the South and the Nation:

ATLANTA, GA., February 21, 1922.

Hon. WILLIAM UPSHAW,

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the Atlanta Union Label League held on the 18th of January last, I was instructed to address an appeal to you in behalf of Mr. Henry Ford's offer to take over the Government nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals, Ala., and to respectfully request that you use your good offices and influence in the Congress of the United States in securing the contract for Mr. Ford.

The masses of the people throughout the State of Georgia realize that the Ford offer, if accepted by the Government, will do more toward relieving the southern farmer and the unemployment situation in the South than will any other scheme yet offered; also the United States Government will be relieved of the large expenditure in money necessary to complete and operate these plants, which will be a great saving to the people in taxes.

With very best wishes, I am, very truly, yours,

T. J. BOGGS,
Secretary-Treasurer Atlanta Union Label League.

MUSCLE SHOALS DEVELOPMENT.

Hon. WILLIAM D. UPSHAW,
United States Congressman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are very much interested in the negotiations being carried on between Mr. Henry Ford and the War Department, and hope they will be carried to a successful conclusion.

If not inconsistent, we respectfully urge you to use your influence with the Secretary of War and Congress to see that these negotiations are carried to a successful conclusion.

We believe that Mr. Henry Ford with his splendid initiative and successful organization can successfully develop the Muscle Shoals project to the benefit of the entire South.

Respectfully submitted.

ATLANTA, GA., November 19, 1921.

Hon. W. D. UPSHAW,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Knowing that the operation of the Muscle Shoals plant would mean the greatest blessing that could possibly be bestowed the South, as it would make available for southern farms, which are the most productive in the United States, an ample supply of fertilizer at a materially reduced cost, and at a time when the southern farmer is more depressed and discouraged than he has been in recent years; and whereas the offer made by Henry Ford is the only reasonable offer made by a responsible bidder, we urge upon the Secretary of War and Congress the immediate acceptance of Mr. Ford's offer, and we urge you to exert all your influence and power to this end.

We assure you we will only be too glad to reciprocate should the opportunity present itself, and if we can be of further assistance to you in the furtherance of your efforts, command us.

Yours, truly,

BELL BROS.

CITY OF ATLANTA,
Office of the Mayor, March 6, 1922.

Hon. W. D. UPSHAW,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We are indebted to you for your favor of March 2, in which you inclose copy of Mr. Ford's proposal for the purchase of Muscle Shoals, and the self-explanatory letter of Mr. E. G. Liebold, Mr. Ford's secretary.

Subsequent to the receipt of this information a meeting of representative citizens was called in the mayor's office, at which time the matter was discussed with the view of organizing the people of the city and State for the purpose of crystallizing sentiment in favor of the proposal. At this meeting, Saturday, March 5, it was decided to call the committee of seven, which was appointed, for Saturday afternoon, at which time details were arranged for a mass meeting in the City Auditorium Sunday afternoon, March 12.

Former Gov. O'Neal, of Alabama, will be invited to address the mass meeting. Yourself and other distinguished leaders will be invited also, and it is hoped that affairs will permit your attendance.

Thanking you for your timely and invaluable assistance, I am,

Yours, very truly,

WALKER T. LEE, Secretary.

ATLANTA, GA., November 25, 1921.

Hon. W. D. UPSHAW,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are interested in the disposition of the Muscle Shoals Dam.

We do not know anything about the merits or demerits of Mr. Ford's proposition to the Government, but we do know that Mr. Ford has a reputation of being able to bring things to pass. He has made certain promises to the farmer if he is successful in acquiring this property, and, so far as we know, he keeps faith with the public.

We would like very much to see Mr. Ford get this property, and we hope you feel the same way and will do what you can in that respect.

Yours, truly,

FARMERS' BANK OF PELHAM,
Pelham, Ga., November 22, 1921.

HON. W. D. UPSHAW, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am taking the liberty of writing you in regard to Mr. Henry Ford's offer to the Government for the property and plants at Muscle Shoals. While, of course, we are not familiar with the terms of his offer, at the same time from all accounts it is the best offer that has been made. Judging Mr. Ford by the success he has made with his other ventures, we believe he would make a success out of it which would enure to the benefit of the farmers of the South, who are now all practically bankrupt, due to the sudden decline in prices of all farm products.

With cordial good wishes, I am,

Yours, truly,

B. U. CURRY, Vice President.

ATLANTA, GA., November 25, 1921.

Hon. W. D. UPSHAW,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have been studying the Muscle Shoals situation considerably and have come to the conclusion that Henry Ford is the logical man to handle this property, and that his offer should be accepted, as it seems to be the only reasonable offer made by a responsible bidder.

This proposition of Mr. Ford's should result in much good to the country, as well as to the South in particular, and we trust that when the matter comes up for attention that you will act favorably on this proposition.

Thanking you in advance for giving this matter your usual careful consideration, we are,

Sincerely, yours,

PHONOGRAPHS (INC.),

FAIRBURN, GA., February 8, 1922.

Hon. W. D. UPSHAW.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you to tell you that I want you to vote for the acceptance of the Ford proposal of Muscle Shoals nitrate plant.

I have read everything I could see in all the newspapers and I have studied this thing from the farmers' standpoint, and if this is not the greatest thing that has ever been offered to the South I have completely failed to see aright, because it will revolutionize the fertilizer business completely. It will give us the advantage of not having to buy foreign nitrates and thousands of other things; that you know better than I do.

Mr. Ford is the best employer in America, the Government not excepted, from the fact of the many thousands of men who work for him. He has never had the threat of a strike. The men who work for him are the best paid, the best housed, and the best satisfied men in the country. I have talked with hundreds of men in this county, and they are all of the same opinion, so if this thing don't go right, somebody is going to want to know why.

Yours for right,

W. J. DAILEY,
Route No. 2, Fairburn, Ga.

Hon. WILLIAM D. UPSHAW,

DEAR SIR: I am heartily in favor of the Government's acceptance of Mr. Ford's offer covering Muscle Shoals.

To my mind there is no other man in this country possessed of Mr. Ford's initiative and ability for the undertaking and development of a proposition of this magnitude. Believing that the best interests of the people as a whole will be perpetuated to the greatest extent by Mr. Ford's offer, I trust you will consider it in order and use your influence toward the early consummation of the negotiations between the Government and Mr. Ford, and the acceptance of the same.

Yours, very truly,

DEAR SIR: The St. Simons Island Board of Trade unanimously indorses and approves the Ford proposition for Muscle Shoals, believing that it is the best plan offered to save Government loss, and that it will be of untold value to the South and this immediate section, and we respectfully urge that you do everything in your power to get this contract accepted.

Yours, truly,

ST. SIMONS ISLAND BOARD OF TRADE,

By ALFRED L. PULLEN, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that at this point in the bill there is to be an omission of some matter?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, if it is agreeable to the gentleman from Mississippi, I suggest that we jump from this point in the bill over to line 19, page 60, beginning with the paragraph headed "Contingencies, Engineer Department, Philippine Islands." All of the intervening items will be affected by the size of the Army.

Mr. SISSON. I have no objection to that being done, under the former agreement, with the understanding that at the next meeting of the committee we return to the point where we leave off.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas desires to begin the reading on line 19, page 60.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 9633) to extend the provisions of section 2305, Revised Statutes, and of the act of September 29, 1919, to those discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and subsequently awarded compensation or treated for wounds received or disability incurred in line of duty, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. STERLING and Mr. MCKELLAR members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDNANCE SERVICE.

For the current expenses of the Ordnance Department in connection with purchasing, receiving, storing, and issuing ordnance and ordnance stores, comprising police and office duties, rents, tolls, fuel, light, water, and advertising, stationery, typewriters, and adding machines, including their exchange, and office furniture, tools, and instruments of service; for incidental expenses of the Ordnance Service and those attending practical trials and tests of ordnance small arms, and other ordnance stores; for instruction purposes; for publications for libraries of the Ordnance Department, including the Ordnance Office; subscriptions to periodicals, which may be paid for in advance; and payment for mechanical labor in the office of the Chief of Ordnance; and for maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, $1,250,000: Provided, That no money appropriated herein shall be expended for maintenance, repair, or operation of any motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle employed wholly or in part for personal, social, or other similar use or for any use except for military and official business: Provided further, That all material purchased under the apropriations in this act for the Ordnance Department of the United States Army shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Kansas about what the estimates were for the manufacture in arsenals?

Mr. ANTHONY. The estimate was $1,400,000, and the committee has reduced that to $1,250,000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman point out just in what item this occurs?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are a number of items; for instance, the item for services and supplies in the ordnance stores. The department wanted $365,000 and it is reduced to $313,000. In fact, that is the department's revised estimate itself, after those figures came to us from the Budget. Also, for services of clerks required for property accounting, and again for heat, light, and water, the first estimate was $224,000 and the reduced estimate $208,000. For services of messengers, guards, watchmen, firemen, on other than manufacturing and experimental work they asked $280,000 and then the revised estimate was $273,000. For operation and repair of passenger-carrying vehicles, for other than manufacturing necessities, there was originally asked $70,000 and it was reduced to $58,000, and so on. It covers a multitude of things.

Mr. DALLINGER. Do I understand that the $1,250,000 is the revised estimate asked by the Ordnance Department?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not altogether. Perhaps there are some items where the committee made reductions, but the items that I have enumerated are revised figures from the department.

Mr. DALLINGER. Did that item include the manufacture of gun carriages?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; receipts, stores, and issue of ordnance. There will be very little manufacture, if any, out of this money.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman from Kansas point out the item in this bill that covers the manufacture of gun carriages for coast defense?

Mr. ANTHONY. Some of those items we have just passed over, for guns and seacoast batteries. They will be utilized probably in the arsenal in the gentleman's district, either that or at Watervliet. In the items for the manufacture of guns or gun carriages there would be reflected activities in manufacturing at the arsenals, and likewise the manufacture of automatic rifles of all kinds would be reflected in activities at Springfield.

Mr. DALLINGER. Has the gentleman from Kansas any figures from the Ordnance Department as to what they propose to do at these different arsenals this coming year?

Mr. ANTHONY. The general estimate of the department was that the money which the committee is appropriating would allow them to operate at about 10 per cent of their maximum capacity, and that will be considerably less than they are operating under now.

But they claim with that money they could keep what might be called a skeleton organization at those places which would be capable of expansion if necessary. The gentleman, I know, realizes we came out of this war with a tremendous amount of ordnance stores on hand, probably more than we can use up in 20 years, and there is no real necessity for operating those arsenals at all. We could exist several years and close them up, but the committee is making provision to maintain a skeleton organization there so that they will be going assets.

Mr. DALLINGER. Can the gentleman from Kansas furnish information as to what number of men would be employed at the different arsenals?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I would not have the means to state that.

Mr. DALLINGER. And whether or not the number was reduced below the number employed before the outbreak of the war?

Mr. ANTHONY. There will be more than were employed at the outbreak of the war in my opinion, but there will be a reduction of the number now employed, but not a great reduction.

Mr. DALLINGER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I note the closing language in the last proviso is as follows:

except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interests of the United States to make purchases abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty.

I would like to know whether the gentleman thinks that is a very good doctrine to write in this section of the bill, referring to the articles enumerated?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are some articles that it is necessary to get from abroad. For instance, before the war I know we purchased lenses, glasses, and it was absolutely necessary to go abroad for them if only to get types for manufacture in this country, and it is the same way, possibly, with other things.

Mr. KETCHAM. Did not the very exigency which made that necessary before the war disappear under the pressure we were put to during the war?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think so. I think we can produce all we want, and perhaps anything we want in this country, but there are some things that come up now and then where it is necessary the Government will have to buy those abroad.

Mr. KETCHAM. Does the gentleman think it a very good principle for that language to be written into the law from the standpoint of the majority side of the House?

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, it is very necessary to purchase some small items.

Mr. KETCHAM. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defenses, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $150,000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask the gentleman from Kansas what the estimate was for this item?

Mr. ANTHONY. Which one?

Mr. DALLINGER. Page 70, the first one, $150,000 item.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am informed we gave the full amount of their estimate.

Mr. DALLINGER. And also the same in regard to the other two items, $67,700 and $60,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the amount of the revised estimates that is carried in the bill.

Mr. DALLINGER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL TROPHY AND MEDALS FOR RIFLE CONTESTS.

For the purpose of furnishing a national trophy and medals and other prizes to be provided and contested for annually, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, said contest to be open to the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the National Guard or Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and of the District of Columbia, members of rifles clubs, and civilians, and for the cost of the trophy, prizes, and medals herein provided for, and for the promotion of rifle practice throughout the United States, including the reimbursement of necessary expenses of members of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, to be expended for the purposes hereinbefore prescribed, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $10,000.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas if this language, "Army, Navy, and Marine Corps," would include the Reserve Corps?

Mr. ANTHONY. Which item is the gentleman speaking of?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. "National trophy and medals for rifle contests," page 74. You provide for a contest to be open to the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps and the National Guard or Organized Militia, and so forth, but there is no mention of the Reserve Corps.

Mr. ANTHONY. The reason it is not mentioned is because we have no Reserve Corps to speak of. There are perhaps two or three hundred enlisted men in our Reserve Corps, so small it is not taken into consideration.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Are not officers available for this contest as well as enlisted men? Do not rifle teams often consist of officers and enlisted men both?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but as far as I know there are very few, either officers or enlisted men, who participate.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is there any reason why even that few should not be eligible to these contests?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think they would be barred. I think they would be permitted to contest.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is what I asked, if the word "Army" included the Regular Army and the reserves as well.

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly. I think that the word "Army" would cover the United States reserves, and that item also includes civilians as well, so no one is barred from participation in these matches.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHIEF OF INFANTRY.

INFANTRY SCHOOL, CAMP BENNING, GA.

For the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers; instruments and material for instruction, employment of technical and special services, including the services of one translator at the rate of $150 per month, and for the necessary expenses of instruction at the Infantry School, Camp Benning, Ga., $35,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. On page 114 of the bill the river and harbor item is reported, and a great many of us are very much interested in that, and a great many Representatives who are not here at this time are anxious to be here when that item is reached. Is it going to be the policy of the committee to go on and reach that item and consider it this afternoon?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I do not think there is any probability at all that we will reach that item this afternoon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHIEF OF CAVALRY.

CAVALRY SCHOOL, FORT RILEY, KANS.

For the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, instruments, and materials for instruction; employment of temporary, technical, or special services; and for other necessary expenses of instruction at the Cavalry School, Fort Riley, Kans., $15,000.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee concerning this item, "Cavalry School, Fort Riley, Kans." It is my understanding that the chief of Cavalry asked for $15,000 and the Budget cut it down to $8,300, and after full consideration the committee recommended the full amount that was asked for this purpose by the Cavalry School.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is my understanding that the $8,300 figure was at one time considered by the Budget, but as the estimate finally came from the Budget it was the full amount of $15,000.

Mr. HILL. Therefore I am correct in understanding that this is the full amount that is desired by the War Department?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is.

Mr. HILL. I should like in connection with this to read to the House a letter which was recently written by the General of the Armies, Gen. John J. Pershing, Chief of Staff, in which he makes the following references to the Cavalry. This letter is to Samuel W. Taylor, editor of the Rider and Driver, New York City, N. Y., and is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF, Washington.

SAMUEL W. TAYLOR, Esq.,
Editor the Rider and Driver, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. TAYLOR: In reference to your letter of February 8 concerning the Times editorial that comments on the fact that Marshal Foch, a carefully trained and expert horseman, did not ride a horse during the war in France, but used an automobile for ordinary transportation, it seems almost unnecessary to confirm so obvious a truth.

Of course he used an automobile; so do I, and so, in fact, did every other commander of whatever grade who could get an automobile. Just as the truck superseded the legs of the infantryman, so did the automobile supersede the horse, wherever passable roads made the substitution possible. And for the longer journeys, the railway train was substituted for the truck and automobile. It was merely a matter of availability. The fastest means of transport was always used.

But this by no means indicates that the horse has been rendered obsolete for war, nor has it any bearing on the question. The great events that followed the British retreat from Mons obscured for the time being the recognition due the little Cavalry force commanded by Gen. Allenby, that so gallantly faced the German masses in their advance. In the light of present knowledge their operations deserve to be listed among the greatest epics of the war.

Gen. von Kluck compliments Gen. Allenby's Cavalry on this occasion by indirection thus: "On the occasion of the pursuit of the British Army after Mons and their skillful and successful retreat, the chief factor that enabled it to escape was that my army lacked the effective means of making it stand and fight, namely, the three divisions that composed Marwitz Cavalry Corps." It must be remembered that Allenby had but five brigades, less than 7,000 sabers, to oppose the whole strength of Von Kluck's army of not less than 150,000 men.

The front in France stabilized with the digging in of the German armies. From then until 1918 the struggle was a negation of war; neither side could move the other; there were no flanks, no penetrations, no openings for the employment of Cavalry. During these years tactics was based on an unlimited artillery, firing by the map with never-failing supplies of ammunition. In March, 1918, the Germans, realizing that an artillery war would never end, decided upon open-warfare tactics, and in three powerful offensives sought to break through the allied defense, only to fail in each drive because they had no Cavalry available to exploit their successes. Gen. Ludendorf says of this: "In the March, 1918, offensive I felt seriously handicapped by the lack of Cavalry."

The course of the war in France was dictated by a wonderful network of metaled roads that permitted the masses of men engaged to be fed and supplied on a scale never before even dreamed of, and possible only because of the roads. No such system of roads exists anywhere else in the world; nowhere else are such tactics possible. On the eastern fronts—Poland, Rumania, Syria, Macedonia, Mesopotamia, and Palestine—Cavalry was an arm of the greatest importance, constantly being employed, yielding great successes to the armies that possessed it in superior numbers, demonstrating again and again the truth of Marshal Haig's epigram, "Other arms may win battles; only Cavalry can make them worth winning."

The horse remains the most economical, most flexible means that exists for increasing the mobility of the individual soldier. There is not in the world to-day an officer of distinction, recognized as an authority in military matters in a broad way, who does not declare with emphasis that Cavalry is as important an arm to-day as it has ever been, who does not urge the maintenance of a body of Cavlary of suitable size, always ready for campaign, prepared to perform for its country the signal service rendered by Gen. Allenby's little force in 1914.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN J. PERSHING,
General of the Armies, Chief of Staff.

The reason I read that is because there have been a number of suggestions here in committee that the Cavalry arm of the service, which is now almost entirely on the Texas border and which is entirely necessary there, will not be needed in the future and is not important as compared with Infantry. I also rise to call attention to the fact that in this request for equipment for the Cavalry School at Fort Riley the committee, which I have to-day criticized for various reductions, has given the full amount asked for.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. If I have any time.

Mr. CROWTHER. Has the gentleman any preference as to the color of the horses at all? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. The gentleman prefers a "white horse," named "Constitution." [Applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] anticipated the inquiry that I myself wanted to make. And I am very glad he made it, and I congratulate the committee that once, at least, they have given the Army or a subdivision of the Army that sum of money that was suggested as necessary for their work.

I have been a member for only a very short time of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I do not intend to have very much to say. I do not think new members on a committee ought to have very much to say until they have given at least a reasonable amount of study to these important questions. But I want to suggest that I have never been a pacifist, and I hope we will have a decent-sized Army in this country. I may have lost sight of the vision of the dove flying with an olive branch in its mouth, but, Mr. Chairman, men have fought ever since the world began, ever since Cain slew his brother Abel; fought for power and profit and for revenge and new territory, and I believe they will do so until the end of time. I am a great believer in the old motto of the Puritans, "Trust in God, but keep your powder dry." I want to see these United States of mine so protected with an Army and Navy that we can feel a degree of safety that may not even follow with the signing of all the peace pacts in the world. I may have a wrong idea, but I have had to fight for everything I have had ever since I was knee high, and I believe that is about all you get in the world, namely, what you fight for. It is what has made this country great, and this greatest of all nations, our beloved United States, should never again be caught in the trap of unpreparedness, baited with the cheese of pacifism. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF CHIEF OF COAST ARTILLERY.

Salaries: Chief clerk, $2,000; clerks—1 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 3 of class 2; 4 of class 1, 2 at $1,000 each; 2 messengers, at $720 each; in all, $19,440.

Mr. CRAGO and Mr. HULL rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois). The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee if he would not be willing to have the entire subject of the size and amounts of the appropriations for the National Guard, which will involve a great many amendments, go over, along with the other matters that have been passed over, until the next day the bill is under consideration?

In support of this request I will say that you will recognize the fact that the size of the National Guard and the size of the Army are interwoven in such a way that we might want, if we follow the policy of the bill with reference to the Army, to do something more for the National Guard. If the size of the Army is changed, it might change our ideas as to the amount to be appropriated for the National Guard, because some of the work which is appropriated for under the head of the Army, especially the training work, and so on, is dependent more or less on the amount that is appropriated in other places for the National Guard work.

Mr. KELLER. It is your idea that if you decrease the size of the Army you might want to increase the National Guard?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. While there may be something in what the gentleman says, I think it is the policy of the subcommittee to continue the expansion of the National Guard, regardless of the strength of the Regular Army. But if the gentleman believes that we should pass these items—and other gentlemen, I understand, have the same idea—so far as I am concerned I will have no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that we have quite a number of amendments to propose to these items in the National Guard appropriations, and I think they would involve a great deal of discussion, and I know personally that a great many of the people who are away to-day, and who have asked that the other items go over, would be glad to be here when these items are considered.

Mr. ANTHONY. That would involve the question of unanimous consent, and I suggest the gentleman put it in that shape.

Mr. KELLER. I know that there are a number of men interested who are not here to-day.

Mr. CRAGO. I ask unanimous consent, then, that all the items in this bill under the Militia Bureau, from line 22, on page 79, to line 17, on page 82, be passed over under the same conditions as other items have been passed over.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I did not hear what the request was.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until the unanimous-consent request has been put.

Mr. CRAGO. That is my request.

The CHAIRMAN. That it be passed over for the present on the same terms and conditions as those under which we passed over the provisions dependent on the size of the Army.

Mr. CRAGO. The one is more or less dependent on the other, and some of the people who are interested in passing over the former matter are vitally interested in passing over the National Guard appropriation.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think they are related in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylavnia [Mr. CRAGO] asks unanimous consent that the provisions of the bill extending from page 79, line 22, down to and including line 16, on page 82, be passed over under the same terms and conditions as the preceding sections of the bill relating to the size of the Army was passed over. Is there objection?

Mr. HULL. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SISSON. I will say to my friend that if the National Guard provisions are tied up in any way with the actual size of the Army, of course the two are related. If the Army is very greatly reduced, it might induce the Congress to increase the appropriations for the National Guard. But what was the gentleman's special reason for wishing to pass this over?

Mr. CRAGO. The same reason that existed for passing over the items relating to the size of the Army and number of officers in the Army. That request was made in order that many gentlemen who are interested in the subject and who are away to-day may have opportunity to participate in the discussion. They wish to be present. That is particularly true with respect to the National Guard items, because it could hardly be assumed that we would reach the National Guard items in the regular way this afternoon.

Mr. SISSON. I am not going to object, Mr. Chairman, but this incident shows the trouble we get into when we begin to pass over matters for the convenience of absent Members.

Mr. MANN. I did not submit my suggestion in regard to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] except that I understood it was in accordance with the desire of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from California got the request in such shape that I assented to it, but I did not ask for it.

Mr. HULL. I do not object, but I do wish to call attention——

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman does not want us to pass them over, he had better object.

Mr. HULL. If you are going to read through other matters there might be objection to-night. I would be willing to have considered the Military Academy provisions, covering perhaps 20 pages.

Mr. ANTHONY. Suppose we go as far as it pleases the gentleman from Iowa to allow us to go. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO]?

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. There is no hurry about this. We shall be here all summer, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws his point of order that there is no quorum present. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, Military Academy, $2,060,008.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HULL. I do so in order to ask the chairman of the committee if he would be willing to pass over the next two pages and take up the bill at page 105. There are several items in there which several Members have spoken to me about, and they might want to be heard about them.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There is another item in there that interests me.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman refers to the stop-watch item?

Mr. HULL. That is one of the items.

Mr. ANTHONY. The stop-watch item is not in there.

Mr. HULL. If you were to start at page 105, nonmilitary activities, I presume it would be satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman make that request?

Mr. HULL. Yes. I make the request that we pass to page 105.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate the line?

Mr. ANTHONY. That will be agreeable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has not preferred his unanimous-consent request yet.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we pass from page 101, line 24, to the bottom of page 104, under the same conditions as the preceding sections in regard to the pay of the Army and the militia have been passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill if he would be satisfied if we should go down to rivers and harbors on page 114 and call it a day?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I believe that would be a very good terminal point.

Mr. SISSON. I shall have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of 76 superintendents of national cemeteries, including not to exceed $1,500 for the superintendent at Mexico City, $63,720.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of obtaining information from the chairman of the committee. On page 105 you provide appropriations for maintaining and improving national cemeteries, memorial amphitheaters, chapels, and so forth. I believe there are 76 of these national cemeteries. Is that right?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are more national cemeteries than that, but there are 76 of them that have superintendents. I am informed that there are 83 of them, all told.

Mr. DUNBAR. In these national cemeteries on each Memorial Day patriotic services are held. Has any thought ever been given to the proposition of inclosing these memorial amphitheaters and chapels with roofs, so that the audiences who assemble there will not be subjected to the inclemency of the weather?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I think most of the structures that are in place in our national cemeteries are designed to be without roofs. For instance, I know several of them that have pergolas and open-air rostrums, but I know of none of them that are inclosed structures with roofs.

Mr. DUNBAR. Does not the gentleman believe that it would add to the appropriateness of the occasion if people could assemble in buildings which were provided with roofs or covering when these services are held on Memorial Day, which is a national holiday and designated for the purpose of inspiring patriotism?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it would hardly add to the occasion. It is warm weather then, generally.

Mr. DUNBAR. There is an old saying in the Ohio Valley that it always rains on Decoration Day, and these services are frequently interrupted and many patriotic addresses are interrupted or can not be listened to because of the inclement weather. Does not the gentleman believe that these auditoriums should be provided and be so constructed that people can comfortably listen to these solemn ceremonies, even if the weather happens to be stormy?

Mr. ANTHONY. The only remedy I can suggest would be increased appropriations for weather service, so as to guarantee perfect weather on Memorial Day.

Mr. DUNBAR. The weather service has nothing to do with securing a perfect day. They tell you whether the day will probably be perfect or not. But it does seem to me that where thousands of people assemble, and where they are liable to be subject to such discomfort as is likely to be caused by inclement weather, some appropriation should be made to cover these buildings except that afforded by the canopy of heaven. The committee has never given any consideration to that subject, as I understand the gentleman?

Mr. ANTHONY. It has not. There has never been any estimate before us for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs to roadways to national cemeteries which have been constructed by special authority of Congress, $12,000: Provided, That no railroads shall be permitted upon the right of way which may have been acquired by the United States to a national cemetery, or to encroach upon any roads or walks constructed thereon and maintained by the United States: Provided further, That no part of this sum shall be used for repairing any roadway not owned by the United States within the corporate limits of any city, town, or village.

No part of any appropriation for national cemeteries or the repair of roadways thereto shall be expended in the maintenance of more than a single approach to any national cemetery.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a few questions. What is the purpose of making that proviso as to railroads? Has that been in former appropriation bills?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; it is existing law and has been carried for a number of years.

Mr. CRAGO. And this provision that only one approach to these national cemeteries shall be improved by any of these funds, is that existing law?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is existing law.

Mr. CRAGO. I am wondering what is the reason for that?

Mr. MANN. There was a big fight over it in the House, because they were constructing two roads to a cemetery, I believe in southern Illinois, at one time.

Mr. CRAGO. I know there are so many approaches to the national cemetery at Gettysburg that I wondered why it should be thought necessary to have this limitation.

Mr. MANN. It grew out of the fight that I am telling the gentleman about.

Mr. CRAGO. In other words, they were making too many approaches, or spending too much money?

Mr. ANTHONY. Too many roads were claiming the benefit of these funds.

Mr. CRAGO. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rivers and harbors.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I understand that it is not proposed to go into the subject of rivers and harbors to-day?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the War Department appropriation bill (H. R. 10871) and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2897. An act to appropriate $1,500,000 for the purchase of seed grain, to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 20, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] is detained on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to state that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained on business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I observe in the Washington Post of this morning an article by Mr. Albert W. Fox in reference to the quadruple alliance, in part as follows:

The opposition established a gain of one vote when Senator WALSH of Montana, who was regarded as doubtful, announced that he would vote against ratification unless some amendment similar to the Robinson amendment was adopted. Senator JONES of New Mexico, who was classed as doubtful, also will vote against ratification, according to the opposition leaders.

Those leading the fight for the treaty, on the other hand, claim that both TRAMMELL and WILLIAMS will vote with them; that ASHURST, KENDRICK, and MCKELLAR are inclining to support them, and that SMITH, regarded as against the pact, may be found on their side in the final roll call.

I do not know how the other Senators mentioned in the article view the treaty, but I am amazed that such an accurate writer as Mr. Fox should have been under a misapprehension as to my view. It is true I have not addressed the Senate on this subject, but to all persons who inquired of me I have uniformly stated that I would vote against the quadruple alliance. I am standing against alliances with orientals.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. From that committee I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 2440) extending the period for homestead entries on the south half of the Diminished Colville Indian Reservation, and I submit a report (No. 567) thereon. I ask for its present consideration. If it leads to debate, I shall not press it.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the period provided by law for the filing of homestead entries upon the agricultural lands of the south half of the Diminished Colville Indian Reservation in the State of Washington, as provided in the act of Congress approved March 22, 1906, be, and is hereby, extended for a period of five years from and after the 4th day of September, 1921.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Washington whether the bill was unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It was.

Mr. KING. Is there any particular reason for the extension of the time so long?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is simply because the people in the State, and particularly in that part of the State where the lands are located, would like to have an opportuntiy to file homestead claims upon the lands in pursuance of the original law. The war, it is claimed, intervening, interfered to a considerable extent with young men making homestead entries. The law provides that if homestead entries were not made by the 5th day of last September, the land should be sold at not less than $1 an acre. The only purpose of the bill is to extend for a period of five years the opportunity to make homestead entries. There is one amendment to the bill, to strike out the word "agricultural" before the word "lands."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was, in line 4, to strike out the word "agricultural" before the word "lands."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 3297, to amend section 4884 of the Revised Statutes, and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session, the subject being the four-power treaty.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to enter into an extended discussion of the pending treaty, but there has come to my knowledge and into my possession a statement in regard to the four-power pact and in regard to the work of the recently held Limitation of Armament Conference in connection with the four-power pact which I think is of sufficient moment to have consideration. The statement to which I refer was made a few days ago in the discussion of the pact at a meeting of some club or gathering in New York City, where something in the nature of a debate upon the subject was in progress. The statement was made by Mr. Paul D. Cravath, whom everyone recognizes as one of the leaders of the American bar——

Mr. OVERMAN. He is Morgan's attorney.

Mr. BORAH. And a man who has intimate associations and connections with the professional and business men on both sides of the water. The statement would be exceedingly interesting and important if it were made by one less calculated to know whereof he spoke, but, being made by a man of Mr. Cravath's experience and standing and connections, it seems to me worthy of consideration in this discussion. It throws light upon the matter from a different angle. I read what I understand to have been Mr. Cravath's statement:

> Now, to my mind a very important part of the achievement of the Washington conference is not recorded at all in black and white in that treaty or in any of the other treaties that were negotiated. And that is the bringing about of what seems to be a sympathetic understanding between the United States and Great Britain regarding the Far East and Pacific questions generally. I quite agree that under the program produced by those treaties we have practically surrendered our naval position in the Pacific. I assume that without further fortifications in the Pacific and that with the fortifications and fleets as agreed upon we could not successfully compete with Japan in the Pacific alone, and certainly we could not compete with an Anglo-Japanese fleet in that region. On the other hand, and to my mind this is the much more encouraging statement, based on the same facts, an Anglo-American fleet in the Pacific would dominate Japan, and it seems to me that we have substituted in place of the necessity for creating the greatest fleet the world has ever seen, with all the expense and temptations that involves, an understanding and basis for cooperation with Great Britain which gives those two powers the control of a combined fleet in the Pacific which will be large enough to dominate Japan and make her live up to the obligations she has assumed.

At that point the following interrogation was submitted to Mr. Cravath by Mr. Davis:

> Mr. DAVIS. I want to know if you are making that statement as a fact, or is it just your own opinion of what would happen?
> Mr. CRAVATH. I have been told by every member of the American delegation, and while I haven't been told by every member of the British delegation I know definitely that the view is held by Mr. Balfour and, I think, by every other member of the British delegation that the result of the Washington conference has been not a formal agreement by any means but an understanding, and such a degree of understanding and such a basis of sympathy has been created between Great Britain and the United States that both sides assume that in all future emergencies they can both count on having the very closest cooperation.

The party who had made the interrogation then said:

> No; that isn't what I mean. What I mean is as to the agreements on fortifications and the agreement as to the naval ratio. Do you mean to say that both fleets would dominate the Japanese fleet?
> Mr. CRAVATH. Of course, I have no independent knowledge of that. I am not a naval expert, and have no independent opinion on that point, but I am informed that our technical advisers are satisfied that if the United States and Great Britain are on one side, and Japan on the other, that the Anglo-American fleet and the entire Anglo-American naval position would dominate that of Japan in Japanese waters.
> As I say, I have no independent opinion of my own on that. I am simply repeating what I have been told in Washington. But in all events we are very much better off, if I am right in assuming that underlying sympathy with Great Britain, than we would have been with as large a fleet as the one that we have had in contemplation and on our building program, being opposed with the largest fleet that Japan would find herself physically able to build, and Great Britain being bound as a matter of course to keep pace with both. So, assuming that our theory of Anglo-American cooperation is well grounded, it does seem to me that our naval position, as against Japan, has been improved rather than weakened, and we have the great advantage in the reduction of our naval program and all that that means financially and otherwise.

Mr. President, this statement if analyzed discloses that in addition to the four-power agreement there has been an understanding, and such a degree of understanding between Great Britain and the United States with reference to Far Eastern questions and Pacific questions that they will cooperate against Japan if it is necessary to do so. It is precisely the same situation, Mr. President, and the same condition of affairs which took place, for instance, at Morocco, where two or three or four nations came together and made their agreement and then two other nations got together and declared that they should cooperate for a different purpose and to control the other parties to the same agreement.

The statement made by Mr. Cravath indicates an alliance. Whatever discussion or debate there might be as to whether or not the four-power treaty is an alliance, there can be no doubt that the understanding arrived at between Great Britain and the United States that their respective navies were to cooperate against Japan in case of emergency constitutes in every sense an alliance.

As I said a moment ago, I would not call attention to this statement, perhaps, if it were not made by one who professes to know from those who have given him the information direct that such an understanding has been arrived at, and who is in a position to know, perhaps, as well as any other man in the United States outside of the members of the conference itself.

Furthermore, Mr. President, similar information reached me a month ago in a communication from across the water, but coming, as it did, from one whom I did not know, I did not feel at liberty to attach to it any particular importance or give to it any particular consideration. Having received it, however, from another source, I think it raises an exceedingly important question. It simply discloses that once we enter upon the program of making political understandings or political combines or political compacts there is no place where we can stop making them, even as against those who have signed a treaty with us, if we deem it to our interest to make them to the contrary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Suppose that the conference had confined itself entirely to the matter of naval limitation, of which the Senator is a very active advocate and for which he is very largely responsible in a way, at least; he is one of those who are responsible for promoting a conference to bring about an international agreement for the limitation of naval armament. I assume that the Senator could not have objected to that, in view of his advocacy of it on so many occasions. Now, suppose the conference had confined itself to that; how does the Senator differentiate that from the other agreements that have been made, in so far as concerns the likelihood or the possibility of subordinate agreements or understandings, if any such exist, between members of the conference, parties to the compact for the limitation of naval armament? In other words, disputes might arise in regard to the naval agreement between these parties the same as in regard to any other agreement, and in the case of such disputes there would be the same likelihood or the same possibility, at least, of subordinate combinations. So it seems to me, if the Senator objects to the pending treaty upon that ground he would have to extend the same objection to any agreement about any matter of importance between nations, and particularly to that concerning the question of which he has been so great an advocate, namely, the limitation of naval armament.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me for just a moment before the debate goes too far, I note that the gentleman mentioned by the Senator from Idaho has referred to the members of the American delegation. I have met a great many men in my time, and I will not say that I do not know him, but I do not recall knowing him. In reference to the American delegation confirming the statement made by him, I desire to say that for one I have made no such statement; I have expressed no such view; and, so far as I know and so far as my information is concerned, there is not a word of truth in the whole statement which the Senator from Idaho has just read, and I do not believe there is any truth in it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know that I understood precisely what Mr. Cravath said about the American delegation; but if, as I understand, he said that he had conversations with the members of the American delegation and gives them as his authority, I may say that he had no authority from me, for I have never had any conversation with him about it at all, and, so far as I am aware, I know of no such agreement or understanding with Great Britain. What the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has said applies absolutely to my case. There is not a word of truth in the statement which has been quoted so far as I know, and I think I know something about the making of the treaties.

Mr. BORAH. Well, of course, Mr. President, I have——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Cravath was not a member of the delegation.

Mr. BORAH. No; he was not a member of the delegation.

Mr. LODGE. Nor had he anything to do with it, nor did he ever appear in any way, so far as I know.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. Cravath was not a member of the delegation, but Mr. Cravath is a man of responsibility——

Mr. LODGE. No doubt.

Mr. BORAH. And a man of standing, both in his profession and in business affairs.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And his connection with the business affairs in relation to those on both sides of the water has enabled him for many years to be thoroughly well informed as to what is going on. I happen to know that before Mr. Cravath made this statement he had had an interview with Mr. Root, and it is possible that in speaking of the American delegation he might not have meant each and every member of the American delegation; I do not know as to that; that is for Mr. Cravath to state; but I will read again what he said. It can not be a matter of unconcern. I think even the fact that a man like Mr. Cravath would make such a statement is exceedingly important.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, statements are easily made by people who have no responsibility and no knowledge particularly of the subject. I do not deny that Mr. Cravath may honestly believe what he says, but I can only say that, so far as any understanding between Great Britain and the United States, as stated, is concerned, it certainly does not exist within the knowledge of the delegation representing the United States.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator said he did not hear exactly what Mr. Cravath said, and so I will reread it.

Mr. LODGE. I said I did not hear what he said about the American delegation.

Mr. BORAH. He was asked by a gentleman who was present:

I want to know if you are making that statement as a fact or is it just your own opinion of what would happen?

Mr. Cravath replied:

I have been told by every member of the American delegation, and while I haven't been told by every member of the British delegation, I know definitely that the view is held by Mr. Balfour and I think by every other member of the British delegation, that the result of the Washington conference has been, not a formal agreement by any means, but an understanding, and such a degree of understanding and such a basis of sympathy has been created between Great Britain and the United States, that both sides assume that in all future emergencies they can both count on having the very closest cooperation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I just want to say this to the Senator: I do not know Mr. Cravath; at least, if I ever have met him, I do not recall it. As I said a while ago, I have met a great many men whose names I do not recall. I would not pay any more attention to this statement, quoted from a newspaper article, than I would to a fly alighting on a wheel, if it did not come here on the floor of the Senate from the mouth of a Senator whom I very greatly respect.

I want to say to the Senator, however, so far as I am concerned—and I would not answer him if he had not attempted to put me into the statement—that there is not one word of truth, so far as I am concerned or so far as my knowledge is concerned, in the article. If the Senator wants to continue his argument in reference to other people on the delegation, he can do so; but I know that the Senator will accept my statement when I tell him that it is not true, and if it were not on the floor of the Senate I would use a stronger word.

Mr. BORAH. I have already said that I assume that Mr. Cravath in all probability was not including each member of the delegation, and when the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Massachusetts say that they do not know anything about it, that if it is true they do not know anything about it, I know that they do not know anything about it; but that does not convince me that it may not be true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It can not be true as to the delegation, because here is half of the delegation standing on the floor; so the statement could not be based on any action by the delegation.

Mr. BORAH. I accept the statement that the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Massachusetts know nothing about it; but I want to correct the Senator in one respect.

The Senator from Idaho is assuming no responsibility for this statement other than the responsibility of quoting here accurately a statment which a man who has responsibility has made in a public place. I am not quoting newspaper reports. I am quoting what I am informed is a stenographic report, just as the statement was made there in the presence of some of the leading men of New York City; and Mr. Cravath was called to task, as it were, for it at the time, and he did not recede from his position.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can only reiterate what the Senator from Alabama has said. So far as I am concerned, no such understanding was ever thought of or dreamed of or mentioned; and I do not believe that anything was concealed from the Senator from Alabama or myself in the whole conduct of that negotiation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, for the present I have said all that I desire to say in regard to this matter. I said a moment ago that this same information came to me nearly a month ago by letter from across the water, particularly connected with Mr. Balfour being made a Knight of the Garter, but I did not know the party. I do not yet, except indirectly, know the party. I therefore did not assume any responsibility, even the responsibility of quoting it here; but I want to know what Mr. Cravath means. I do not want a representative of some of the greatest interests of this country, some of the most powerful interests, interests which in a large measure in some respects are practically dictating the foreign policy of this country, saying unchallenged that there is an alliance within an alliance, and that we have gone on record and written ourselves down as members of an alliance as I conceive it to be, at least a political pact, and that within that alliance we have gone back on some of the other members of it and formed another alliance. If you want war, that is the way to create war. I said upon the floor of the Senate a few days ago that is the way war springs from these political pacts—by the treachery which is practiced by one toward another. I contend such a statement from a man like Mr. Cravath can not go unnoticed or unchallenged. I am determined to know the facts if I can ascertain them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, some days ago I made a speech on this treaty; and as I am not on the Foreign Relations Committee, I have not considered that the responsibility of seeing the treaty through was in my hands, and I expected that to be my last speech on the subject.

I think it is most unfortunate, however, that men, whether they occupy positions of so-called responsibility in private affairs or not, should make statements regarding a matter of very vital interest not only to this country but to the world and have those statements come here seemingly as if they spoke for a Government. I know who Mr. Cravath is. I think he is the attorney of one of the greatest banking institutions in the United States. I think he is a lawyer of high standing; but I do not know anything about his reliability when he talks about matters that were not his own. I do know that there is not a word of truth in this statement. I do know that the American delegation as a delegation has not attempted to make any alliance or any agreement or come to any understanding that is not written within the terms of the treaty that is before the Senate; and I do not know of anyone else who had authority to speak for the Government of the United States except the President of the United States himself, whose commissions these four delegates held. I do not think this statement would be worthy of note if it had not been brought before the Senate of the United States.

A vast number of statements are appearing in the papers every day about these treaties from irresponsible people, possibly repeating hearsay statements, that have not the warrant of truth behind them. They may mislead, but they do not injure; but for a statement of this kind to go out from the floor of the United States Senate without absolute and unqualified contradiction is a danger to the people of the United States. It is a menace to the Government of the United States because it makes assertions that might involve the friendly relations of two great powers in this world. To allow a statement to go out from the floor of the Senate of the United States pretending that our Government was treacherous, that our Government was unfaithful, that the word of our Government could not be relied upon, is unworthy of the people of the United States; and it is a statement that I will not allow to go forth, as a Senator and a citizen of the United States, without absolute and unqualified contradiction.

Suppose you allow a statement of this kind to go out here, that your Government, through its accredited agents, has made a solemn compact with four other nations, and then, before the ink is dry on the paper on which it is written, that the agents of your Government have turned around and proved treacherous to the contract, and have made a secret understanding with another Government to destroy the life or the opportunity of another nation with whom you are at peace, and with whom you have just signed a contract for peace. Have you no pride in your Government? Has your patriotism gone to the winds? Do you not believe that your Government is longer honest, or faithful, or true to a trust?

Mr. President, of course, I know that we say many things in the United States Senate in reference to treaties, and give them no more thought than if we were passing a Senate resolution or a bill appropriating $50,000; but in the eyes of the world this body, the Senate of the United States, is a part of the treaty-making power of this Government, and words coming from the Senate of the United States are regarded in other nations with that seriousness with which, in my judgment, we should regard them here ourselves. To let it go out that the American delegation—the only agents authorized to speak in this matter except the President of the United States himself—had deliberately signed a peace contract with the Empire of Japan, and then had entered into a secret agreement with the Government of Great Britain, would be infamous if it were true. I say that it is absolutely untrue; and I would call it by a stronger name, which it deserves, if I were not speaking on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it certainly must be apparent from the statement made by Mr. Cravath, and from the statement made by the representative of the Far Eastern Republic, that there are in process of formation, if they have not already been formed, secret arrangements among some of the powers that are parties to this four-power treaty.

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations could have ascertained all of the facts connected with the inception and the advancement of this treaty. By the same process which was employed when the Versailles treaty was under consideration our committee could have ascertained whether, without the knowledge of some of the American delegates to the conference, secret agreements or engagements are in contemplation which may involve the United States hereafter in questions of good faith concerning its action in the negotiation and ratification of this treaty.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Committee on Foreign Relations did ask the President, through a resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], for all the facts concerning this matter. The Democratic Members, of course, were very largely in the minority and could not control the investigation or the procedure before the committee. They did not control it. My recollection is that when the favorable report was ordered there were only three Democrats present, and two of those voted for it. The third one—if I speak personally, myself—voted against a favorable report. But these agreements to which the Senator is now referring, if made, were probably made through the chairman of the American delegation. At least the presumption is, and I have no doubt the fact is, that the Secretary of State knew more about them than anyone else; in view of the statements made by the two delegates who are Members of the Senate it is certain that he knew more about it. It is certain from his letter that he knew more about what was done than anyone. At the time the committee was considering the treaty the Secretary was beyond the limits of the United States; he was not accessible and could not be brought before the committee; but he is here now, and the questions which have developed are very important and ought to be fully understood by the Senate and by the people of the United States. Why would it not be in order, as the Secretary of State is now in Washington, to move that this treaty be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that committee may ask Mr. Hughes to come before it and make a statement of all the facts which suggested and accompanied the making of this treaty and which induced the American delegates to consent to it? The Secretary could also explain why other nations were not admitted as members, or why they were not to be heard in passing upon controversies between them and members of the treaty. He might also be able to inform the Senate of how the treaty is to benefit America. I have such a motion under consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is in order to make the motion mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee, but it is not even necessary to take that course in order to get the information which the Senate wants and to which it is entitled.

Surely the Senate has the right to know whether secret arrangements are in contemplation either between this Government and France, or between Japan and Great Britain, or between Japan and France, which would affect our interests under the treaty. The Senate formerly discussed these matters in secret executive session. Recognizing the demand of the people of the United States for information as to what is going on in our foreign relations, the Senate has adopted the policy of considering and disposing of these subjects in open executive session. No Senator can be unmindful of the fact that there is quite a general belief among those who have studied the history of this four-power treaty that the Senate is not in possession of a knowledge of the facts which relate to the actual conception and the actual negotiation of this treaty.

If the Senate is going to recognize the right of the public to full knowledge respecting subjects which pertain to the negotiation and ratification of treaties, why should not the Committee on Foreign Relations take the natural course and ascertain and publish the true facts and all the facts? They can not be forever concealed. The course of future events will reveal them. The Senate can either recommit the subject to the committee or instruct the committee to investigate and report.

One of the prominent writers for the Manchester Guardian, Mr. Nevinson, who attended the conference, declared that the negotiation of the four-power pact had relieved the United States from imminent danger of a war with Great Britain within the next five years. The British ambassador has declared that when the treaty was negotiated war in the Pacific Ocean, vitally affecting the security of the American possessions, was impending. The representative of the Far Eastern Republic who came to Washington and sought a hearing in the conference, but was unable to secure it, has said that already a secret arrangement has been effected between France and Japan. Now, a lawyer for the great international banking interests of Morgan and Ryan, a lawyer who stands at the head of the legal profession in the United States, a man who speaks with great authority, has declared in debate that the real motive which actuates him to support this treaty is an international arrangement which does not appear on the face of the treaty, a secret engagement by which Great Britain and the United States combine against Japan. He declared, when interrogated as to the accuracy of his knowledge, that as a lawyer accustomed to considering and determining evidence, its weight and credibility, he has reached the conclusion that underlying this four-power pact, harmless on its face, innocent in its expressed purposes, as declared by the proponents of the treaty, there exists an engagement between our Government and Great Britain which means that they will make common cause against one of the parties to the four-power treaty in case the necessity arises.

Why should not the United States Senate be put in possession of a knowledge of the facts? Nobody questions the truthfulness of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] or of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. The difficulty of the matter is that they know nothing about it. This debate has disclosed from the beginning that neither of them has any very definite knowledge concerning this important subject.

Do they object to the Senate having a knowledge of the facts and to the American people learning the facts, in connection with this charge by one of the leading attorneys of America, who represents more dollars and cents involved in big concessions in the Far East than any other lawyer in the country, always loyal, always efficient in the performance of his duty to his clients? Did anybody suppose that Paul D. Cravath made the declaration attributed to him by the Senator from Idaho without having investigated and without having reached a conclusion in his own mind that his declaration was justified?

I said in the debate the other day that it was unfortunate that Mr. Hughes went on a vacation to Bermuda while the Foreign Relations Committee had this treaty under consideration. I neither expressly nor impliedly charged that he absented himself from the United States to avoid disclosures concerning the negotiation and purposes of this treaty. He is here now.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did I understand the Senator to say that Mr. Hughes went away to avoid a disclosure of the negotiations?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is almost pathetic, when a Senator exhausts as much energy as I am exhausting to make himself understood, if one of the intelligence of the Senator from Minnesota will so completely misunderstand his remarks. I said I did not make any such charge.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator exhausts too much energy in the wrong direction.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should be very glad to apply my energy in the direction of the Senator from Minnesota. He needs enlightenment respecting this subject.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator does not need to be insulting.

Mr. ROBINSON. I said that I neither expressly nor impliedly alleged that Mr. Hughes left the United States, while the treaty was under consideration by the Foreign Relations Committee, to avoid disclosing the facts in connection with its negotiation and its purposes; but I also say that he is here now; he has come back; he is within the jurisdiction of the Foreign Relations Committee. It has just as much right to call him to testify as it had to call Secretary Lansing to testify when the Versailles treaty was under consideration. Why does not the committee call him and secure information?

From the beginning I have hoped that this treaty might so safeguard the interests of the United States, through amendments or reservations, as that I might vote for it. Why make a pretense of publicity; why have these debates in the open; why discuss the subject of the ratification of these treaties in open executive session, if the Senate and the public are to be denied the information necessary to the proper determination of the issues involved? Send for Mr. Hughes and send for Mr. Root, and ask them regarding it. If they know no more about it than the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Massachusetts know, we will at the worst have taken only a useless step. We might write to Mr. Balfour, if none of the American delegates know anything about the negotiation of this treaty. Somewhere somebody knows. If you want the facts, you can get them. If you have entered into an arrangement designed to give any Government a secret advantage over any other Government a party to the four-power treaty, you will not always conceal it.

I am not sure that I would object to a defensive alliance with a peaceful English-speaking nation having mutual rights and mutual interests with the United States, to confer in the Pacific Ocean or elsewhere; but my proposal is that we should act intelligently, and if we make engagements that may hereafter, when disclosed, involve a question of integrity or good faith on the part of our Government we ought to know about the matter now. We ought not to wait until the incidents of future history disclose the facts.

Trained diplomats, men who have spent their lives and exerted their minds in the formation and expression of international policies, are accustomed to concealing in language the real accomplishments they expect to attain. If the United States is to pursue a policy of open dealing, of frankness, and of justice in her relationship with the other nations of the world, why not, I ask you, call the men who know and ask them to testify? We would have a little information. The atmosphere is full of suspicion. Many circumstances established beyond doubt indicate that the four-power treaty does not express on its face all that is implied.

No man is readier than I to adhere to the policy of my country, once it is established, but so long as I am responsible in part for the determination of that policy under the Constitution of the United States, I want to know what the policy is and how it is proposed to consummate it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, let me say first that under our system of government secret agreements binding the United States are absolutely impossible. Nothing of that sort could possibly exist.

Also let me further say as to the treaty now before us that nothing whatever has been concealed, because there has been nothing to conceal. All the facts are known, and known to the entire world. The President, on being asked by the Foreign Relations Committee and by the Senate to give a report of the conversations which had taken place which led up to the completion of the four-power treaty, stated in brief in his message that he could not report to the Senate unreported conversations, and that he would not send, if he had them, tentative drafts of the treaty. We have that message from the President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator will recall that during the Versailles treaty contest the tentative drafts of the League of Nations covenant were brought to the Senate; at least, some of them.

Mr. LODGE. They were published——

Mr. ROBINSON. Why should not the Senate have a tentative draft of this treaty?

Mr. LODGE. They were published at that time in the newspapers.

Mr. ROBINSON. They were published, and the investigations of the Foreign Relations Committee with reference to them. Why can not the Senate now have the tentative drafts if there is to be full publicity now?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know that tentative drafts exist, but if they do exist and were discussed in conversations, to take papers of that sort and present them here as to two or three sections of the treaty would be, it seems to me, a breach of confidence. The others were all published anyway.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. When the Senator says he does not know that any tentative drafts exist, does he mean that he does not know whether they were made or whether they have been destroyed if they were made?

Mr. LODGE. I dare say a dozen or twenty or fifty may have been made, just as we make dozens of drafts of a bill here?

Mr. ROBINSON. Who made them?

Mr. LODGE. The Secretary of State has stated that he made this draft, and that is the truth.

Mr. ROBINSON. This draft, certainly; but what we are interested in knowing is who made the first draft and who made the drafts that led up to this draft? The Senator has said there were 50 or 100.

Mr. LODGE. That was stated in the letter of the Secretary of State. He stated exactly what happened, and I have nothing to add to it and nothing to take away. He made a public statement about it.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to finish what I have to say. The Secretary of State sent in a letter stating all the facts in regard to the making of the four-power treaty. There were no secrets there——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not interrupt the Senator from Arkansas. I wish he would allow me to continue.

Mr. ROBINSON. I had no objection to the Senator interrupting me.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; go on.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator says there were no secrets here. Why did Japan object to France being a party to the four-power treaty?

Mr. LODGE. I am not aware that Japan objected to France.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator of course is aware that Secretary Hughes in his letter stated that was true, that he prepared the first draft which was made after the consent of Japan had been secured to France being a party to the treaty. I think it is fair for the Senator to know, if we are going to have any information at all, why Japan objected to France being a party to the treaty. I realize that the Senator does not care to be interrupted too often, but I would like to know why Italy, Portugal, and the Netherlands were not invited to join in this treaty involving their interests in the region affected?

Mr. LODGE. When the Senator has finished his speech would he mind giving me the passage in the Secretary of State's letter where he said that Japan objected to France being a party to the treaty?

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will give me the Secretary's letter, I can easily do that.

Mr. MOSES. It will be found on page 3712 of the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will ascertain, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield further to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LODGE. I should like to go on and finish what I have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield further to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. LODGE. I decline to yield further. The Senator can examine the letter.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator will, of course, permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no, the Chair misunderstands.

Mr. LODGE. I yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator asked me to point out——

Mr. LODGE. I want to say something myself.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator asked me to point out the language in Secretary Hughes's letter that I was quoting, and I am now ready to do it.

Mr. LODGE. I will allow the Senator to read the passage.

Mr. ROBINSON. It reads:

I may say, however, with respect to the general course of negotiations that after assent had been given by Great Britain and Japan—

Mr. LODGE. Ah!

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but wait a minute—

That France should be a party to the agreement.

I enlarge my question now——

Mr. LODGE. What the Senator asked me was what overcame the objection of Japan.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I did not ask that. I asked why Japan objected to France being a party to the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. The Secretary of State does not say that. He said, "When the assent of Great Britain and Japan had been obtained." That is not what the Senator asked me. That is why I wanted him to read out the language.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator permit me further?

Mr. LODGE. No; I am going to finish my speech in the next five minutes uninterrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield further.

Mr. ROBINSON. All right, I shall take the floor again.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has taken the floor a great deal and very well.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. And I am sure he will take it again and do it very well.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will be in order. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suppose it is not out of order to thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I repeat that nothing has been concealed, and everything is before the country and the Senate that relates to this treaty. All I rose to say was this: The Senator from Arkansas, with great frankness, has referred to the ignorance of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and myself. I do not profess for a moment, and I do not suppose the Senator from Alabama would profess, to equal the intelligence of the Senator from Arkansas, but we are reasonably intelligent and we are, I think, fairly well informed. But, of course, all this debate, although it has been a little covered up, proceeds on the proposition underneath that the four American delegates were not only ignorant but incompetent and were prepared to betray their country.

It has gone further than that. Mr. Cravath, a distinguished lawyer of New York, who has no relation to the conference, who never was consulted, who had no part in it, made a statement that something happened there which never did happen, and the implication there is that the President, who was the only person who could speak outside of the delegation, was engaged in making a secret agreement which he would not have the power to carry out without the Senate with one of the four powers with whom we were negotiating against another power with whom we were also negotiating. That is the implication against the President of the United States.

The other implication is, of course, that the Secretary of State, as one of the four delegates, and his three associates were all engaged in doing the same thing. We may not be as well informed as the Senator from Arkansas, though some of us have had some experience in these matters, but let me say we love our country just as well and we are just as prepared to defend her and her interest as any man who sits upon this floor, and that the President of the United States ought to be spared the implications that are made here that he is engaged in making secret agreements with Great Britain against the Empire of Japan when we are making a common treaty with both of them.

That is the charge which underlies all this, Mr. President. I confess I have tried to listen to it with patience and not resent it, but I do resent this continual implication that is going on. When we come to the statement that has been read here this morning, it is nothing less than accusing the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and the three other American delegates, who include the members of both political parties, of what would have been an infamy. There is not a word of truth in it; and no one has the right to make that implication or to treat his fellow Senators in that way; nor has he any right to make such implications against the President, the Secretary of State, and Mr. Root. They are the men who have led long and honorable lives in public service, and they are just as patriotic—I do not say more so—and just as desirous of defending the interest of this country as are those who have been slandering them by implication and insinuation. I will trust the people of the United States, without respect to party, to stand by the President of the United States, without reference to his politics, and to stand by the four men whom he chose to represent them in this great conference, whose Americanism and patriotism are known to the American people.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has at last become excited and interested over the four-power treaty. He has distorted, unintentionally, I take it, my allusion to the ignorance of the Senator from Alabama and himself respecting this treaty into being a general allegation of ignorance.

Mr. President, if any reply to that portion of the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts is needed, I can only say that I regard both the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Massachusetts as very learned men, of broad experience in statesmanship. I have not challenged their patriotism, nor have I, impliedly or expressly, challenged the patriotism of any Senator who has spoken respecting the four-power treaty. I maintain, however, that concerning the origin and negotiation of this treaty, its real purposes and effect, both the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Massachusetts, as disclosed in this debate, are amazingly ignorant.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator this question: How could there be any secret understanding, if the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama were ignorant of it, unless it was made by the President of the United States?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Massachusetts took no prominent part in the negotiation of this treaty. The Senator from Alabama was absent from the city on account of a bereavement which commanded the sympathy of all of his colleagues. The Senator from Massachusetts evidently did not regard it of sufficient importance to keep himself informed concerning the progress of the negotiations. He tells us now that there were between 40 or 50 and 100 drafts of this treaty made, showing that the greatest difficulty was experienced in reaching a final conclusion as to its terms and conditions.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I wish he would not misquote me.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not intend to do so.

Mr. LODGE. I said there might have been.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I did not go higher than 20, I think.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator did go higher than 20; but the point I am making is that the Senator discloses his ignorance of the facts when he can tell us he knows nothing about the number of drafts that were, in fact, made, and nothing about what those drafts contained.

Mr. LODGE. It is true I did not count them.

Mr. ROBINSON. They were too numerous to count, in all probability.

Mr. LODGE. Ignorant as I am, I can count as high as 20.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes; the Senator can count a hundred, and he did so a while ago, in reply to my statement. But, Mr. President, I do not want to be diverted from the serious consideration underlying this contention. The Senator from Massachusetts has admitted that a great many drafts of this treaty were made. Now he frankly tells us that the Senate can not see any of those drafts; he does not know whether they have been destroyed or whether they are still in existence; but, in any event, we can not see those drafts, and he knows nothing definite about the subject. I respectfully conclude with the statement with which I began, that, concerning the four-power treaty, its origin and its negotiation, and the secret purposes, if any, underlying it, both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama are hopelessly ignorant.

If the charges that secret engagements have been made and that others are in contemplation among the four powers are untrue, the matter might be cleared up by an inquiry into the charges by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is all well enough to say that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] should not have quoted in the Senate the declaration of one who is not a member of the American delegation at the disarmament conference—the declaration made by Mr. Paul D. Cravath—but Mr. Paul D. Cravath is one of the most important men in America, in view of his relationship to the great financial interests which are sponsoring this treaty. Why not ask Mr. Paul D. Cravath the sources of his information and let him tell the Committee on Foreign Relations what he knows about it and upon what facts he bases his conclusion? It would be possible to get Paul D. Cravath here by to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. Send for him, and if Paul D. Cravath, representing the greatest financial interests that exist in the United States, has made a statement without foundation in fact, if he has falsified when he stated that some of the American delegates and some British delegates had informed him of these facts, which he believes to be true, or if he has been misquoted, then he ought to be permitted to explain or made to take the responsibility for his declaration. Why not send for him? Why not send for Mr. Secretary Hughes and ask him about the negotiation of this treaty? He gave no information respecting it of value in his letter to the Senator from Alabama. His letter was not intended to furnish information which the Senate wanted; it was intended to refuse information which the Senate needed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to continue the debate. I do not know just precisely what the Senator from Massachusetts meant by saying that the entire debate was based upon the implication that the President of the United States and the American delegates were and are disloyal. As I said a few moments ago, the statement read by me is a correct report of what was said in a public discussion in the most important financial center in the United States, if not in the world, by a man who, perhaps, represents the most powerful financial interests in the United States, if not in the world.

It will be recalled when the Versailles treaty came back to this country the first copy which was uncovered was uncovered in the possession of the same banking interests represented by Mr. Cravath. A representative of that firm was present at all times in Paris when the negotiations were proceeding; he was counseled with and advised with because of his very great knowledge of international finance, and therefore of international affairs.

I merely recall that to disclose how thoroughly these great interests keep themselves informed, not only from a business standpoint but for other reasons. We also know that the firm in question was represented in the Far East for months during last summer. It was engaged in precisely the same business in which it was engaged prior to the Versailles treaty, and that was in looking after the financial interests of the international bankers in the Far East. That is their business; that is their privilege. I am simply calling attention to it to show their position with reference to their knowledge of what is going on. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that those men know things which the Senate does not know and never will know with reference to international affairs. They have opportunities to know which we can not possibly have, and they have a keen incentive to know, and they ascertain the facts.

Mr. Paul D. Cravath, who represents some of these interests, made this statement in public before a number of citizens of the United States in the city of New York. I assume that he understood the import of his language. I have no doubt that he believed precisely what he said. I have no doubt that he spoke the truth as he understood it, and I felt, therefore, perfectly justified in calling attention to the statement. I want one of two things to happen; I want the foreign policy of this country to be shaped by the President and the Senate of the United States officially, or I want to know precisely the attitude and the knowledge of those who are helping to shape it on the outside.

I do not propose to be placed in the position, of course, of questioning the integrity or the patriotism of particular individuals; I am not concerned about that; I am concerned to bring out the exact facts concerning the influences which work in these affairs. I have no doubt at all that this is one of the most powerful influences which have to do with international affairs and that it is in a position to know all that is going on if anybody is. I make no apology, therefore, for calling attention to it, and I shall make no apology in the future for debating it as the matter develops.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, can the Senator conceive of any reason why Mr. Cravath should not be permitted to be given an opportunity to state to a committee of the Senate the facts upon which he bases his declaration?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not know of any reason why he should not be permitted to state the facts; but I should prefer to take Mr. Cravath's statement made in the minds of his friends, at a time when the import of his statement had not been criticized, and when he had no occasion to state the facts other than as he understood them. I would rather have such a statement than any explanation which could be made.

I can not conceive of Mr. Cravath before those with whom he was acquainted and with whom he associates daily, and, after conversations, at least, with one of the American delegates prior to the time when his statement was made—if he states the circumstance correctly—I can not conceive of his deliberately misstating the facts. There was no occasion for doing so; there was no motive for doing so; the unconscious impulse to do so was not even there, and, besides, I do not think that Mr. Cravath is that kind of a man. I think that he was discussing the matter plainly and sincerely as he understood it, and I think he will be utterly astonished to understand that there are those who do not understand it as he understands it when they were in the same position as he was to know the facts. I believe he believed he was stating facts.

Mr. President, there is one other thing that I might say. I think I will not say it to-day, but no more severe attack has been made upon some of these delegates than has been made by some of those who are now associated with the delegates. I do not care anything at all about the personal feature of the matter; but if those who are trying to get at the facts here and who want the people to know the exact facts and the influences that are working for these things are to be charged with indulging in personalities and indulging in debate of that kind, I will undertake to discuss the views of those who have expressed themselves concerning some of their own delegates, and those views are also in writing.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I want to say only a word. It is very evident that the opposition to this treaty is becoming more desperate each day and is willing each day increasingly to go beyond the bounds of what I believe to be proper.

We have first these gentlemen accepting on all occasions the construction of this treaty by subjects of foreign powers as against the construction of our own delegates. Wherever there is an Englishman that gives a construction against America these gentlemen quote with approval that construction upon the floor of the Senate. They absolutely ignore the construction of our own American delegates and the construction accepted at the conference; and now this morning we find some of them willing to become vehicles of a charge accusing the American delegates of treachery to the United States, and entering into a secret understanding that with the very signing of a treaty they committed an act of treachery to one of the parties to the treaty.

Mr. President, it would have been bad enough to have had that communication placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Idaho after he had the explicit denial of two of the American delegates; but he was not content to rest with that. Following that, he has just said to the country that he believes that Mr. Cravath is a man who knows what he is talking about, and that he is entitled to credence. The Senator from Arkansas says that he accepts as truthful the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama that so far as they knew there was no secret understanding, and in the next breath he demands an investigation to ascertain whether there was a secret understanding, when there could not have been any such understanding unless the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Massachusetts had been parties to it.

Mr. President, that is a sample of the kind of argument that the opposition has come to with reference to this treaty. I realize, of course, that they appreciate that the treaty is going to be ratified unless some Senators will believe in innuendo and slander like the letter of Mr. Cravath and change their votes with reference to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is never necessary for a Senator who is governed by the principles that control a gentleman in his conduct here or elsewhere to use language in violation of the rules of the Senate. I have not consciously slandered any living mortal. My motive is to secure for the American people the information that they are entitled to have before the Senate exercises its constitutional function of advising and consenting to the ratification of this treaty. Neither the Senator from Wisconsin nor any other Senator can restrain me from the exercise of what I believe to be my duty by the use of language violative of the rules of the Senate.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has served in this body for a great many years. By his courage, his frankness, and his manly assertion of his convictions he has earned, in my opinion, the confidence and respect of all to whom such elements of character may appeal. The Senator from Idaho needs no defense or vindication at my hands. In the negotiation of this treaty the representatives of the American Government seek to commit this Government to what we believe to be undertakings of far-reaching importance and consequence. We are combining for some purpose, known or unknown, with three other great powers, manifestly for the purpose of maintaining the peace if not of controlling the politics of the regions of the Pacific Ocean. The Senate has declared its purpose to conduct no secret consideration of treaties. It has declared its policy to discuss treaties in the open. It is important, sir, and future events must prove the statement to be true, that we know what it was that prompted Great Britain and Japan expressly to rescind a contract which they declared had served its day for something which they thought was better, and which would accomplish the same purposes, with more power behind it.

The people of the United States are anxious to know the facts concerning this treaty and its real involvements. Word has gone out from the Capital, from organizations originated for the purpose of propagandizing Senators and inducing them to reach a conclusion respecting this subject which is not based upon the debates or upon the terms of the treaty itself or the information furnished to the Senate respecting it; that before this vote is had a committee of 100 will be organized in the city of Washington, and that committee will send its communications to every State in this Union, appealing to religious organizations to urge Senators from their respective States to vote for the ratification of this treaty. We all know how powerful propaganda has become in the United States during the last few years. I have received in a single day as many as 25 telegrams from different parts of the United States, expressed in identical language, showing clearly that all those telegrams had a common origin.

Mr. President, this question ought to be decided intelligently. It ought not to be determined through the influence of propaganda based upon lack of information. I want to know, before I give my vote for the four-power treaty, what it means to my country. Different constructions have been placed upon it at different times by the very delegates who negotiated it. One of the American delegates stated to some of his colleagues that it constituted an alliance implying force, but that in his opinion it was the best insurance that the United States could obtain for the protection of her possessions in the Pacific Ocean, and for that reason he was for it. Why did he change his construction? What is the true interpretation of the instrument?

I scorn personalities. I made the declaration that at least two of our delegates were lacking in information respecting this important controversy; and I leave it to fair-minded Senators and others who have heard the debate to answer me in their consciences if the declaration is not substantiated by the evidence of the Senators themselves.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—in a desperate effort, I presume, to give this debate a political aspect—lugged in the name of the President of the United States. As the Executive head of the Government, he is responsible for the negotiation of treaties; but I respectfully submit that if the President has detailed information concerning this treaty, that information has not been furnished to the Senate. The President said in his message that the informal negotiations conducted through the long process implied in the declaration of the Senator from Massachusetts when he said that a large number of tentative drafts had been prepared, had either not been recorded or could not be furnished to the Senate; but the delegates who actually conducted the negotiations know the course that the matter took. With representatives of the Far Eastern Republic and others crying out for a hearing, claiming that secret combinations were being formed among the members to constitute this four-power pact, why should not the Washington conference have ascertained the facts concerning those complaints; and why should we be denied now the information if this is a good-faith obligation upon the part of the United States to assist in maintaining peace, and if it does not involve the United States in far more serious undertakings than appear upon its face?

I do not know what will be the final vote of the Senate upon advising and consenting to the ratification of this treaty. I am going to do my duty as I see it, and when I become senile or indifferent to the obligations that devolve upon me by virtue of my oath to support the Constitution of the United States I will inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin what course he thinks I should take; but until that condition arises let me appeal to Senators not to be intimidated by outbursts of indignation, by declarations that this debate is "slanderous" in its character. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is incapable of slandering. The Senate is at liberty to place upon my feeble efforts here such construction and characterization as they seem to justify, but I will not be deterred in what I believe to be the performance of my duty to my country.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say to the Senator that I had no thought of imputing slander to him. The slander I objected to was the letter of Mr. Cravath, and the apparent willingness of the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Arkansas to give some credence to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin perfectly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if there is no further discussion of the treaty to be indulged in at the present time, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business for the purpose of taking up the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is in legislative session, and the Chair lays before the Senate House bill 9859, the Post Office appropriation bill.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads which was passed over will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The first amendment passed over is, on page 10, line 22, before the word "inspectors," to strike out "four hundred and twenty" and insert "five hundred and twenty," so as to read.

Office of chief inspector: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions, at $4,200 each; and 520 inspectors.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the Senator from Michigan wants to speak on this proposition.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to say merely a word in reference to it.

Mr. HARRISON. I think there are some members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads who would like to be present while the bill is being considered. So I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Edge	Kendrick	Nelson
Brandegee	Elkins	King	Nicholson
Broussard	Ernst	Ladd	Norbeck
Bursum	Glass	La Follette	Norris

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, at the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] on Saturday evening this item went over. It is a proposition to increase the appropriation for inspection service by about $235,000, providing for 100 additional inspectors.

The object of this increase is to better serve the interests of the Government through the Post Office Department. These men have to inspect and investigate a great many things which are largely of an irregular character, including frauds carried on through the mail, robberies, thefts of registered and C. O. D. packages, and other matters which require attention. The Post Office Department is the largest business institution in the world. It employs hundreds of thousands of people. Its receipts and disbursements amount to approximately one billion and a quarter of dollars annually. It extends into even the remotest sections of our country, including its territorial possessions. Indeed, it reaches into every civilized country on the globe. The opportunities for irregularities are great. The inspection is absolutely necessary. According to the testimony of the officials of the department, during the war inspection matters were neglected, were allowed to go by default because there were so many other things which required attention that they could not be investigated, with the result that on November 1 last there were 47,383 cases of complaints which should have been investigated, but which could not be. This meant not only that irregularities and crimes have gone uninvestigated, but also that millions of dollars have been actually lost to the Government.

According to the department a sufficient number of inspectors would save the Government from eight to ten million dollars a year. There is a complaint now from all over the country that sufficient inspection can not be had. It is claimed that there should be 10 additional inspectors in the city of New York alone and in other cities in proportion. The parcel post mail has involved a great many losses and there has been a great many losses occurring in the registered mail service and in the C. O. D. service, which can not be investigated, due to the fact that they have an insufficient force of inspectors, who are the detectives and police officers of the department. Many of these cases are from two to four years old. A good many of them have been closed without investigation, simply because of the fact that the department did not have help enough to determine what the situation was in each of the cases. Mr. Simmons, the chief inspector, who, I think, can not be regarded as a Republican politician, says that if he could have his way about it, in the interest of the service he would ask for 125 to 140 additional inspectors.

That there is a demand for this work there can be no possible doubt. If we are to investigate the losses and the irregularities, if we are to investigate the conditions in the various post office it must be done through inspection. I feel that I can say without any fear of successful contradiction that these inspectors are among the very highest class of employees in the post-office service. They are selected, in the first place, from those employees who have served at least four years in the Post Office Department. They are designated to take the examination for this particular service after an investigation has disclosed their special fitness for the work, and under the civil service they are chosen after a successful examination; and, I repeat, they are among the very highest class of postal employees.

I could go into details, but I shall not do that further than to read the following statement, which was presented to us by Chief Inspector Simmons:

On November 30, 1921, there were outstanding, in the hands of post-office inspectors for personal investigation, the following cases:

A cases, registered mail: Complaints concerning the rifling, loss, destruction, wrong delivery, or other serious irregularity affecting registered mail	7,224
C cases, miscellaneous: Leasing premises for post offices and stations, clerk-hire allowances, establishment of extension of city delivery, proper location of post offices, establishment of register of eligibles for appointment at offices of fourth class, improper payment of money orders, excessive cancellations, padding receipts, charges against postal employees, complaints against the service, and miscellaneous violations of the postal laws and regulations	6,977

In the D cases, involving depredations, robberies, wrecks, and fires, there were 5,123 cases which have not yet been investigated.

In the E cases, fraudulent use of the mails, transmission of lottery, obscene, and scurrilous matter, there were 4,579 cases pending.

In the I cases, inspection of post offices, there were 18,338 cases.

Of cases involving irregularities in parcel-post matters, matter of C. O. D. packages, insured packages, there were 4,854. It should also be understood in many of these latter complaints there are sometimes involved as many as 50 matters in a single case, so that the number would easily reach at least 15,000 cases pending in that count alone.

In the R cases, claims for reward for information leading to detection and arrest and conviction on charges of robbery or attempting to rob the mails, post offices, and so forth, there were 21 cases, and in the other cases, rural delivery and inspection of Rural Delivery Service routes, there were 467 cases, making a total on hand on that date of 47,583.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator what date that is?

Mr. TOWNSEND. November 30, 1921. I am told that if the present force of inspectors had nothing else to do from now on, without any addition to the force, it would take from 9 to 10 months to clean up this accumulated docket, and the cases demanding inspection are increasing daily. This is necessarily true because we have never met such a condition in the parcel post department as we have encountered during the last two or three years. Depredations of mail and frauds upon the department are simply overwhelming and these inspections are practically the only means which the Government has for detecting the offenders.

So the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have complied with the request of the department, approved by the Budget Bureau, for the increased appropriation of $230,000, which will pay for 100 additional inspectors at $2,350 per annum each.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Senator concludes may I ask him a question or two?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. As carried in the item, I think the department estimated, as I understood, for 125 or 140 additional inspectors.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think there was any estimate for them, although the chief inspector said the department ought to have that number.

Mr. HARRISON. And the Director of the Budget estimated for 100 aditional?

Mr. TOWNSEND. He did.

Mr. HARRISON. The committee gave all that the Director of the Budget recommended?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It did.

Mr. HARRISON. We have 420 now, not counting the 15 inspectors in charge of divisions?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes. I am not sure whether the inspectors in charge are included in that number or not.

Mr. HARRISON. How long have we had 420?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Since 1919.

Mr. HARRISON. How many were there before that time?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will give the Senator a statement of the increases. I will insert in the RECORD the table on page 54 of the hearings; but beginning with 1914 we had 390, and in 1915 we had 420.

Mr. HARRISON. How long did we have the 390?

Mr. TOWNSEND. For four years. In 1915 there were 420.

Mr. HARRISON. There were how many before the number was increased to 390?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There were 390 from 1911 to 1914, inclusive. In 1915 this was increased to 422, and so remained for 1917, 1918, and 1919. In the appropriation act for 1920 the number was increased to 435, an increase of 13, and that is the number now.

Mr. HARRISON. The 390 included the inspectors in charge of divisions, too? The Senator read the number and said that from 1911 to 1914 there were 390. Did not that include the inspectors in charge of divisions?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it did, but I am not sure.

Mr. HARRISON. If it did include inspectors in charge of divisions, there were probably 15 additional to that number.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Probably that is true.

Mr. HARRISON. There were 405 in 1911, then?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is my understanding. I do not know whether they are included or not, but I do not think they are.

Now, unless there is some further question some Senator desires to ask, I have nothing further to say in reference to this item.

I ask that the table showing the number of inspectors may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Number of inspectors provided for the various years since 1903.

1904	211	1914	390
1905	216	1915	420
1906	226	1916	422
1907	377	1917	422
1908	377	1918	422
1909	355	1919	422
1910	355	1920	422
1911	390	1921	435
1912	390	1922	435
1913	390

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am opposed to the item granting an increase in the number of post-office inspectors. Of course, there seems to be a great deal of interest in the bill. There are now four Senators on the other side of the Chamber and more on this side, as usual.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There are five Democratic Senators present.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I said more on this side than on the other side. Even though there does not appear to be much interest in this particular provision, I am very much opposed to it because I do not think it is in keeping with the promises of the present administration to practice economy. I was in hopes that we would see some retrenchment practiced, especially in the post-office appropriation bill, but the amount of the appropriation is much larger than the amount carried in the post-office appropriation bill of last year. There are many instances in this bill where salaries have been increased and where new jobs have been created, so it is not carrying out the promises that were made to the American people that the present administration, if inducted into office, would serve the people economically and efficiently.

This is the most glaring and inexcusable piece of extravagance that has yet been attempted to be perpetrated upon the Congress. Here are 100 new places in one item, 100 new jobs, which carry a salary of $2,300 each a year. That is quite a good job. Why, every hungry, disgruntled Republican who has not been taken care of already, if this item should be agreed to, would only have to make application to his Senator, and he would be taken care of.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator from New Hampshire will agree with me. So I yield to him.

Mr. MOSES. May I add to that that they would have to serve four years in the Postal Service, because no man can be appointed inspector who has not served four years in the Postal Service.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; we had some requirements and regulations that we thought were going to be lived up to touching the appointment of postmasters, and yet during the first 12 months of President Harding's occupancy of the White House he has written more Executive orders in that time than any President in the history of the country. Why, surely the Senator from New Hampshire has not forgotten that when the President wanted to place a friend in the Marion post office he stamped under foot the regulations of the civil service and appointed a friend there under Executive order. That is all he need to do in the matter of filling these new places, and he will do it if he listens to the Senator from New Hampshire and other Republican politicians.

Mr. MOSES. May I say to the Senator from Mississippi that his last assertion is entirely correct.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought so.

Mr. MOSES. If the President would listen to me, he would write one Executive order and remove from the classified civil service every office which Woodrow Wilson put under it.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator and I believe alike on some things.

Mr. MOSES. Absolutely. On that we are unanimous.

Mr. HARRISON. That is exactly what we are afraid of in this instance.

Mr. MOSES. In other words, the Senator's party having already done this thing, he objects to having us undo it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and I suspect that he voices the views of the majority members of that committee in the statement that if he were President he would repeal the whole civil service law, so far as getting out of office all Democratic appointees and putting in Republicans at one fell swoop.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator does not speak for the whole committee. I believe in the United States civil service law and its enforcement, and have never been governed by any other belief or any act to the contrary.

Mr. HARRISON. We except, then, the distinguished chairman of the committee, and we will say the balance of the majority members would do that.

Mr. PHIPPS rose.

Mr. MOSES. There may be other disclaimants among the members of the committee, and I think I see one coming from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I should like to go on record as being in line with the chairman of the committee on this proposition. So long as we have that law on the book I believe in its absolute enforcement.

Mr. HARRISON. Are there any others over there who want to confess?

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I would like to ask anyone on the other side of the aisle if he believes in the present enforcement of the civil-service rules as to appointing postmasters?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield for an answer.

Mr. MOSES. I did not hear the question.

Mr. DIAL. Does the Senator from New Hampshire believe in the present enforcement of the civil-service rules as to the appointing of postmasters?

Mr. MOSES. I think in some cases it works very badly, because it has been altogether too slow in getting the Democratic postmasters out.

Mr. DIAL. There is no doubt about that. For the information of the Senator from Mississippi I will say to him that they pretend to prefer ex-soldiers, and yet when an ex-soldier makes the highest mark without his preferential, and with his preferential added makes a still higher mark, it makes no difference to them and they appoint the lowest man anyway.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I do not know what pretenses may be made by others. There are absolutely none made by me. I would have no pretense about it at all. I would wipe out the whole plan of appointing postmasters as now pursued and as it was pursued under the last administration. I would plainly go back to the old system of appointing partisan postmasters, and I would follow that, as far as I could, in supplanting the civil-service plan, because I believe an administration should be surrounded by its friends.

In view of the manner in which the classified service remains full of Democratic officeholders, we see altogether too much throwing of monkey wrenches by those Democrats who are in positions, for the sole purpose of discrediting the administration and creating discontent. I shall never be President, neither will the Senator from Mississippi, but I think if either of us ever occupied the White House for more than 30 minutes' time, each of us would write an order wiping out the whole thing.

Mr. ODDIE and Mr. CARAWAY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield for another confession. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ODDIE. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that I think his remark a few minutes ago was an error. He said there were more Democrats in the Senate than Republicans. He is incorrect, because there are twice as many Republicans in the Senate now as there are Democrats.

Mr. HARRISON. That was before we started talking about patronage. As soon as the Republican Senators in the cloakroom heard us talking about patronage they all came in.

I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was merely going to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire who said he wanted the administration surrounded by friends, that I do not know where he could get them.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire understood that suggestion.

Mr. MOSES. I did not hear what the Senator from Arkansas said.

Mr. HARRISON. It was a good thing the Senator did not.

Mr. MOSES. That is entirely possible.

Mr. HARRISON. So the Senator from New Hampshire has really voiced the sentiment of a large part of the Republican membership on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads when he said that they would throw out all of the appointees under the last administraion and put in some Republicans. I suppose he would agree with me that the creation of 100 additional inspectors' positions is to carry out that program.

Mr. MOSES. Is that a question directed to me?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I stated it as a fact.

Mr. MOSES. I am not sure how these places are going to be filled if they are created, but I hope they will all be filled by good Republicans. I am afraid, however, they will not be.

Mr. HARRISON. They might be filled by Republicans, but not by good Republicans.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, Mr. President, there are no Republicans but good ones.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is a confession that the Republicans are all dead.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the committee has stated that there were 40,000 complaints pending on November 30 last.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There were 47,000 protests or complaints.

Mr. HARRISON. There were that many protests or complaints. I am not surprised at that statement. I am really surprised that there were not more complaints or protests than 40,000.

Mr. MOSES. Certainly; because most of them came over from the previous administration.

Mr. HARRISON. No; Will Hays had been Postmaster General for nearly a year at that time, and naturally many complaints and protests were being made on account of the manner in which the Post Office Department was being run. Naturally there should be robbery and fraud cases—we are under Republican rule. There were also many hungry Republicans throughout the country. I do not blame them. There were a good many more in November, 1920, than I wanted to see; I am sorry there were so many, and they, too, are sorry now. However, be that as it may, when the Republicans came into power they needed the jobs. Many Republicans living in various localities wanted to become postmasters. They knew that the incumbents were supposed to serve out their terms, which in numerous instances did not expire for two or three years; but they learned from their Senators and Representatives, smart as they were, how to get the incumbents out. They were told as to a particular postmaster, "The only way to get him out, for he is an efficient man and has served a good while, is to lodge a complaint against him and file a protest. You must get one or two Republicans to make oath to the fact that he is not an efficient officer, and then present the case to the Post Office Department, which will send a post-office inspector down there who will investigate the matter, and on his report the Democratic postmaster will be dismissed and you will be given the job." So thousands and thousands of complaints and protests were filed with the Post Office Department. The same situation would have arisen, perhaps, if a Democratic administration had succeeded a Republican administration. I have no doubt that it probably arose, to a greater or less extent, when the Democrats came into office nine years ago, and it arises naturally under any change of administration. Naturally the Republicans want investigations made quickly, not for the purpose of detecting real fraud but for the purpose of getting Democrats out of office and putting Republicans in. That is the only reason for this demand to create 100 additional offices with compensation of $2,300 a year?

Mr. President, this is going quite too far. I can not understand how Director Dawes of the Budget Bureau was ever convinced that he should recommend this increase. He estimates for the full amount requested by the Post Office Department, so the chairman of the committee says. So he, too, is in this conspiracy to furnish 100 Republicans with jobs and to put a number of Democrats out of office and put more Republicans in. Of course, I know that I am arguing for Republicans to vote for this amendment; I have not the slightest hope of getting a Republican to vote against this proposed increase.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. If I did not misunderstand the Senator, he admitted that if conditions had been reversed at the last election the same request would have been made to the Democratic administration. Then, why does he take the situation so seriously at this time?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from New Jersey evidently was not listening to me, and I am sorry the Senator was mistaken in his understanding. He had in his mind, perhaps, all the Democratic postmasters in New Jersey who had not been removed from office, and was thinking how the adoption of the committee's proposal would affect that situation, and so he did not understand me correctly.

Mr. EDGE. No; we are doing very well in New Jersey. I think we have now placed Republicans in charge of practically all of the post offices there, or certainly a large majority of them.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, there is certainly a bad situation in New Jersey, and there must be plenty of complaints from that State. What I said was that there was no doubt that there were many protests and complaints when the Democrats nine years ago assumed control of the Government. I did not say, though, that the Democratic administration sent in an estimate recommending a large increase in the number of inspectors. We did not do that. That would have been too palpable, and Congress would not have stood for it at all. That would have been too bald. The distinguished chairman of the committee just stated that in 1911 there were 405 inspectors in the service. There has been since that time an increase only from 405 to 435 inspectors, 15 of whom are inspectors in charge of districts. For 11 years the department got along with that small increase, and now it is proposed, at "one fell swoop," to increase that number by 100. We are told that Mr. Simmons, who is the head of the inspection service and not so strong a partisan as is the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], says that 125 or 140 additional inspectors are needed.

Mr. EDGE. I presume, then, that it is to be inferred that under a Democratic administration the removal of Republicans from office would have been effectuated without the formality of an inspection.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that would have been justified, because the Republicans had had control for 16 years, and naturally there was great cause for complaint and necessity for immediate change. But, Mr. President, if the department got along as well as it did with 420 inspectors, there is no reason for this large increase of 100 inspectors. There is not a Senator here, I think, but knows that there is politics behind this proposal. Of course we have always tried to keep politics out of the Post Office Department. Will Hays got abused for trying to do so and for not appointing more Republicans than he did. However, he did pretty well. The Republicans are getting the Democrats out fast enough. Do not let us go at it too strong. If 25 additional inspectors are needed—and I do not think they are needed—let us reduce the number to 25; but there is no cause for this large increase except to make investigations quickly so that Democrats may be removed more quickly.

The addition of 100 inspectors at $2,300 a year involves a pretty big expense, for their compensation alone will amount to $230,000.

Mr. KING. In addition they will receive the bonus.

Mr. HARRISON. It is suggested to me by the Senator from Utah that the additional inspectors will receive the bonus. I ask the Senator from Michigan whether that is correct?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not understand that they will.

Mr. HARRISON. If they are to receive the bonus it is carried in an appropriation bill; but, in any event, there is an increase of $230,000 involved.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There will be an increase of about $230,000, which includes $49,000 for substitutes, as I recall.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have said about all I desire to say in regard to this amendment. I submit that it should not be adopted; that the department should get along with approximately the same force which they have had for a long time. Many of the 40,000 complaints to which reference has been made are designed for no other purpose, as the Senators know, than to remove some Democrat from office. The additional positions of inspector are intended to be political appointments purely and simply. The regulation that an employee in the Postal Service must serve four years before he may be appointed an inspector could be wiped out by a stroke of the pen. The Postmaster General could request the Civil Service Commission to make an exception on account of the work being of an emergency nature, so that the additional inspectors could be appointed without regard to the regulation, or the President of the United States, as he did in the case of the Marion, Ohio, postmastership, could issue an Executive order that these additional inspectors should be appointed without regard to the civil service.

Of course, Republicans would fill these places. I have no particular fault to find with that, but $230,000 a year is too high a price to pay for that privilege. I had a letter the other day from a little town in my State, the postmaster of which has a few more years to serve, stating that a complaint was lodged against him; that an inspector was sent there; that the man who was scheduled to succeed the present incumbent met the inspector at the train, carried him home to lunch and dinner, entertained him overnight, and conveyed him in his Ford car back to the train. No doubt the inspector will submit a report that something is wrong in that post office, and the present incumbent will be fired. Yet the Senator and his committee wanted to authorize inspectors to administer oaths, but that provision fortunately went out of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What harm would such an authorization do? I have never been able to appreciate the Senator's viewpoint as to that matter. What political advantage would it be if an officer of the Government were empowered to administer oaths instead of asking some one else from the outside to administer them for a fee?

Mr. HARRISON. In many instances the inspector goes to a village to make an inspection in order to find fault, and all the time he knows who is going to succeed the present incumbent. The program is all arranged. To clothe inspectors, therefore, with authority to administer oaths would frighten the incumbent of the office and everybody else; the inspector would act as accuser, as juror, and as judge in the whole transaction. I was opposed to granting so great an authority to political appointees of the Government. Furthermore, if they could not have their way, they would probably go to the court and endeavor to indict those whom they were charged to investigate. There are very few of them who do not soon become autocratic.

So I submit, Mr. President, that the amendment carrying $230,000 for 100 additional inspectors should be rejected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I realize that it is not necessary for me to say a word in answer to the Senator from Mississippi. We all, I think, understand the political attitude of the Senator, and appreciate that he feels charged on all occasions with the responsibility of misrepresenting the attitude of the present administration. He says that this is an extravagant proposal and that it is suggested and designed for political purposes only. I deny both allegations. If I did not believe that an increase in the number of inspectors would involve a great saving to the Government, a saving, as I believe, of from eight to ten million dollars a year, by enabling these cases to be investigated, I certainly would not favor the appointment of a single additional inspector.

If, as the Senator from Mississippi says, these are to be purely political appointments, and the additional inspectors are to be created for the purpose of getting rid of present postmasters, his argument defeats itself, for already there are 420 such inspectors, and if they are of such a character as the Senator from Mississippi suggests, they could inspect the offices and produce the same results as he alleges will be produced under the amendment proposed by the committee. The tables which I have presented to the Senate show clearly that there are more than 47,000 cases now pending, many of which have been pending for four years, because it has been impossible to reach them in the ordinary course of business with the force available. If the laws of the land are to be carried out and the duties of the department are to be executed in a proper manner, a sufficient inspection force must be provided, for in my judgment it is one of the greatest and most necessary adjuncts of the whole Postal Service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. KING. Statements have been made upon the floor of the Senate within the past two or three months that in some States the persons representing the Republican organization have made recommendations which they have submitted to the department in favor of various candidates for office. The Senator may recall that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] called attention to the dispenser of patronage in a certain district in Tennessee, I think——

Mr. WILLIAMS. West Tennessee.

Mr. KING. West Tennessee, charging—I have forgotten the amount—$10 or $20 or more for his indorsement of a certain person as a candidate for a position; and the record from which the Senator quoted also showed that it was understood that no person could be recommended for a position unless he paid this dispenser of patronage a certain amount. Whether that was based upon the amount of compensation derived from the office, or based upon some other ground, I am not quite clear. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not his committee has made any investigations of those matters, or whether the attention of the committee has been challenged to the very great wrong of which the Senator spoke?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator I desire to state that I have heard those loose statements made throughout the Chamber and by individual Senators. I have said to the Senator from Tennessee that if any man received his appointment through any such means as that, or paid any commission for getting an office, it was his duty as a Senator to make that complaint when the nomination was presented to the Senate, and then the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads would have jurisdiction of the matter; but our committee have no authority to go out and investigate all the political statements that are made with reference to things in the different States, and we do not propose to do it. The Senator from Tennessee has now submitted, after a long time, some 8 or 10 cases of persons who have been recommended for appointment as postmasters, and he has asked that a hearing be had upon them, and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is going to give him a hearing; and all of the facts that are pertinent to that issue will be brought to light and a decision made afterwards.

I do know that some Senators have approached me with the statement that some undue influence was exerted to secure the appointment of certain postmasters, and then later these same Senators have come to me and asked that these same postmasters be confirmed, thus practically admitting that the complaints were not well founded.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to one thing that I think perhaps threatens the recurrence of a very disgraceful and a very disastrous page in American history.

I do not suppose there is a self-respecting Republican in or out of this Chamber who is not ashamed of the carpetbag era in the Southern States, especially in the cotton States. I take that for granted; yet I am very reliably informed that when there were three applications for the post office in the county seat of my county—I started to say "my home post office," but it is not—there was a gentleman applying who had come down from a State north of Mississippi somewhere—I do not know where—and had been in the county two years, but had not lived in the city for which the postmaster was appointed until after the result of the late election was learned. Two other boys made application, both of them service men. One of them had served over the water in France and the other had served here, and had never had the good fortune or bad fortune, whichever it may be, to get to France. There is a law giving a preference to the veterans of the late war—I do not know why they call them "veterans," by the way; they are all quite young boys, but the men who served in the late war—and I never knew what the influence behind it was, but there was something, and this man was appointed.

So far as the man himself is concerned, I want to say a few more words. I inquired about him, and I found that, as far as I could learn, he was a very nice fellow, very honest, and all right as a man. I therefore, of course, made no objection, because I belong to that old school of politics which thinks that when a Republican administration is in power it ought to have control of the offices, and that when a Democratic administration is in power it ought to have control of the offices. I am not objecting to that, but I am objecting to the lack of frankness in the situation. I would rather just come out and say that—it would seem to me more honest, and upon the whole much more frank, one gentleman talking to another—and be through with it; but, of course, speaking as a partisan Democrat, there is nothing that I would welcome more than a Republican administration undertaking once more to carpetbag the South. It would not only finish them there, if they needed finishing—and they do not, much—but it would finish them in all other parts of this country where men have good sense and a sense of fairness.

Understand, now, I am not complaining about this individual man. His name was White, I believe. I think, if I remember now, that it was White. I made inquiry about him, thinking that if he was either incompetent or dishonest I would object, but thinking that from my standpoint, at any rate, I would not object if he was neither. I did not find that he was either incompetent or dishonest; but if we are to give these so-called veterans—"service men" would be a better expression, a more honest expression—the preference, then they ought to have it, and if we are going to give a man a preference in a southern town because he came from somewhere north of the State, then I should like to know that, because when I am fighting a man I always like to know upon what ground we are fighting. I can fight more squarely and more satisfactorily to myself, and I imagine he can, too, if he is honest.

I hope that the Senator, as chairman of the Post Office Committee, will look into that matter and see, in the interest of the country—not in the interest of the Democratic Party, mark you, but in the interest of the country—that no carpetbagging goes on in the South now. That is out of style, it is out of fashion, it is out of popularity, and it can not possibly help the party in power; but that would not be my reason for objecting, of course. I would do anything to hurt the party in power, but in the interest of the country you want men holding office in any section of the country who are more or less identified with the people who live there, who think with them—I do not mean think with them politically, but otherwise—and who represent them, and who can be counted upon as fellow citizens when even a demagogue is making a speech and addressing the audience.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, just one word in reply to the Senator, as this is a matter which undoubtedly will be involved in some of the other questions.

Of course, I know nothing about carpetbagging in the South.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator goes on, may I say a word further?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Make it short, please.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I will. I want to say that I heard lately, in connection with an application for the marshalship in Mississippi, that the gentleman was relying upon one distinguished Senator from Illinois and another from Ohio to get the place, although he was not to the manner born, precisely; but I hope all those things are, as the Senator calls them, political rumors.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, there is no more doubt about their being political rumors than there is that the Senator has been talking. I have heard on the floor of the Senate of two or three cases where it was claimed that a man who was not a citizen had been appointed postmaster. Under the rules, he would not be nominated; but here, again, in several of those cases the Senators have come to me and said they have investigated and found that the nominee was a citizen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This man White had remained long enough to be a citizen. He had spent the requisite statutory time, but that was all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, this rule that we are talking about for the appointment of postmasters is simply an order that the President has issued for his own benefit. There is no law that puts postmasters of the first, second, and third class under the civil service. There was not when Mr. Wilson was President. The President has the right and the authority to nominate men for all of these offices without any restrictions whatever. Then the Senate must act in confirmation. He has said that soldiers shall be given the preference in the examination. They hold a civil service examination, and in that examination the commissioners give these soldiers or ex-service men 5 per cent advantage, a marking of 5 per cent above what their ordinary markings would indicate. Then the Civil Service Commission recommends the highest three to the Postmaster General, and he selects any one of the three eligibles.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has that always been the case?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have never heard of anything contrary to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. A case came to my attention where three men stood the examination and got on the eligible list; but in order to get in a man of their choice rather than one of the three who got on the eligible list they did away with that examination and had another examination held, and put in the man that they wanted to put in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. These three men that I was talking about were all on the eligible list.

Mr. OVERMAN. What does the committee do about a case like that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The committee does nothing about a case like that. The committee is interested simply in knowing that the candidate who is presented to the Senate is fit for the office. That is what the committee does. There is no law to govern us in reference to the matter. If any Senator has any objection to one of these candidates as being unfit for the office, all he has to do is to make complaint to our committee, and we will investigate the case.

Mr. OVERMAN. So the committee would not investigate a matter of that kind, where three men stood the examination and got on the eligible list, but the man they wanted to appoint did not get on the eligible list, and they did away with that examination, held another examination, and put him in?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The committee would not feel like rejecting on that ground a nominee who had been presented, because no law has been violated. That is the President's concern, and not ours; but I have said to Senators, "If there is any case that you want the committee to look into or want me to look into I will get for you from the department the facts in reference to it." That is what I am doing now at the instance of the senior Senator from Virginia.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is very fair about that, and has been all the time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But there is not anything that we can do in reference to that except to pass upon the fitness of the nominee who is presented here.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. KING. The Senator, I am sure, believing, as he does, in the civil-service system—at least, I so understand him——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. KING. The Senator obviously ought to be interested in the observance not only of the letter but of the spirit of the law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the case just suggested by the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is not in the law at all.

Mr. KING. May I complete my question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; but the Senator said "in the law."

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that in the case just suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, where an examination was ordered for the purpose of finding who would be eligible for the appointment, and an examination was held, and four or more persons took the examination, and three passed, but the Republican whom the Republicans wanted to be nominated did not pass, and they set aside the examination and ordered another for the purpose of discouraging those who took the examination——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should think that would be a very unusual thing for the President to do. I would not do it; but, as I said to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], "If you have any case of that kind you can find it out yourself by going to the department and learning why it was done, and if you do not feel like doing that I will do it for you if you will submit your case with your statement to me."

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that such a procedure as that is improper, and that the committee ought not to recommend for confirmation a man nominated under those circumstances?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I never have heard of such a case. If that is being done for that reason—and I do not believe any such case exists—I want to find out about it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am informed by leading Republicans in a certain locality in my State that that has been done, and they are very reliable men.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I introduced a resolution here to investigate the appointments in connection with postmasters in presidential offices, and also rural carriers.

To comply with that resolution would have taken a great deal of work and time, and would have resulted in some expense. I talked with the Senator from Michigan, who is chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and he told me that if I would give him the name of any case he would investigate and ascertain the facts in reference to it. I have given him the names of some, of which I hope he will make a thorough investigation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator gave me the name of one, and I am investigating that case, and the result will be presented to the Senator as soon as I get the facts.

Mr. SWANSON. The information I have is of this character, that they have a system now of appointing acting postmasters, whose names do not have to come to the Senate for confirmation. Under the law as it existed up to about two years ago, when the Senate was in session and an appointment was made, the appointee could not get his salary until he was confirmed.

The Executive had for years overridden the Senate in connection with confirmations, so that law was passed. About two years ago, I think, the law was modified, so that in case an acting postmaster is appointed he can get his salary until the regular postmaster is named.

All through Virginia they have a method of appointing acting postmasters, whose names do not come here for confirmation, and they are continued in office from time to time. Then they have an examination, and I understand that when an examination is held, under this Executive order, in many cases where they desire to appoint the man who is acting as postmaster, he is not included among the eligibles, but he continues in office. I understand that is the fact in the case which I gave the Senator for investigation, and I am informed that it is done to a large extent all over the United States.

It does seem to me that that is wrong in two respects. First, it is a violation of an order issued by the President of the United States. The President of the United States ought to know as to whether his Postmaster General violates orders which he issues in connection with the appointment of postmasters, and I think the committee ought to investigate as to whether the Executive orders of the President, who makes these appointments, have been knowingly or unknowingly violated in connection with the appointments.

Secondly, it is really a fraud on the Senate. They continue in office indefinitely, and the power of the Senate to confirm or reject nominations is nullified by a procedure like that. I think such cases ought to be investigated. If this is continued and continued, the time will come when Senators on the other side will regret the existence of any such practice as that.

I offered my resolution so that that matter might be investigated, and I think if the President is frank and candid he will say that he has no intention of enforcing that order, but will appoint whom he pleases and send the name here for confirmation. I think the position of the Senator is that we ought to investigate to determine whether appointees are competent and whether they are fit, but that the President's order should not be one way and his action another in connection with some of these appointments.

In connection with this increase of 100 inspectors, I want to ask what we want these inspectors for.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Was the Senator here when I made my statement in regard to that?

Mr. SWANSON. I was not. I ask the Senator the reason.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I dislike to have to repeat myself in this matter, but I stated that your committee discovered there were something over 47,000 cases on file on November 30, 1921, which had been before the department for investigation for from two to four years; that the present force was unable to make those investigations; that they had closed many of the cases without any investigation at all, and that thereby they believed they were losing from eight to ten million dollars a year.

I specified just what class of cases were being investigated.

The chief inspector of the department was with the department and in the service during the war, and he is not a Republican, as I understand it, although I may be mistaken; he certainly is not actively a Republican, having been in the service a long while. He told us that these matters had to be overlooked during the war, and that for the last three or four years they have not been able to keep even current with the cases which come up, to say nothing about those which should have been investigated in the past.

We are asking for these additional inspectors for the purpose of getting the best kind of post-office administration possible and to apprehend and convict the criminals against the Government who are robbing the mails, who are committing frauds upon the department almost constantly. The number of cases is growing by leaps and bounds, due to the increase in the parcel post, which carries much insured mail, and also due to the increase in the number of C. O. D. packages. The people who suffer losses in those services are demanding damages. Yet we are unable to trace the cases up for the purpose of finding the criminal and stopping the practice.

Mr. SWANSON. I can understand why that condition has occurred. During the last year in Virginia nearly all the inspection has been of frivolous cases, the inspectors investigating the political activity of some Democrat whom they desire to get rid of before his time expires.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But the great bulk of these cases did not arise during the last year. Most of them arose under the Democratic administration.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I know of cases in Virginia, in the largest towns, where the postmasters are men who are competent, honest, and capable, as good postmasters as were ever there, where charges have been preferred of a frivolous character to furnish an excuse to get rid of them before their term is up. There is hardly a day that my mail does not bring from some postmaster, an honorable, capable, worthy man, the information that some frivolous charge has been preferred against him here at the department, and that an inspector will be there to see whether he ought to be removed before his time is up. It is political activity, and, as I understand it, cases of theft, cases of robbery, cases of defalcation are delayed in order that they may have a little investigation as to whether the man displayed too much political activity in the last election, in order to remove a Democrat and get him out a year or six months before his time expires. That is what I complain of.

If these inspectors are needed for this work they ought to have them. If they are needed simply to accomplish frivolous political removals they ought not to have them. My experience in Virginia has been that most of these inspectors are engaged in frivolous examinations to create vacancies in which to put acting Republican postmasters.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the Senator's statement is based on just about as solid a foundation as that of the senior Senator from Mississippi, who suggested that the old carpetbag system was being established, or might be established, in the South. There is no foundation for either of them.

Mr. SWANSON. I know in the case of Norfolk and I know in the case of Alexandria and I can name a dozen other offices inspectors have been sent to get rid of men of as high character, business ability, and efficiency as ever were in the post office, on frivolous charges. I can cite cases where men have been removed on frivolous charges, their resignations asked for, and the inspecting force stopped examining into these defalcations the Senator has talked about, these robberies, in order to get up some frivolous charges against Democrats in order to let a Republican get the position six months or a year earlier than the term would ordinarily expire.

Mr. EDGE. I understood the Senator from Virginia to state that the system of appointing acting postmasters is a development of the present administration. If the Senator made that statement, or if I was justified in drawing such an inference from his statement, he certainly is incorrect. In the largest post office in the State of New Jersey, at Newark, an acting postmaster was appointed a year or more before the close of the last Democratic administration. A civil-service examination was held in the usual way, and this man did not pass among the first three. He was kept on and on, until after the present administration came into power. Then a postmaster chosen from those three, any one of them, was appointed in order to relieve an assistant postmaster in the office in the largest city in the State of New Jersey. That was under a Democratic administration.

Mr. SWANSON. Under the former law, if a postmaster was appointed while the Senate was in session he could receive no compensation until he was confirmed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That might have been the law at one time, but it has not been the law for several years.

Mr. SWANSON. The law was changed so that an acting postmaster might be appointed. Before that time the Senate was deprived of its right of confirmation by the continuation of the person in office, and then that law was passed. I do not know whether it was two years ago or when the law was passed, but now they allow an acting postmaster to get his compensation before he is confirmed, and that has been used, and I think abused, in many cases.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It may be, but the executive department has been abused also. It sends nominations to the Senate and they are referred immediately to the committee. Then a subcommittee submits them to the Senators of the State, and many cases have been held up since last December without any complaint being made, without any return to the committee. Senators are holding the present incumbents in office to extend their term of office. I assume that having the right, when it has been determined that they propose to defeat the action of the Executive and of the Congress, the President can appoint an acting postmaster where it is necessary.

Mr. SWANSON. Where the appointment is properly made, in pursuance of the President's order, I think a Republican ought to have the office, and I do not complain at that, if the man appointed is competent; but I do think that we ought to see that the President is not imposed on by his own Postmaster General. I think he meant what he said when he issued his Executive order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator has presented to me the only complaint which is verified by any statement of facts, and that I am looking into to learn what they really are.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is mistaken about one statement he made, and I will call his attention to it in a moment. In the case of Big Sandy, Tenn., the postmaster was appointed the 1st of last October. He was not confirmed, and charges were made against the appointee. Thereupon the nominee was immediately appointed acting postmaster.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator mean that the Senate rejected him?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senate did not reject him, but it did not pass on him. Charges were made against him and filed with the committee by me. At the new session he was reappointed, the charges were refiled with the committee, and I have asked for the appointment of a subcommittee several times, even in writing. The acting postmaster at Big Sandy has been acting since some time last October or November, and the charges have never been disposed of. I wrote the Senator last week, and then I wrote him again this week, urging that that matter be disposed of. There are several others of a similar nature.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator only a few days ago submitted eight, and that, according to my recollection, is the first time the Senator has ever asked me to appoint a subcommittee of investigation, and I told him I would do it, and that is what I am doing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to know that the Senator has appointed a subcommittee and that the case will be looked into.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is one thing which has given me no little trouble. Some Senators on the other side have said to me that I should not put on a subcommittee a Member from the State where the proposed postmaster lives, but I have not felt that way about it. I propose to follow the old course, and to put on that case the member of the general committee who constitutes the subcommittee for that State, so that he can bring every possible fact to light.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say that the Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, has assured me that he will comply with a request I have made of him. I am satisfied he will do so, because I have known him long in public service, both in the House and in the Senate. He has assured me that if I will furnish him the names, which I expect to do, of different persons where the order of the President has been violated and acting postmasters have been continued contrary to the spirit of the law, in violation of Executive order, he will investigate it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I will examine them and report to the Senator in regard to them. I have submitted to the department the one case which he has presented to me, and have asked that I be given all the facts in reference to it. I stated to the Postmaster General just what the Senator stated to me.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to tell other Senators that instead of pressing my resolution, compliance with which would take a great deal of time, I will withhold it, in view of the fact that the Senator has assured me that he will investigate cases which are presented to him.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, mention was made a few moments ago of certain Tennessee civil-service cases, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] asked what was done with the charges made by me as to such cases. I placed these charges months ago before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and at the same time discussed them to some extent on the floor of the Senate.

The facts about that particular matter are that the Republican national committeeman of Tennessee is named John W. Overall. He was the Republican referee and official dispenser of patronage in Tennessee. Through letters and checks and other documentary evidence it was found that Mr. Overall was selling his influence in the selection of postmasters and other civil-service employees. From one man he would collect $10 and from another $25, and the checks were presented as proof, showing where he had received the money. He made an explanation of it in which he admitted he had received the money, but that he had contributed it to the Republican campaign fund.

I sought to get a hearing before the Post Office Committee. The committee did not grant a hearing on the matter. I thought it was a matter that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads ought to look into and ought to examine into. I made specific charges, setting them out in detail, signed my name to them, submitted copies of the canceled checks showing Mr. Overall's name on the back of them, and submitted his admission that he had received the money for his influence in bartering those civil-service positions. The result was, Mr. Overall came here and had conferences with the Postmaster General and others, and a settlement was said to have been entered into in some way by Mr. Overall that hereafter he was not to have the influence that he had formerly enjoyed in the distribution of patronage. I was very glad to hear that. A man like Mr. Overall, who sells his influence, and especially for civil-service appointments, ought not to have any influence with any administration.

I filed these same charges with the Civil Service Commission, but that commission took no action in regard to them. I naturally would not expect them to, because they are composed entirely of Republicans and anyone can understand that they would not care whether civil-service positions were bought or sold under them or not if their Republican friends were interested. At all events, whether they did care or not, the proof was clear as to the purchase of civil-service positions and they paid no attention to it. Failing to get a hearing before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and failing to get any action from the Civil Service Commission, and there having been appointed by the Vice President under a resolution passed by the Senate a special committee to look into civil service, I then brought the matter up before that committee and it has been buried there, too. So I am unable to get a hearing on my charges at all. They have not been considered. Their Republican friends will not investigate, though the charges are specific and the proof is clear. The only thing in the world that was done was to permit these charges to be filed before the special committee. I believe the special committee is now no longer having any hearings. Apparently it is one of the things of the past.

What is the result? The result is that a few days ago there came in from Liberty, Tenn., the appointment of a man by the name of Whaley, who is a nephew of this Mr. Overall. Mr. Whaley enjoys the proud distinction of having been indicted a short while ago for bootlegging, and numerous other charges have been filed against him. His neighbors and friends write me that he is a well-known and notorious bootlegger in the community, and the decent people, practically all the decent people, as I recall, most of them Republicans, have appealed to me to see that this man is not confirmed. Whether you gentlemen on that side of the aisle will confirm such a man or not remains to be seen. He is appointed at the behest of Overall, whose nephew he is. He is even appointed over another deserving Republican.

All I can do is to ask for a hearing. If the Republican Party wants to take the responsibility for confirming such a man, I am simply going to see that there is a record vote in the Senate on it, and I am not going to allow him to be confirmed, if I can prevent it, until there is a record vote on the confirmation of a man of that kind. I think it is the duty of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to examine into these violations of the civil service and to examine into the methods by which such appointments are made.

While I am on my feet I want to say a word or two about another matter. Much has been said about the President's preference order in favor of the soldiers. In that order it is simply provided that in the rating of papers ex-soldiers shall have a preference of 5 per cent; that is, an additional 5 per cent. What is the result? It is utterly meaningless so far as soldiers are concerned. It constitutes no preference whatever in favor of the ex-service men. It is a fraud on its face. Here is the way it is worked in my State: Two soldiers—it may be both are Republicans, though that is immaterial—and a third man, who is a Republican worker or henchman, take the examination. The henchman gets the place. The soldiers get the preference and the henchman gets the job. The reply is that the President's order does not apply to that case. The soldiers may have higher ratings, but that makes no difference.

Let us see how it works out when no civilian takes the examination. Let us take the case of MacKenzie, Tenn. A remarkable thing happened at MacKenzie, Tenn.; three Democratic ex-service men were on the eligible list. That presented a problem, indeed, to our Republican Civil Service Commission and to our Republican administration. Thereupon somebody asked for a rehearing, and the Civil Service Commission set aside the examination, which they themselves had held, and set aside the eligible list, and now they are going to have another examination. In the meantime, if my memory serves me right, a temporary Republican postmaster holds the job.

That is one effect the President's order has had. It is a fake order so far as civil service is concerned. It is a hoax. So far as the ex-service man is concerned it is a complete hoax. Why do I say that? Let me give another illustration.

In the little town of Rutherford, in my State, there were three eligibles, and, by the way, this time they were not in the unsatisfactory condition that the MacKenzie office was in. Two of the eligibles were Republicans and one of them was a Democrat. They had a leeway of two and they could have appointed either one of the two Republicans and it would have been all right. But there was a well-known Republican politician down there, who had been dismissed from a bank for some sort of work that was not considered by good people to be the right kind. It was something in connection with a Liberty-bond transaction. He stood the examination and at the same time took the precaution to have his wife stand the examination, too, so that if there was anything about his moral conduct or moral character involved he would still be where he could have his wife appointed.

The Civil Service Commission did not put either his wife or himself on the eligible list. They published the list of eligibles without the name of either. They put three soldiers, two of them Republicans and one a Democrat, on that list. Somebody came up to Washington and asked for a reexamination before the Civil Service Commission and, of course, received it, and they made a rearrangement of the civil-service list and put the wife of the politician first on the list and she was or will be appointed. It has been so given out. The soldiers are left out again. The reexamination was for that purpose. The Civil Service Commission is not only a Republican aid society, but it is fast becoming an antiex-service men's society.

So, Mr. President, I say that so far as the President's order in regard to civil service appointments is concerned, the soldiers ought to know that it is a meaningless hoax. It is a patent fraud, so far as civil service is concerned. I recall now but one post-office appointment or examination in all that have been held in my State where a soldier was not on the eligible list. In my own home town I think there was the only case where a soldier was not on the eligible list. There have been few soldiers appointed in the State, and in many cases a Republican ex-service man was on the eligible list as well as a Democratic ex-soldier. It is not any question of parties, so far as the soldiers are concerned, but it is a direct, active, working arrangement between the Civil Service Commission and the post office administration against the ex-service man. So far as President Harding's civil-service order as to the ex-service man is concerned, it is a miserable, misleading civil-service cheat, and the ex-service men and all the people ought to know it.

Coming now to the proposed amendment, the bill now pending before us provides for 520 inspectors. During the 132 years of the history of this Government the Post Office Department from the very beginning and on up until the present time has never had more than 420 inspectors, although the number has been constantly growing year by year. Yet here at this time 100 new inspectors are added at one time. Only about 30 have been added during the last 10 years. Of course, it is for political purposes. The business of these inspectors will be to go around and examine into the post offices now held by Democrats or undeserving Republicans and get them out. That will be one of the principal jobs of the inspectors.

The idea of increasing the number 20 per cent at one time, the idea of there being necessity for 100 more inspectors when the total number during all the history of the Government has never exceeded 420, is something marvelous and can not be understood on any other ground except that our Republican friends want these men to get busy to "turn the rascals out."

That may be entirely proper, but it does seem to me that to expend this large sum of money for that purpose in these times when economy is needed is certainly not in accordance with the professions of the Republican platform.

I think under any circumstances the number of inspectors is too great. I urged the committee to cut that number in two, to make it 50, and surely that would be an enormous increase, a perfectly enormous increase. I have no idea that the House will ever consent to any such increase as 100. I do not see how it can in justice to itself ever do it, and surely the Senate ought not to do it. The Senate ought not to agree to this enormous increase in the number of inspectors. The inspectors' salaries were tremendously increased, and properly so, some time ago. The positions are very desirable. They get a good remuneration for that work and that is all very true, but those of us who feel that the expenditures of the Government ought to be reduced to some extent at this time certainly feel that we ought not to add 100 inspectors to be sent around over the country in this way.

Mr. President, the amendment should be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. If this amendment should be adopted, would I be precluded then from offering an amendment or proviso to that provision?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that while the bill is in Committee of the Whole the Senator would not be precluded from offering such an amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. At the end of line 23, page 10, after the numerals "$1,660,800," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the appointment of additional inspectors shall be made upon certification of the Civil Service Commission as heretofore provided.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have offered the amendment to see whether or not we can adhere to the rule of the past that these inspectors be named upon certification of the Civil Service Commission. On the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator need not do that. It is so clearly in my mind that that is exactly what will be done that I have no objection to accepting the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I shall not ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment is agreed to. The question now is on the amendment in lines 21 and 22, page 10, increasing the number of inspectors, as amended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered on that amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move to amend, in line 22, by striking out "520" and inserting "470"; in other words, reducing the number by 50. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I would like to discuss the amendment to the amendment for just a moment. I caught the Senator's remark that we want to "turn the rascals out," but I do not agree to that proposition. That is not the intention of the proposed increase. The Senator from Tennessee sat as a member of the committee and he made no motion in committee to decrease the number from 100 to 50.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. PHIPPS. No such motion was made.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is in error as to that.

Mr. PHIPPS. I think the record will show that there was no such motion made.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not want to do me an injustice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. PHIPPS. I certainly do not want to do the Senator an injustice. If the Senator made that motion, though I was present at the committee meeting, I did not hear it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offered such an amendment in the committee.

Mr. PHIPPS. I want to try, if I can, to get those Senators who listened so intently to the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to consider this question from another viewpoint, and that is this: In 1910 there were 390 inspectors; in 1914 there were still 390 inspectors; in 1916 and 1917 there was a slight increase in the number; and for the past two years there have been 435 inspectors.

In 1910 the receipts of the Post Office Department were about $223,000,000. Last year the department carried on a business far in excess of double that amount, to say nothing of the enormous amount of parcel-post matter, which naturally increased the opportunities for theft.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PHIPPS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator stated that in 1911 there were 390 inspectors.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator from Mississippi is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. If I understood the chairman of the committee, he stated that there were 390 inspectors, and probably 15 inspectors in charge of divisions, which made 405 inspectors in 1911.

Mr. PHIPPS. No; they were included in that number; 390 was the total number, as I understand.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator from Michigan to say to the contrary when I asked him the question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I gave the Senator from Mississippi my opinion. I still think they are not included, but I am not sure.

Mr. HARRISON. They are not included.

Mr. PHIPPS. However, whether the 15 were included or not, the proposed increase is relatively a very small one. There are, in round figures, 30,000 cases involving theft, lost articles, and failure to deliver mail which should be investigated, but which have not been investigated because of an insufficient number of inspectors.

As to the question of the political possibilities involved, and the allegations that the increased inspection force is designed to bring about the removal of Democratic postmasters, certainly that thought has never entered my mind, and I do not believe it has entered into the mind of any man who has advocated this increase in the number of inspectors. I think the department should be given a sufficient number of inspectors to carry on its work, to put an end to the losses to which I have referred, to run down some of the men who have been thieving from the mails, whether they be postal employees or otherwise, to make some examples, and to stop this crime, which is a disgrace to the service.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson	Norris	Spencer
Ball	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Stanfield
Brandegee	Kellogg	Overman	Sterling
Broussard	Kendrick	Page	Swanson
Capper	King	Pepper	Townsend

Gerry	McKinley	Sheppard	Watson, Ga.
Hale	McNary	Shields	Williams
Harris	Moses	Shortridge	Willis
Harrison	Nelson	Simmons
Heflin	Nicholson	Smith

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to announce that the following Senators are detained from the Senate in attendance upon the Committee on Finance:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]; the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]; the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]; the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]; the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]; the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]; the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]; the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]; the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]; and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there are some Senators here now who were not in their seats when this amendment was read, and probably there are some who do not know now what they are going to vote upon. I merely want to say, so that the Senators who were not present at the time may know, that this is an instance where they can vote in the interest of economy. By voting for the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee they can save $115,000. I might say, too, that in 1911 there were 405 post-office inspectors. To-day there are 430 post-office inspectors, 25 only having been added to the force within 11 years. Here the committee proposes to add 100 at one time. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee proposes to add only 50.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I understand that he is temporarily absent, unavoidably so, and therefore I am not at liberty to vote. If I were, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KING. I have a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. May I inquire if the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. BALL (after having voted in the negative). I find that the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has not voted. I have a general pair with him, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARREL], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. EDGE. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] are detained on business of the Senate.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent, and that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] are absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 41—as follows:

YEAS—21.

Ashurst	Heflin	Sheppard	Underwood
Dial	Kendrick	Shields	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	King	Simmons	Williams

So Mr. McKELLAR'S amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word about this amendment.

During the hearings of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee I was very much impressed with the chaotic condition of the inspection service. I think perhaps more than any other member of the committee I urged that something be done to settle complaints and cases of larceny and dishonesty in the Postal Service. It appeared that the number of cases that had not been acted upon was over 47,000, and that a dishonest postmaster or clerk or carrier could not be detected and his books and accounts inspected for a year or more, or for an unnecessarily long period of time, even after it was known or believed that an official was dishonest. It seemed to me that the most important thing that the Postal Service needed to-day was an increase in its corps of inspectors.

I think the committee amendment is a good one, and I believe that even more inspectors than the number provided for in this amendment are necessary. If we are going to carry on our Parcel Post Service efficiently, if we are going to transport valuable property, if we are going to maintain honesty in the Postal Service and exact it and demand it of our postmasters and our clerks and our carriers, we must have a proper inspection service. That is why I voted just now against the amendment to reduce the number of inspectors, and why I am supporting this amendment, because I believe it will do more than anything else in this bill to put our Postal Service on a basis of efficiency, and will tend to promote honest service.

The service rendered by the inspection corps is, on the whole, excellent, and the labors of these inspectors undoubtedly tend to keep our postmasters on their job and stimulate all postal employees to do their work very much more satisfactorily. The value and efficiency of our Postal Service can be largely measured by the extent and quality of the inspection service.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. Did the Senator state that there were 47,000 prosecutions for violation of law in the Postal Service?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There are 47,000 complaints pending, which it is desired to have inspectors take up and report upon, that the inspectors have been utterly unable so far to look into.

Mr. SHIELDS. I just want to say to the Senator that the number of cases that came before the courts last year was not much over one-fourth of that. Some 12,000 cases of violation of law came before the courts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, the number I gave includes complaints that are sent to the department of dishonesty and inefficiency, larcenies, embezzlements, and other violations of the postal laws.

Mr. SHIELDS. I simply want to say that if only 12,000 cases came before the courts, less than one-fourth of the number of complaints, there must have been a great many false complaints in that number.

Mr. DIAL. They ought not to be dignified with the name of complaints. They are just grumblings.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, does the Senator know how many of those complaints are of political activity, with a view of having the postmaster or other person removed?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I must take some of the responsibility for this amendment. I am willing to charge the Republicans with many shortcomings; but I think that more than any other member of the committee I requested and demanded that the appropriation for the inspection service be increased and the number of inspectors increased. Of course, they are appointed by civil-service examination; but I want to say that the one thing in this bill that seemed to me to be most important and helpful to the service was this single item, and I myself have had, as almost every Senator here has had, the experience of sending complaints to the department that have come from one's constituents, and having the reply come back that whenever they get around to do it they will look into the matter, but that the large number of cases pending now may delay the inspection for a long period of time.

Mr. SWANSON. I think most of the inspectors in Virginia have been busy investigating the removal of Democratic postmasters in order to put in Republicans. I should like to know how many complaints and removals have been made on account of political activity—just that one item—and how much time the inspectors have spent on that. I have an idea that if during the last year the inspectors in Virginia had been engaged in investigating the real, genuine complaints in connection with maladministration of the post offices, robbery, and various defalcations they could have done a great deal more work than they have done; but I know that they have been engaged mostly in finding some excuse to get rid of Democrats and put in Republicans. I know that there has been a great deal of that, because scarcely a mail comes in that some Democrat does not tell me, "An inspector is here investigating me on some frivolous charge," and then they ask for his resignation.

I am willing to vote for whatever is necessary to take care of the business of the Government, but I do not like to vote to create a corps most of whom are to be used to get rid of deserving Democrats before their time expires.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, from the way the Republicans in my State are acting, it seems as if they do not want efficiency. Where they have had examinations and where the present postmasters and ex-postmasters received the highest marks, yet if an inefficient and unsatisfactory person makes a passing mark they go out and pick him up, notwithstanding the fact that he never had any post-office experience at all. That is pretty universal in my section of the country, and I hear it is in a good many other parts of the country. If they wanted competency, they would continue a postmaster or an ex-postmaster, or they would promote some man in the office who had had experience; but anyone along that line is banned, kicked out, to enable them to send in some man who has had no experience in a post office or any other line of business.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I dislike at all times to disagree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], as he is generally right. I can not understand how he allowed some one to hoodwink him in this instance, because this is about the rawest deal that has ever been attempted in this body. It was not denied, even by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] that it was to take care of a hundred Republican office seekers and pay them $2,300 a year.

Mr. MOSES. What is that?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from New Hampshire may get 10 of them. I hope he will.

Mr. MOSES. What did the Senator say—that I had admitted that this was to take care of Republicans? I said I hoped it was, and I still do cling to that hope, though it is pretty faint.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no question but that it is to take care of a hundred Republicans.

Mr. MOSES. I hope that is true.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and the Senator expresses the sentiment of the majority members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not generally interrupt the Senator when he is making his political arguments, but when he includes the majority of the committee in any suspicion, even, that this is for the purpose of caring for Republicans, he is entirely wrong. That may go with his colleagues, but those on the committee who have given attention to it know that it is not so. These men must be appointed after four years in the service. They are not taken from the outside, and the Senator, for fear that they might be, offered an amendment which compels the selection of these additional men from the civil-service register now.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and I hope it will be followed out, but the Senator knows that the President can issue an order which will invalidate that whole proceeding. The Senator knows that the President has done that in a hundred instances; has issued his Executive order and appointed persons to political office where the appointments should have been under the civil-service regulations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know nothing of the kind.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator knows that the President issued an Executive order in regard to the post office at Marion, Ohio, and appointed a friend of his there. No civil service examination was held, although there were ex-soldiers who desired to take the examination, but they had no opportunity. There are other instances I could cite.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the Senator to say that the President had issued such an order in a hundred cases. Does the Senator mean to say that that occurred in a hundred cases? If that is correct, I should like to have him enlighten the Senate by giving the names of those offices.

Mr. HARRISON. I name the one at Marion, and if the Senator will agree with me, and Senators on the other side will vote for it, I will tender a resolution this afternoon calling on the President to send to the Senate a list of Executive orders appointing persons to office.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator agree to vote for such a resolution?

Mr. WILLIS. I challenge the accuracy of the statement that the President in a hundred cases has issued an order of that kind. He issued an order as to the Marion, Ohio, office, in his own State, where he had a perfect right to do it, and I think it was perfectly defensible.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator indorses that action?

Mr. WILLIS. I do indorse that action. I think the President has not issued a hundred orders, and I think the Senator can not name one other.

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Senator does not expect to name any other except Marion; but that is an illustration.

Mr. WILLIS. That is not a hundred.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator from Mississippi will offer a resolution calling upon the President to send to the Senate the names of the persons who have had appointments through Executive order, and I will see whether the Senator from Ohio, the successor of the distinguished President, will help me to have such a resolution passed.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator include in the resolution a request that the department furnish a list of those who were appointed by Executive order under the preceding administration?

Mr. HARRISON. I shall be glad to do that, if it will help the Senator out.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator also put in a preamble to this effect: "Whereas it has been charged by the junior Senator from Mississippi that the President has issued 100 such orders: Therefore, be it resolved"?

Mr. HARRISON. If that will do the Senator any good, I will do it.

Mr. MOSES. I wish the Senator would, because I am persuaded that there is more joy in the heart of the Senator from Mississippi over one instance of that kind than over 99 instances where the Democrats threw the Republicans out in 1913.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will see that there are many other cases, except the Marion (Ohio) case, when the list comes in, if it ever does.

Of course, as the elections in November approach, we find that the action of the Senate and the House is with an eye single to that election. This provision was written in this bill to help some candidates in the elections. The fact that there were 40,000 complaints on file on November 30 last is no reason why the taxpayers of America should be burdened with an additional $230,000 to provide for 100 additional inspectors. There has been an increase of only 30 in the last 11 years, as admitted by the distinguished chairman of the committee.

This action is in line with what occurred before the Finance Committee of the Senate last Saturday. I am sure Senators read the story which appeared in the Washington Post, the Republican organ, on yesterday, and I am sure that those of the committee who may be present can tell us whether or not it is true. It reads:

When Senators FERNALD and HALE, of Maine, appeared before the Senate Finance Committee St. Patrick's day and asked for a tariff of 35 cents per bushel on Irish potatoes, the solons formulating the tariff measure thought they were the victims of a joke. But the case of the Maine farmer was ably set forth, and the appeal of the two Maine Senators was given serious attention.

After each had announced that he "had nothing more to say," Senator WATSON, with an amused gleam in his eyes, said:

"Senator FERNALD, we were much impressed by your argument, but we understand that you have a fine voice, and if you will favor us with a song, say 'Throw Out the Life Line,' it may aid your case."

So I suppose the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads are throwing out the life line to some sinking Republican candidates in the elections this coming November. The article further states that—

Senator FERNALD blushed at the compliment, but, recovering his composure instantly, cut loose, and in strong, well-modulated tones rendered the hymn as requested. In the Capitol corridors passers-by were reminded of an old-fashioned camp meeting. Senators applauded vigorously, and later insisted on an encore, for which Senator FERNALD sang "Lead, Kindly Light."

At the close of the recital Senator WATSON, on the part of the committee, announced "the duty on Irish potatoes will be 35 cents per bushel. There is no denying such an appeal."

So I presume, since you are throwing out the life line, you are resolved to put on us these hundred additional post-office inspectors, at an expense of $230,000 a year.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I was not here when the Senator began his remarks, and I have not read the article in the paper to which he referred, but I did see an article in one of the papers which told of a hearing before the Finance Committee which Senator FERNALD and I attended, and there was something said in the article about a song that was sung. I think if the Senator from Mississippi had been at the hearing he would have realized that the argument was made and the committee had reached its decision before there was any singing whatever, and that the singing had nothing whatever to do with the decision.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very glad to hear that the Republicans are not so easily influenced.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I always get weary when I hear Pot calling Kettle black, and it goes on here every time there is a change in administration. I do not find fault with the man who is opposed to the civil service law and wants to have it repealed and every office in the United States put on the political pie counter. I concede that a man can favor that and be consistent. He may be right, although I think he is wrong. The man who holds that opinion when his party is in power and when the other party is in power is consistent, and is following a course which I do not criticize. The man who is a civil service reformer, however, and a believer in civil service when the other party is in power, and believes in the doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils" when his party is in power is inconsistent, whether he is a Member of the Senate or simply a precinct committeeman. There are too many men in high position in the United States, in my judgment, who are thus inconsistent.

I believe this amendment is a good amendment, though I may be wrong about it. I think it is guarded. If there is any further guard which can be thrown around it to take it out of politics, I would like to vote for it. It provides, as I understand, that these inspectors shall be selected under civil-service rules, and I believe it is conceded that for the efficiency of the Post Office Department they are needed. To my mind, that is sufficient.

Believing that, and that they are to be appointed under civil-service rules, and that there is not any politics in it, if the law is enforced, I am in favor of it; but if the Senator from Mississippi will offer a resolution, whether it is amended as the Senator from Ohio asks that it be or not, simply providing for a request upon the President in regard to his setting aside the civil-service rules for the appointment of a postmaster at Marion, Ohio, and to give his reasons why he did it, I will support the Senator from Mississippi to the best of my ability in passing that resolution.

I will support it also if he makes it general, and calls upon the President for his reasons every time he has asked that the civil-service law be set aside. I will be glad to support it if he will include the prior administration and ask what the record shows as to how many times and for what reasons President Wilson set the regulations aside. Publicity is good. It will help a great deal, I think, in bringing about good government and the enforcement of the civil service law. If we are to have a civil service law, then it seems to me in common decency, in common honor, we ought to be for it, no matter what party is in power, and if we are genuine sports, if we believe in a square deal between man and man, and we have a civil service law at all, we will enforce it just as faithfully when our party is in power as we will ask the other fellows or expect them to enforce it when their party is in power.

I believe that President Harding took a step backward when he modified the rule which existed which was made by President Wilson in regard to the appointment of postmasters. I concede he had a right to take the step that he did. He had a right to wipe it off the statute books and say these post offices are now the spoils of political warfare.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But this is not a statute. It never has been a statute.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator referred to it as a statute.

Mr. NORRIS. The rules are printed just the same as a statute.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This was merely an order issued by the President.

Mr. NORRIS. As long as it is there it has the effect of a statute.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But the President issued this order just the same as President Wilson did, to assist him in making a selection in the appointment of a postmaster.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. I do not think there is any misunderstanding as to what is the law and what is the rule, although the rule is the same as a statute except the President can set it aside when he wants to. I concede he has a legal right to do that. He must take the responsibility when he does it. He has the power to set the whole thing aside. Every President has set it aside in a great many cases. I can see where there might be cases where he would be justified in setting it aside. I do not believe that President Wilson was justified one-tenth of the times when he set it aside.

I do not believe President Harding is justified in setting it aside for the appointment of a postmaster at Marion, Ohio. The post office at Marion, Ohio, is not any different from the post office at any other place. Because President Harding happened to live in Marion, because that was his home, does not give him any greater moral right to set aside the law or the rules that provide for the nonpartisan selection of a postmaster in Marion. It gives him no more right than it would to set it aside in Philadelphia, New York, or in the city of Washington. I do not think he was justified in doing it, and I would like to see in writing the reasons he could give for doing it. The appointing of a postmaster to that office is not his private business. But he is in the same class with President Wilson when he sets lots of them aside. I concede that, and because I did not believe that Wilson did right when he set them aside is no reason why I or, in my judgment, any other Senator should defend President Harding when we think he is wrong in setting them aside. We must either have a civil service law and rule enforced in good faith or repeal them entirely and go back to the spoils system.

The idea that offices are the personal property of some official of the Government, whether he be the President or a Senator or a Congressman or a governor or anybody else, is preposterous. It is contrary to good government. The modern idea of civil service will not stand for it, and every man who studies the question will admit that is true. I know that civil-service officials are only human. We never get perfection, but I think it is a good deal better than saying we will put these offices upon the political pie counter. Why should there be a Republican postmaster in Marion, Ohio, because there is a Republican President in the White House? What difference does that make? What has the postmaster at Marion, Ohio, to do with the tariff, with the collection of internal revenue, or with the other administrative features with which the President in the White House has to deal? What difference does it make whether there is a Republican or Democratic postmaster in Minneapolis, in San Francisco, in Portland, Oreg., or McCook, Nebr.? They have nothing to do with the administrative features of a great Government like this.

Must the people in every town and in every village and in every city, every time there is a change in the White House, every time there is a change in the political party in power in the country or even a different faction of some party, go through the formality of having a change in postmaster because there has been a change of the political boss somewhere along the line from the postmaster up to the President in the White House? How nonsensical, how foolish, how contrary to good government! How absolutely destructive it is of efficiency in office! Who can defend it?

Does the Democratic Party stand for it? Does the Republican Party stand for it? Read their platforms and see what they say, where for years and years they have been saying to the people when they were placing a platform before them, "We believe in the efficient enforcement of the civil service law. We are going to enforce the civil service law. We are going to provide for efficiency in office." Yet as soon as they get into office more or less, to a greater extent, and sometimes mostly more, they throw aside their promises by which they did get admittance to the official chamber and say, "Now we believe in dealing out these offices and paying our individual or political debts with them at the expense of the taxpayer and the efficiency of administration.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. Does the Senator think the spirit of the civil service law requires that the appointment shall go to the applicant making the highest mark?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. I said a while ago that I agree with that principle.

Mr. DIAL. For instance, I have in my hand a record of the result of a civil-service examination where the then postmaster, a lady, made 88.35. The next highest mark was made by an ex-soldier of 79.28. The third mark was made by an outsider who had had no experience and was 73.55, and yet the lowest man received the appointment.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that is right. It is just as wrong for the Republicans to do it as it would be for the Democrats to do it.

Mr. DIAL. I was satisfied the Senator would think it wrong.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the error in the change in the rules that the President made. That is the error he committed, in my judgment. It was a serious mistake. I objected to it then. I asked in writing that it be not done, when the newspapers were saying he was contemplating doing it. It is not, in my judgment, treating the American people fairly or squarely. I concede that sometimes the rule might result in getting a man in who, if I were holding the examination or if I had the papers to examine, I might think was the wrong man, or if I lived in the same town I might know he was the wrong man, and in my judgment that they were picking out the wrong man for that office.

So it is not a perfect system. No one has ever contended that it is. But when we adopt a system we ought to follow it out in good faith. If we say to the American people we are going to enforce the civil service law, then we are bound to do it in good faith, and if we do not we deserve condemnation and to be taken by the back of the neck and the seat of the pants and thrown over the political fence, as the people have done many, many times with both political parties. I wonder sometimes if the people do not get tired of jumping from the frying pan into the fire, from fleeing from the lack of good faith of the Democratic Party only to have it prove to be the same when the Republicans get control of the administration.

I know that men who talk like I am talking, for instance, in the Republican Party are condemned by other Republicans. They say, "How about those fellows who helped you into office"? First, let me answer that. What did we mean when we said we would enforce the civil service law? Were we acting in good faith? Was it a promise that we ought to keep? Do we believe in it now after the election the same as we did before the election when we were asking for votes?

If we said it then, if we promised it in writing, and if we are honest with the American people, we are going to redeem that promise, whether it hurts or whether it does not. It hurts sometimes; I admit that.

Then they say, "What would you do, and the rest of us, if the workers had not helped us to get in?" Whenever the American people put a man in office for selfish purposes, in order to get out of it something of a personal, selfish nature, like an office or money, or something of that kind, I want to know it. If that is why the American people are putting their servants into office, then that is not right. The only thing then is, if that is the right principle, we must provide as many offices as there are voters.

The millions of American citizens who have voted for Senators and Representatives in Congress and other officials were not thinking of anything selfish for themselves. They were thinking of efficiency in office. They were doing the best they could to decide between two or more men for the office, who would redeem his pledges, who would be loyal to the people. They did not want a man put in office whose highest duty in his judgment would be to divide the swag among the men who had been his friends. The American people do not believe in that. A man ought to be honorable and square enough when he is running for office to say what he is going to do. His party ought to be honest and square enough to say what position it takes on this great principle of civil service before an election, and then ought to be straight enough to do what it agrees to do after elections.

If the amendment is agreed to and the provision stays in the bill and the civil service law is not complied with in the making of appointments, I hope somebody in the Senate or in the House who knows what the facts are will demand an exposure of them all. I for one want to say that I shall be glad to help bring about an investigation or an exposure just as quickly now as though the Democrats were in power.

I want to say to those Republicans who are clamoring only for the spoils of office for somebody, who are asking the taxpayers of the country to foot the bill while they pay their personal debts and obligations with office, that they are not as good Republicans as I am. I want to keep the pledge that we made. They are going to violate it. I believe after election in enforcing the civil service law just as we said before election we would. I want to say to those who are now asking that the civil service rules be set aside, or who are defending, without reason and without cause, the President, even though he be our candidate, for setting them aside and putting the offices on the political pie counter, that I do not believe they are good Republicans. They are violating the Republican pledge. In my judgment no man can do a better service, even to his party, than to expose it when he thinks it is wrong, when its officials have violated the law, and to assist in bringing about an investigation to let the people of the United States know it all in detail.

So I repeat that neither the Senator from Mississippi nor any other Senator can embarrass me by saying he is going to ask for an investigation or for the reasons. I am glad he is going to ask for them. He is justified in asking for them. The President of the United States ought to be required to state his reasons when he sets aside the law just the same as I ought to be required to do so if I set it aside or asked that it be set aside.

The next amendment passed over was on page 10, line 23, to strike out "$1,367,800" and insert "$1,597,800"; and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$1,430,800" and to insert "$1,660,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the committee as amended is agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was on page 11, line 5, to strike out "$375,000" and insert "$474,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 12, line 6, before the words "at $1,350 each," to strike out "five hundred" and to insert "nine hundred and eighty-six"; in line 8, before the words "at $1,450 each," to strike out "two thousand six hundred and twenty-five" and to insert "two thousand five hundred and thirty"; and at the end of line 8, to change the total appropriation from "$4,530,000" to "$4,999,600," so as to make the paragraph read:

The VICE PRESIDENT. This amendment was passed over at the request of the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. OVERMAN. I simply asked that the amendment be passed over in order that I might make inquiry about it. I now have no objection to agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment as heretofore amended is agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 24, after line 17, to insert:

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of extending, continuing, and further carrying out the provisions of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, and all other acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923; and the sum of $65,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for such purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924; and the sum of $75,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for such purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925; and the sum of $7,500,000 is authorized to be appropriated for the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of forest roads and trails for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924; and the sum of $7,500,000 is authorized to be appropriated for the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of forest roads and trails for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 25, after line 9, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 8. For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices in the city of New York, including the Borough of Brooklyn of the city of New York, at an annual rate of expenditure not in excess of $18,500 per mile of double line of tubes, including power, labor, and all other operating expenses, $513,911.50: Provided, That the provisions not inconsistent herewith of the acts of April 21, 1902, and May 27, 1908, relating to the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, shall be applicable hereto: Provided further, That either party to the contract for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices may apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission at any time after October 1, 1922, and before July 1, 1923, for a revision of this rate, its decision to be effective after July 1, 1923, but in no case shall the rate exceed $19,500 per mile.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, the question of the pneumatic-tube service has been discussed so often in the Senate that I do not know that there is any necessity for discussing it again. I think the mind of the Senate is made up on the question and Senators know how they are going to vote. In the past I have consistently opposed the pneumatic-tube system and I still occupy that position. I think at this time to reinstall the pneumatic-tube service would be a useless expenditure of money. I do not believe the service is an efficient one, but, on the contrary, that it is a great detriment to the postal activities in the four or five cities where it has heretofore been in operation. I think it would be a great mistake to return to the pneumatic-tube system. It has been discontinued because of its inefficiency, and the reasons now urged in favor of its being again employed are, in my opinion, not sound. Since the administration has changed there has been a very busy lobby engaged here in the effort to restore the system. It would be very unfortunate if the system were restored; it ought not to be used. I do not believe it will save the Government a cent; but, on the contrary, it will involve an enormous expenditure of the people's money without any corresponding benefit.

The pneumatic tubes carry only a very small portion of the mail. The system is antiquated and worn out, and can not possibly be of any value. As I have heretofore stated, I think that to restore the tube service would be a reckless waste and extravagance in which the Government ought not to indulge. After stating my reasons for voting against it, I am simply going to ask for the yeas and nays, and then, if any other Senator desires to speak upon the subject, of course he will be at liberty to do so. I now ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I agree with one of the statements the Senator from Tennessee has made, and that is that there is no use in arguing this question over again, as he has done. We should take a vote on it, and the amendment ought to go in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts dismisses this question as he dismisses many other questions, with his ipse dixit.

Mr. MOSES. No one of course wants to interfere with the Senator from Utah if he desires to speak.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask some questions. If the Senator from New Hampshire, in the plenitude of his wisdom can advise us as to the reason for again making use of the tube service, I shall be glad to obtain it; but I was going to ask the Senator from Tennessee if any different report has been made from that which was made two years ago and four years ago.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I think the report of the majority is substantially the same as the one heretofore submitted, and the minority have likewise submitted their views, which I put in the RECORD the other day. It is the same old contest. The Senator will recall that a number of years ago several gentlemen got together in some of the large cities and had the tube system installed. By the experts who were brought forward, however, it was proved that the system was of no practical value; that it did not expedite the mails in any substantial degree; that it was costly and expensive; in fact, about four or five times more costly and expensive than moving the mail by automobiles. As I recall the appropriation for carrying the mails by vehicles is the same as before. It has not been reduced by reason of the proposed installation of the tubes.

One of the great arguments in favor of this tube system, as the Senator knows, is that in the various cities the traffic on the surface is so great that it is well to have this underground system of tubes. That might be so if any considerable part of the mail were carried in tubes, but no considerable part of the mail is carried in tubes. I doubt if it will ever take off three automobiles in any city in which the tubes are replaced. In other words, substantially the same expense as at present will have to be incurred for automobile service in transporting the mails in these five cities, and we will have the additional expense just for sending a few letters through these tubes.

I have examined the tubes personally. The conveyors are about 12 to 14 inches long, and about 6 to 8 inches in diameter. They are said to carry a great many letters. I imagine that ordinarily a tube would carry two or three dozen letters. I am talking about what would be done in real practice. Of course you can stuff a great many letters in there, but comparatively a very few are really carried. The conveyors look to me like playthings. As a matter of fact, this is what they are. Certain gentlemen in years gone by secured in some way a contract with the Government to put them in, and they were put in, and these gentlemen reaped considerable income from having put them in. During the last administration they were discontinued, and these gentlemen naturally want to reinstate them, and they have had a very extensive lobby here for that purpose. Mr. President, learning in some way my particular views, though I did not know the man who called me, one of them called me up over the telephone this morning to say that he took dinner with Col. W. J. Bryan in New York a few days ago, and that Col. W. J. Bryan sent me his best regards, and had told him to urge upon me as a public duty to vote for the tubes. Whether Colonel Bryan sent this message or not, of course I do not know. I can not believe that he did. I will not believe it until I hear further from Colonel Bryan. But it all shows to what length the tube lobbyists are going.

I told him to convey my compliments to Colonel Bryan and to say that I was glad to hear from him, but that I did not think he knew what he was talking about if this gentleman was giving me his views; that if he had ever examined the tube system he never could be for it, and that if Colonel Bryan actually took that position I thought Colonel Bryan was absolutely wrong.

I am making this statement here on the floor of the Senate because I want Colonel Bryan to know what is apparently being said in his behalf by lobbyists of the tube system. They have lobbied in season and out of season ever since I have been in Congress. They have infested the Halls of Congress in an effort to keep in this system of tubes in the first place, and they lost; but now, when there is a change of administration, they have infested the Halls of Congress in an effort to put them back. I doubt if there is a Senator in this Chamber who has not been approached by these lobbyists for the tube system in the various cities.

If the tubes were efficient, if they would do any good, if they meant efficiency of service in these cities, if they meant even an expedition in the transportation of mail in these cities, they ought to be put back; but I am convinced from a personal examination, as well as from the hearings, that this is a mammoth steal; that it is a fraud upon the Government; that the sole purpose is not the expediting of the mails, but it is to give large sums of money to men who have not put any actual money in the enterprises, but who are getting money out of the Government by way of rent for alleged facilities which have cost them no actual money.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether, since that matter came up before and was voted on, there has been a further investigation made; and if so, by whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes. I do not think these gentlemen have ever let up for a minute. They have had investigations made.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not talking about what the Senator classifies as the lobby. When the Democrats had control of the Senate, the majority of the committee, led by the late Senator Bankhead, of Alabama, the chairman of the committee, were in favor of putting back the tubes. A whole lot of testimony was published at that time, and I am asking the Senator whether the matter has been reinvestigated since then; and, if so, by whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Postal Commission took some testimony in New York.

Mr. NORRIS. Recently?

Mr. McKELLAR. About a year ago.

Mr. NORRIS. What do they report this time? What is their report?

Mr. McKELLAR. Their report is favorable to the tubes. There is a majority and a minority report. Several members of the commission are opposed to it, and the majority of the commission is in favor of reinstating the tube system.

I asked the president of the company, when we were in New York taking testimony about the matter, to submit a statement of the amount of money they had actually put in. It has never been done. They make a contract with the Government, out of which they virtually run the business. They virtually create the business out of the rentals they get for it, in my judgment, and in order to get the facts we asked the president of that company to submit the facts, and he did not do it. The hearings containing his testimony have been printed, and Senators can see exactly what he said about it. If it forms a reasonable excuse for putting back these tubes, I am unable to see it. I do not believe that they have any such excuse. While I am on my feet talking about this tube matter I want to take just a few moments about another matter of like kind, which shows where we are going in these and similar matters.

Some time ago the Postal Commission had before it a proposition to enlarge the postal buildings in New York City. The first proposition was to put up an additional post office for the city of New York over at Morningside, in Brooklyn, about 7 or 8 or possibly 10 miles away from the present one, and in a field where there was a railroad yard. A lot of expert testimony was given in favor of that proposition; but that was exploded by the cross-examination of witnesses, and it was finally given up. They concluded not to go out in the country to build an additional post office for New York City. Now it is proposed to let out to a company that has been formed with only $10,000 paid-in capital the project of building an additional post office in the city of New York to cost about $6,000,000, but at an estimated cost to the Government of $9,500,000—$2,000,000 for the site that this $10,000 company is going to buy from the railroad, $2,300,000 for financing the proposition, and the remainder of the money, about $6,000,000, they say, is going to be invested in the building. When that is done they propose to rent that building to the Government for $1,200,000 a year for 20 years—a total of $24,800,000 in rental for the next 20 years for a building that will cost about $6,000,000. Think of it, Senators! At the end of the 20 years this $10,000 corporation will have gotten $24,800,000, according to the proposal, and it will have paid out less than $10,000,000 in all. And at the end of the 20 years the $10,000 corporation would still own the ground and building, worth probably all it cost. Is not that frenzied finance run mad at the expense of the Government? It will make a dozen millionaires if the Government agrees to it, and this post-office rental building proposition is quite in keeping with this infamous tube steal that is being foisted upon the Government. The former Postmaster General recommended this rental contract to our commission.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The proposition of erecting that building is in this bill, is it?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it is not in this bill. I am delighted to tell the Senator that it is not in this bill, but it has been proposed to the commission.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, well, that relieves me. I was very much alarmed. I thought it was in this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it in some other bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; this is evidence that has been taken before the Postal Commission, and the project is brought forward and recommended very strongly, I want to say, by the former Postmaster General, Mr. Will Hays. He came forward after he had severed his connection with the Government and testified that it was for the best interests of the Government—that that kind of a proposition was for the best interests of the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the committee acted favorably upon it?

Mr. McKELLAR. It has not yet, and I sincerely hope it will not. I can not believe that the commission or the committee will ever act favorably upon a proposition of that sort; but when I see the committee reporting favorably a proposition like this tube matter I do not know where they are going to stop. I can not imagine any better scheme of separating the Government from its money than the tube system that is in this bill, unless it be the former Postmaster General's scheme for obtaining a new post-office building in New York.

As I say, this tube proposition has been before the Congress in season and out of season during the 11 years I have had the honor to be a Member of it. I have been against it from the very beginning until now, and I am going to vote against it now. I do not mean to say that any of my associates who are voting to the contrary are voting for anything except what they believe to be for the best interests of this country; they have simply been misled; but I say to them that I do not believe it is to the best interests of the country, and I say to the Senate that I think it is little short of a plain steal of the Government's money.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, is it estimated for by the Budget?

Mr. MOSES. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; I think so. I think the machinery is all greased for it to go through, absolutely, from start to finish, and I expect, of course, that the Senate is going to uphold the proposition; but, nevertheless, it never can be upheld with my vote or with my voice. I am opposed to it. I am opposed to it because I think it is rotten. It is rotten to the core. It reeks with rottenness. It has been stricken out by the Congress a number of times. It has been voted down a number of times. The House of Representatives, when I was a Member of it, voted it down a number of times. Why, it was like pulling eyeteeth to separate these men from the public pap that they had been enjoying. They had been living on this for a long, long time. I doubt if the records would show that they ever put a dollar into it except the money that they got from the Government, if the truth could be shown, under the contracts that were made with the Government about it. I am wholly opposed to it, and I hope the Senate will not agree to it.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the strange thing about this proposition is that its opponents all live away from the city of New York. We never have had any opposition to this proposition of any moment except from gentlemen who have little knowledge of the needs of the great metropolis.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall that the postmaster of New York testified against it for a number of years.

Mr. CALDER. The present postmaster?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the preceding postmaster for eight years testified against it.

Mr. CALDER. Oh, no.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is not mistaken about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the postmaster from Chicago, Mr. W. B. Carlile, who was postmaster there for a number of years, said that if the tubes were put back the service would cost the Government in Chicago alone $160,000 or $170,000 per year more than it would cost without them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it ought to be understood here that there is no proposition to restore the tubes in Chicago or any other place than New York.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, of course as soon as the camel gets his head under the tent the whole camel will go in, and they will be restored in Boston, and they will be restored in St. Louis, and they will be restored in Philadelphia, and they will be restored in Chicago. This is just an entering wedge. This is just to count their strength in the Congress. This is to see whether or not this lobby has the necessary power.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, let me say that from the very beginning the opposition to this measure came from the recent postmaster, who served during eight years of a Democratic administration of the Government. The city of New York, through its board of trade and transportation, through its merchants' association, through its chambers of commerce, through all of the men who have cause to use the mail, and through all of the people who have cause to use the highways of the city, has been unalterably and at all times in favor of this project. Let me say to the Senator that I have served in the two Houses of Congress for 17 years, and I have never been approached by anyone interested in this tube service to vote for its continuance.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps they understood well how the Senator stood in the matter.

Mr. CALDER. Of course they understood how I stood on the question, because I am interested in my city and am interested in the proper conduct of its business. This is the most important thing for the mail service of the city.

Very often during the winter our streets are blocked by snow for several days at a time. The tubes constantly operate. It will be very helpful, and I am very glad the commission has reported in favor of it. I believe that nothing in the bill will be more helpful to that great city than the adoption of this provision.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if the Senate is ready to vote, I am very willing to proceed.

To say that I have been shocked at some of the statements of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is simply putting it mildly. I do not care to go into that matter now and to take up the question of the post-office building in New York, to which he has referred. That will come up on its merits in due time. It is not in this bill. We will be able to explain the situation as it is when it comes up.

The fact of the matter is, that every commission which has been appointed by Congress, except one, and that a sort of star-chamber arrangement, which was appointed by the last administration, has reported favorably to the continuation of the tubes, has reported that they are a valuable method of transporting the mails in New York, as testified to before our committee by the Democratic New York postmaster, who came before the committee and testified to that fact, as all others have who were familiar with the situation.

We are putting this provision in, not as a result of any lobby influence, which Senators seem to emphasize on every occasion. There has been no lobby influence exerted upon any member of the committee. I ask Senators to testify if I am mistaken about that. Has any lobbyist attempted to influence the Senator from Tennessee?

When the joint commission which investigated the matter was appointed it went into the subject very fully, with the aid of expert engineers, who had nothing to do except perform their duty. They reported in favor of it. A special postal committee, which has been investigating it, reported favorably to it. There have been some witnesses who testified against it, principally those who did not live in New York, or in any of these tube cities, but the great mass of disinterested testimony has been in favor of the restoration of these tubes.

They serve not alone New York, but they serve the whole country, for which New York is the gateway, very largely. As has been clearly shown, they will protect the Government from loss by fraud in the handling of registered mail. Five million letters a day can be sent through the tubes. The Senator from Tennessee said it is an inconsiderable amount, but 5,000,000 letters a day can go through these tubes, and it will save automobile hire in the city of New York, although how much I do not know.

I am not so much interested in that, although I know it will mean a saving. I am interested in serving the mail of the country to the best possible advantage. It has to be done. We must take off of the streets of these large cities as much of the traffic as it is possible, and this will take away one of the great menaces to traffic in New York and Brooklyn. Those are the cities we have investigated. Those are the only ones we are passing upon. There is no obligation to restore the tubes in any other city, and unless the commission and the committee shall find that it is in the interest of the service of the people of the United States, it will not be recommended for the other cities; but if we find that that is so, we will recommend it to the Senate for its judgment. But the statement that there is something rotten must have found its origin in the Senator's mind. It does no exist anywhere else. We have made an unbiased, conscientious investigation, nobody having any interest to serve except the interest of the Government. That is the real situation. Nobody has sought before to charge that there has been some wrong influence at work to secure some imposition upon the people of the United States.

Mr. President, this thing has been up time and time again. It has been investigated by commissions of the Senate and of the House, and every one of them has reported favorably, including the report of ex-Senator Hoke Smith, of Georgia, when he was chairman of or prominent on one of these committees.

The Senator from Tennessee says he has investigated the tubes. He has investigated the dead tubes. He has not investigated them when they were in operation, when they were working to fulfill the purpose for which they were installed. These tubes are under the streets of New York and Brooklyn, but not in operation, due to the action of the last administration. The Senator from Tennessee described the tubes as about 12 or 14 inches long and 6 or 8 inches in diameter. Of course, the tubes are 27 miles long, extending through the congested section of the great metropolis. What he meant was that the container was the length which he measured by his hands.

Those tubes are operated underground. They work under the congested streets. They work when there is congestion in these great centers, which congestion affects the whole country. It is not simply a privilege or an advantage given to New York, although that is much, and it is the duty of this Congress to look after the postal situation wherever it is.

What reason has the committee, what object has it, in advocating tubes, unless it is convinced after a careful investigation, after listening to all the arguments, pro and con, that they are in the interest of the public?

Mr. OVERMAN. Is this the same provision which was in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; it was not in the last bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. They have not had the tube service over there during the last year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have not had the tubes since 1918.

Mr. OVERMAN. How have they gotten on with business in New York since they took them out? Has there been any great complaint about it?

Mr. CALDER. Very great complaint.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There has been very serious complaint.

Mr. LODGE. There has been constant complaint in Boston, where the tubes have been removed. When those tubes were taken away there was constant complaint that it resulted in the greatest possible injury to the service.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is there any precedent for providing for this?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was going to make a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. A point of order would not stand.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, like other Senators who have been in Congress for some time, I realize that this question has been before the Congress for a good many years in one form or another. I listened to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] with a great deal of interest, because his experience was so different from mine. I am satisfied I can not possibly have any prejudice. As the Senator from New York said, the objections come usually from people who are far away from the city, which I think is natural. One would expect it to come from such people, because the tube service is somewhat expensive. But, Mr. President, those of us who do not live in New York or any other great city, but have lived in the country all our lives, have a sense of justice and fairness, particularly if it is in a case where we or our people can not possibly be moved by any ulterior or selfish motive.

I wondered for quite a good many years why this contest over the tube service was carried on. I do not remember just when it was before the Senate before, but during the time when the Senate was under the control of the Democratic Party and this question came up, I took time enough to make an investigation. I had never been on the committee; I had no personal experience with the tubes. I had not lived in a city where the tubes were operated, and I had heard great clamorings made on both sides.

I investigated. I read everything I could get on the subject—the reports of the various commissions and the reasons they gave for their reports. I never came in contact with this great lobby which has been referred to. They let me alone. There has not been anybody lobbying with me or doing any work which looked to me to be rotten or wrong. I have not seen any of it.

I investigated the subject the best I could, read the various reports, some of them made by Democrats and some by Republicans, so that I do not believe there was any partisan bias in it, and as I remember it now, with one exception, every investigation that was ever made resulted in a report in favor of the tubes.

I am inclined to think that when I went into the investigation I might have been prejudiced in favor of the tubes, because I realized that in the progress of civilization and the development of the great cities, the overcrowding which comes in our cities, the business which has come, the invention of the automobile, the crowding of the streets—something must be done, not only in New York but in all the other cities of the country, to get rid of some of the congestion. Some of the things which are on the streets must come off or the streets must be made wider and broader.

It seems to me that in the natural evolution and progress of civilization there must come tubes, there must come tunnels, there must come elevated railways. Means of communication from one part of a great city to another can not be afforded altogether upon the surface of the streets. It is a physical impossibility. Thus we have had developed in all the cities of the world tunnels, street cars running underground, elevated roads running overhead, in order to avoid the congestion which makes such things necessary.

There was only one thing which seemed wrong to me in connection with this tube business, and that is that the Government did not operate the tubes, that the Government did not own the tubes. The public owns the streets, and the Post Office Department handles the mail, and it ought to utilize the streets, if necessary, underground or overhead, or any other way which modern invention and modern business investigation show as the most efficient way. It has seemed to me that the way to send the mail from one part of a great city to another is underground. That, I believe, will become common in all the cities of the country. It is the natural progress and evolution of business. I do not see how we can escape from it, whether we like it or not. It is coming to that.

You can send first-class mail, anyway, underground more cheaply and in a more efficient way than you can send anything else underground, and that is the mail everybody desires to have handled expeditiously. The excavation necessary is small. It is not as expensive as to build a subway, and the tube can operate night and day, in storm or sunshine, regardless of the amount of business that is going on overhead or down below.

We are all sympathetic with any other part of the country when their business is obstructed or interfered with, no matter what may be the cause; so it seems to me that this question extends away beyond New York. It is a question of the most efficient way of handling the mail.

I am not an expert. I have to rely on others who have made these investigations. The recommendations have all been one way, and they coincide with what in a general way seems to me to be inevitable. One does not have to be an expert to know how the streets in the cities are crowded. One does not have to be an expert and go to New York to know that you take your life in your hands, almost, if you try to cross the street there.

Mr. CALDER. It may interest the Senator to know that over 1,000 people were killed in the streets of New York last year—run over by heavy traffic.

Mr. NORRIS. I would expect that. Part of that ought to be avoided, I think, even with the great crowding that we have there. Part of that comes, like it comes in this city and other cities, from recklessness and the crazy manner in which a great many people who ought to be in jail are operating automobiles on the public streets.

But everybody knows that the legitimate traffic in the cities is such as to absolutely interfere with the transaction of business, especially when there is a storm on. A big snowstorm will block almost everything. If there should be piled up a day's mail in the city of New York, the effect of it would be felt all over the United States. I realize that we can not always escape that condition. The management of the tubes may be interfered with. I think accidents may happen to them and they may be affected. If that should happen to come at the same time the service on the street was obstructed, it would be just the same as if we had no tubes.

But, Mr. President, I think the country ought to progress; I think we ought to go ahead and to realize that ahead of us is not only New York, but all the other great cities, and eventually communication between the cities. I may not live to see it, but there are those who will, in my judgment, live to see the day or the time when there will be tubes operated between Chicago and New York, when the mails will be carried all the way between those two great cities by means of tubes, and in the end it will be a great saving of money. It will permit the surface railroads to utilize their forces in the operation and transportation of passengers and freight to a much better advantage.

These things I think are in their infancy and they are a part of human progress. It was not very long ago when lots of fellows stood out against the automobile and said it was nothing but a plaything and would not amount to anything, and yet it has driven the horse off the street.

I remember when I came to Congress, before I had hardly got the seat warm, I listened to a great debate among the leaders of the Democratic and Republican Parties in condemning Langley for trying to fly through the air. I think some time I shall dig up that old debate and read it to the Senate. What a wonderful amount of eloquence and humor was spent in condemnation of those who thought that we might eventually get flying machines. Those who condemned were honest, but they were standing in the way of human progress. If there is anything corrupt or wrong about the tube business, expose it and punish it, but we will not get anywhere if we stand in the way of human progress. That is just as certain as the rising and the setting of the sun. I think we ought to put in tubes. The Government ought to do it. There was an opportunity once to buy all these tubes, and I thought the Government ought to avail itself of that opportunity and operate them. I believe it would bring efficiency and, in the end, economy to the Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I raise a point of order against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. KING. It is in contravention of subdivision 3 of Rule XVI, Standing Rules of the Senate, page 21:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

My contention is that this is general legislation, also that it is new legislation. There was a statute, but the maximum permitted in the statute was $17,500 per mile, and this permits an increase above the general law. The contention which is made that there is a general law which covers this does not apply because this modifies the existing law and therefore it would be general legislation. It would not be pursuant to existing law. It is a modification and change of the existing law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a similar point of order has been made before the Senate previously on this very matter. On an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill, directing the Postmaster General to continue the pneumatic-tube service until June 30, 1918, and providing for the appointment of the congressional commission, a point of order was made that it was general legislation. Vice President Marshall ruled, and I quote from his ruling:

As to whether this be general legislation or not, the Senate is the ultimate judge on an appeal. The Chair does not think that this is general legislation at all. The Chair believes that the Postmaster General is given the conduct of the affairs of the Post Office Department as the servant of the Congress of the United States, and not its master, which conduct the Congress may change at will.

On March 27, 1920, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] in the chair ruled that pending legislation affecting the tubes was in order, calling attention to the ruling of the Vice President to which I have just referred. The amendment on which the Senator from Kansas ruled as Presiding Officer provided that the machinery of the pneumatic tubes be continued in the post-office buildings and proposed the appointment of a postal commission to consider various postal problems, including the tubes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned, the last illustration which the Senator gave when the Senator from Kansas was in the chair, seems to me is not applicable, nor is it analogous. In that case there was no opportunity whatever to change existing law. The only question was, Shall the existing law be continued? and very properly it was held that the existing law could be continued or might be continued. That would not be a point involved here. The existing law limits, as I am advised, the appropriation to $17,500 per mile. Here is a proposition to increase the amount above that which the existing law provides.

Therefore, the illustration given by the Senator from Massachusetts would not be applicable. This is a change of existing law. If this should fix the same amount as compensation for carrying the mail through the tubes as provided by existing law, a different question would be presented; but so long as it does not reenact, or rather reintroduce, the existing law and permit the application of existing law, but amends existing law, increases the amount which is to be awarded for carrying the mail, then I insist that it is new legislation, general legislation upon an appropriation bill, and comes squarely within the rule.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, the Senator is as well aware as I am that the phrase "change of existing law" is a House phrase. This is a question of general legislation, and I have read the decision that it is not general legislation. Of course, as to increasing the amount to be paid from $17,500 to $18,500, that is taken out of the rule by the fact that it is estimated for and reported from a standing committee. It is also in the Budget estimate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The position as stated seems to be correct. The amendment is within the exception. The rule provides that—

Unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments.

New items shall not be added. This amendment does not seem to be general legislation, as it applies only to New York City and Brooklyn. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken.

The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as previously with reference to my pair and its transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BALL. Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. KING (after having voted in the negative). I discover that the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], with whom I have a general pair, is absent. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KENDRICK. Has the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. STANLEY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST]. Not knowing how that Senator would vote, I transfer my pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 11, line 26, after the numerals, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That hereafter 45 minutes' night work performed by clerks and special clerks in first and second class post offices, railway mail clerks assigned to terminals, and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be computed the same as one hour's day work: Provided further, That for the purpose of this computation night work shall be defined as any work done between the hours of 6 o'clock post meridian and 6 o'clock antemeridian.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, at this late hour I do not desire to take the time of the Senate, but I wish to say that my reason for offering this amendment—which may require some modification in conference, but which I think is sound in principle—is that at least 40 per cent of the clerical force, or about 20,000 post-office clerks, work partially or wholly during the night. They receive no concession in pay or in time off for the hardship of night work. This is nothing new, because other branches of the Government recognize the undesirability of night work by granting pay differentials for night workers as follows: Ten per cent in arsenals, 5 per cent in navy yards, 20 per cent in the Government Printing Office, and 10 per cent in the mail-bag repair shop.

Practically all post-office night work is confined to mail distribution. That means it is performed by men who must study distribution schemes in their own time in order to meet the department's requirements. I venture to think that a shorter workday or some additional pay for night work for the employees covered by the amendment is fully justified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the proposition involved in this amendment came before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads after we had closed our hearings. When we were considering the bill the representatives of the clerks came before us and made a very strong case but not a conclusive one. The committee, I think, as a rule are in sympathy with the idea of granting some recognition to night work, but whether it should be by extra compensation or shorter hours has not been determined. Just how much it would cost the Government if we should adopt this amendment no one can tell; indeed, no one can make a reasonably approximate guess as to what it would cost.

Your committee decided that we were perfectly willing at the proper time to consider a bill proposing legislation to cover this matter if one should be introduced, to hold hearings upon it, and ascertain what ought to be done. Some of the clerks think night work should be recognized by extra compensation, while others think there should a difference in hours allowed.

Mr. President, without any desire to neglect the claims of the employees covered by the amendment, I feel it is necessary under the statement which I have made to make the point of order against the amendment that it is new and general legislation, and under no theory can it be made a part of the pending bill. No one could more regret to make the point of order than do I, but I make it in view of the facts in the case which I have stated. I repeat that should we vote this amendment into the bill that action would be taken without any idea of what it would cost or how it would affect the service. Your committee is perfectly willing to take this question up if any Senator shall introduce a bill to change the compensation for night service, and to hold hearings upon it for the purpose of reporting some intelligent legislation to the Senate. We are not in a position to do that now. For the reasons I have stated I am impelled to make the point of order against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the point of order is that the amendment is general legislation?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I make that point of order against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That being the point of order, it is well taken.

Mr. LODGE. I shall not contest the ruling of the Chair. I simply ask permission to have printed in the RECORD at this point certain extracts from the testimony relating to the question involved in the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Excerpt from testimony of Thomas F. Flaherty, secretary-treasurer National Federation of Post Office Clerks, before Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads March 6, 1922.

Mr. FLAHERTY. Now, testifying before the Joint Commission on Postal Salaries, Mr. Firmin, superintendent of the money-order division, of New York, and one of the experts now that is advising your commission, said on this very question of night work, and I quote briefly from his testimony on page 388.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what?

Mr. FLAHERTY. Of the printed hearings on the postal facilities required at Chicago and Boston.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that say what volume?

Mr. FLAHERTY. That is part 3. The hearing was October 4 and 5, 1921, and this is on page 388. I quote briefly from Mr. Firmin's testimony:

"We believe that some of the things we recommend will minimize night work, but while we have made no recommendation now I think that I can speak—we have taken no vote on it, and haven't discussed it in any way of presenting it to your commission—but I think I may speak for my associates, that we believe the solution of the night work is to shorten the night period of work to make 45 minutes or 50 minutes the equivalent of an hour of work put in between 6 p. m. and 6 a. m.

"That was before your commission, you will recall, when you were discussing salaries and allowances, and it was never enacted into legislation. There wasn't any legislation along that line.

"I think you will concur in that idea.

"Mr. SCHEEL. The idea being to differentiate between the time a man must work who is on night duty and a man who is on day duty?

"Senator MOSES. That suggestion was made uniformly at every office where we took testimony on the salaries commission—as to making a differentiation in the night work.

"Mr. FIRMIN. I believe it would go very far toward removing the objection to night work and promoting the morale."

Then he goes on and makes an excellent argument in favor of the proposition, pointing out how difficult it is in a city of the size of New York, or any other large city, for a man to get the proper rest and recuperation during the daylight hours, because of the noises on the streets as well as the noises of the tenement houses. Consequently it saps a man's vitality, which, in turn, is reflected in his work.

Now, Mr. STEENERSON says:

"Mr. STEENERSON. How about the expense of making a 6-hour day instead of an 8-hour day?

"Mr. FIRMIN. I think if you take 10 minutes off of the period put in between 6 p. m. and 8 a. m., that would be 80 minutes in a day; 80 minutes on a tour. That would be an hour and 20 minutes. I don't know—nobody knows—but I believe that that would at least be not less than 50–50 from the working proposition—I think that if you did not get the full 8-hour service out of the man on account of the reduced hours that it would not be more than 40 minutes' loss anyway, and we would have a very much more contented employee with an improved morale, and I think he would be less likely to call upon the Government for disability under our retirement act, and so on.

"In general, I think it would be an improvement to the service."

Mr. Chairman, you are personally acquainted, of course, with Mr. Firmin, and you know that he is one of the best-posted men in the service on this problem, and his judgment in sustaining the views of the employees should carry considerable weight.

I have here also the unanimous report from the House Post Office Committee. This was to the Sixty-fourth Congress. The report was written by Mr. Madden, and in part it says on this question of night work:

"The night work performed as it is by the clerks standing at a letter case or pouch rack, working under artificial light, with the eyes constantly employed, deciphering all kinds of addresses, is unnatural, detrimental to health, and seriously impairs the eyesight.

"Night work constitutes the most discouraging feature that confronts men entering the Postal Service. It cuts them off from all the natural social life of the community; it destroys the possibility of happy home life, depriving the head of the family of the opportunity to enjoy his leisure hours with his family.

"In the British postal service it has long been provided by law that postal employees shall be paid at the rate of time and one-fourth for all work performed after 6 o'clock in the evening. In the Government Printing Office in Washington, D. C., the depressing and unnatural effect of night work is recognized by giving to the employees engaged in the night service the benefit of a differential schedule of hours."

Then this report brings up another phase of this question which perhaps should be brought to the attention of the subcommittee.

"In addition to this handicap, the great majority of post-office clerks are under the constant necessity of studying so-called "schemes" of mail distribution. These "schemes" consist of the names of the thousands of post offices in every State in the country. These "schemes" indicate the railway train that will carry the mails to these thousands of post offices.

"The average post-office clerk is compelled to memorize and carry in his head anywhere from 3,000 to 10,000 names of different post offices."

That statement is embodied in the unanimous report of the House Post Office Committee in the Sixty-fourth Congress.

I might call the subcommittee's attention to the fact that practically all of the night work in the service is mail distribution. The men performing it are distributors, and consequently they must, after office hours, study distribution schemes in order to keep fit mentally. Their promotions depend upon it. In fact, their retention in the service depends upon their ability to pass what is technically known as the "case examination." So when they finish their tours in the office they are constantly put to the necessity of going home and studying upon their own time. That is one compelling reason, in my judgment, why the Congress should reduce the tours for night workers in the Postal Service, taking into consideration the fact that they must devote a considerable portion of their time off duty to really what is post-office work, namely, mastering of distribution schemes.

The Railway Mail Service takes it into consideration in fixing the tours of the railway mail clerks. In the terminal post offices, which, by the way, are under the jurisdiction of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, and are consequently looked upon as part of the Railway Mail Service, the distributors are given a 20-minute time differential every day; that is, they work 7 hours and 40 minutes.

PERCENTAGE OF MAIL DISTRIBUTED AT NIGHT.

Senator PHIPPS. Do you feel that your estimate of 40 per cent of the labor being performed after 6 o'clock p. m. can be correct? Do you think you can substantiate that statement?

Mr. FLAHERTY. I have inquired at the department and they have no data. That is more or less of an estimate. I think it is a little low. I think candidly it would run a little above 40 per cent. We are accustomed to saying that 75 per cent of the mail distribution is performed at night. I have heard that statement made repeatedly.

Senator STERLING. By night you mean between 6 o'clock p. m. and 6 o'clock a. m.?

Mr. FLAHERTY. Yes, Senator; but some of that, of course, is performed by auxiliary help and some by substitute help. My estimate here is that 40 per cent of the entire clerical pay roll would cover the department's activities from 6 o'clock p. m. to 6 o'clock a. m., because it must be remembered that money-order and station work and a great many of the other activities practically cease around 6 o'clock. The only activity, in fact, of any magnitude after that is the distribution of mail.

We have attempted to minimize the night-work requirements by conducting a "mail-early" campaign. We placed advertisements in magazines, but it does not have the desired effect. We feel really that the only solution is the passing of the legislation that has been suggested, namely, the granting of a time differential of 15 minutes.

Twelve States, by the way, have laws prohibiting women working at night. That is in recognition of its hardships. The British postal service for many years has recognized seven hours of night work as equivalent to eight hours of day work. So there is ample sanction and ample precedent for legislation of this kind.

"Thus is his body often weakened and his health is broken. His spirits are dulled and he becomes disconsolate against most trying conditions. His nerves weaken and make him subject to violent reactions from even the slightest stimulation, since his inhibitory centers have, as it were, ceased to function."

Prof. Frederick S. Lee, of Columbia University——

Senator WALSH (interposing). Is that a decision of the court by Justice Brandeis?

Mr. FLAHERTY. No. That was in a brief that he prepared.

Senator WALSH. Before he was Justice?

Mr. FLAHERTY. Yes, sir.

Prof. Frederick S. Lee, of Columbia University, said:

"Night work is characterized by greater fatigue than is day work. It is interrupted by sleep. Its curve of output falls off at an excessive rate in the morning hours. Its daylight output is less than with day work. It has a deleterious effect on health. All these are inimical to a high degree of efficiency."

I think those statements are particularly pertinent to our postal night-work problem, which is largely the work of mail distribution, performed at high tension, performed frequently under sanitary conditions that are inimical to the health and well-being of the employees.

Most of you men, I think, have been inside of the large post offices, and you know what the environment is.

Senator PHIPPS. In most of the large ones, is it not a fact that artificial light is used a great portion of the time?

Mr. FLAHERTY. Yes; that is true in many of the offices. I regret to say the men are working under artificial light the greater portion of the 24 hours.

ESTIMATED NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES ON NIGHT TOURS.

Senator WALSH. In my absence was there anything said about the number of men in these night shifts?

The CHAIRMAN. No. He estimates that possibly there are 40 per cent.

Senator WALSH. Forty per cent are night employees?

Mr. FLAHERTY. That is a conservative estimate. It will run a little more than that. That would probably be around 20,000 clerks employed at night. There are about 50,000 clerks and special clerks in the service.

Senator WALSH. I am amazed at that.

Mr. FLAHERTY. As perhaps you know, they received no recognition in the way of time or of a differential in wages for the hardships of the night work.

Senator WALSH. We discussed that the other day. That is why we asked for the hearing.

Mr. FLAHERTY. Yes, sir; I discussed that at the beginning. In fact, Senator TOWNSEND said that he felt the subcommittee was familiar with the general aspect of the question, and he suggested to me that I briefly call attention to any new points that I might have in mind. So I have refrained from going into the general philosophy of the thing, which I do not believe is necessary. You must know that night work is unattractive and that on the other hand we realize that some of it is necessary in the service. It can be minimized somewhat, that is true, but there always will be night work.

Senator WALSH. Which would the men prefer, a reduction in hours or an increase in wages for night work?

Mr. FLAHERTY. They would prefer, I believe, a reduction in hours. They do not want to utilize night work as a means of increasing compensation. The primary object, of course, is to curtail the volume of night work. We must concede, however, that by penalizing it, by paying the men who perform it a little more, that effect would be brought about, because the department would immediately move to put into effect certain restrictions.

Senator MCKELLAR. Would that not be better than alternating hours?

Mr. FLAHERTY. I think not, Senator. In fact, this very question has been discussed repeatedly at our meetings and conventions, and we have come to the conclusion that the time differential is better than the wage differential, although as I explained perhaps before you came in, in private industries and in the Government Printing Office, arsenals, the navy yards, and the mail bag repair shop, they have attempted to solve the question by means of a wage differential.

Senator MCKELLAR. What differential do they generally fix?

Mr. FLAHERTY. The Printing Office gives 20 per cent. The navy yards give 5 per cent, the arsenals 10 per cent, and the mail bag repair shop 10 per cent. The War Labor Board during the war—and that was a governmental agency—imposed a 5 per cent differential in night work.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to an amendment on page 21.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Senator proceeds, will he yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to serve notice under the rule that he will move to suspend the rule in order that the amendment which he has proposed may be voted on?

Mr. LODGE. That can not be done without a day's notice, as the Senator from Mississippi knows perfectly well.

Mr. HARRISON. Probably the Senator from Massachusetts might get the Senator from Michigan to permit the bill of which he has charge to go over until to-morrow. In that event the Senator from Massachusetts could give notice to-day and the amendment could be voted on to-morrow.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The probabilities are that the Senator from Michigan would hardly agree to that.

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to an amendment on page 21 providing for the readjustment of star-route contracts. The committee amendment simply provides for an investigation and report by the Postmaster General at the next session of Congress. I believe that under the act of July 2, 1918, there was a readjustment of star-route contracts in the first, second, and third star-route sections in the United States; at least, so I am informed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it is not my recollection that the law to which the Senator refers applied simply to those three sections. A readjustment was authorized of contracts that had been made prior to the war, and quite a number of them were adjusted; that is, hearings were had and a determination was made to grant extra compensation where it was found necessary. The committee amendment proposes that all contracts which have been made during the war or since the war shall be taken up, and that Congress shall authorize a readjustment and additional compensation to be paid.

The committee, realizing full well some of the conditions that obtain in the star-route districts in the West, after hearing the department in the matter, came to the conclusion that we were not in a position to recommend any legislation on this subject until we had all the facts. Therefore we authorized the department to proceed to inform itself and to report to Congress at the beginning of the next session, on the first Monday in December, what are the facts; how many cases there are where complaint is made; under the claims which may be presented what the estimated cost of the readjustment will be, and whether, as is claimed by some, it should be confined merely to the fourth district or should cover all four of the star-route districts in the United States. We considered that very carefully and sympathetically, but we were not in a position, nor could we get in a position at that time, to inform ourselves in such a manner that we could at present report legislation to the Congress on this subject.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I think the information which I have from the hearing, that there was a readjustment in all except the fourth section, is correct. That section takes in practically all of the Western States; in fact, it is as large as any other two sections, and the amount of star-route business in that section is probably twice as great as in any other section.

I realize that the committee have given and are giving consideration to this matter. I am also perfectly aware that if any attempt were made to add such an amendment to the bill at this time the amendment would be subject to a point of order, and that the Senator from Michigan would make the point of order. Furthermore, it is probable that under the provision reported by the committee as much time will be saved as would be saved if we authorized the department to adjust these contracts, because, in any event, I assume there will have to be an investigation of each particular case.

I understand that this bill when finally passed will authorize the Post Office Department to hear these cases, to obtain all of the facts, and to make recommendations with regard to them, and then, with their report, to submit estimates to cover any readjustment which may be agreed upon. I hope that there will be no delay in taking action concerning this subject on the opening of the next session of Congress, because personally we all know that a number of star-route contractors, particularly in the West, have suffered greatly. They may have suffered also in other sections of the country, and probably have; but I do not know the facts as to that situation. I simply ask leave now to have printed in the RECORD at this point, for the consideration of Senators and for the Post Office Department, if they shall see fit, a statement by Mr. Leslie T. Alward, president of the Star Route Mail Contractors' Association of the fourth contract section. The statement is very short.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Statement of Leslie T. Alward, president of Star Route Mail Contractors' Association of Fourth Contract Section, relative to H. R. 9779 (same as S. 2936), authorizing a readjustment of compensation of contractors for the fourth contract section, composed of the following States:

Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, Nevada, and California. This section is the largest and the service the most difficult to operate in the United States, requiring in many cases expensive motor and horse-drawn vehicles transporting daily tons of parcel-post matter through snow and over mountains to rural sections. This bill was drawn up by officials of the Post Office Department, after conferences with a number of Members of Congress and myself, and therefore may be taken as representing the views of the department.

The act of July 2, 1918, authorizing a readjustment of compensation of contractors on star routes, where the contracts were entered into prior to June 30, 1917, were adjusted and paid. This act adjusted star-route contracts in first, second, and third contract sections.

Postmaster General's annual report, 1919, pages 43 and 44. Act of July 2, 1918:

"Congress, realizing the additional burden placed upon contractors for furnishing vehicles used in the transportation of mails as the result of the unusual conditions resulting from the war, incorporated a provision in the act making appropriations for the maintenance of the Postal Service during the fiscal year 1919, authorizing the Postmaster General to investigate conditions arising from contracts in screen-wagon and other vehicle service entered into prior to June 30, 1917, with the view to determine whether any adjustment should be made in the compensation of the contractor and to adjust the same for services and materials thereafter to be furnished in cases where the facts disclosed the necessity for such an adjustment. As a result of these investigations it was found that but few of the contractors maintained records sufficiently complete to show definitely the effects of the war on the cost of executing their contracts. It has therefore been difficult to make satisfactory adjustments in many of the cases. Practically all of the contracts subject to adjustment have been acted upon, and it is found that the average increase granted amounts to 31 per cent of the contract rate."

Post Office appropriation bill for year 1919, hearings, pages 155 and 156. Mr. Blakslee (Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, speaking of star-route contractors): "Naturally the contractor with the Government has more than the actual compensation in mind when he makes the contract. A large number of these contractors say:

"'This is good advertising for me; this is good in my business, for the reason it is known I am identified with the Government, it is going to help me.'"

Mr. BLACK. I am not talking about the sale of supplies; I am talking about the performance of service. I know of star routes where, if it was left to me to judge as to the equity of salary compared with work of like nature, I would say that they were very inadequately paid.

Mr. BLAKSLEE. I want to give you another suggestion: There ought to be legislation whereby the Postmaster General should be authorized to investigate contracts in existence, and where it is shown that the contractor is suffering material loss, through no fault of his own, he should be authorized to increase the compensation of such a contractor. No man should be asked to continue a contract two years under prevailing conditions, which are abnormal, at the price he bid two years ago.

Postmaster General's Report, 1921, page 55: "During this fiscal year the peak of abnormal prices of material and supplies resulting from the war was reached, and the falling market on tires, tubes, oil, grease, and gasoline is reflected in the operating cost of Government-owned motor-vehicle service. A corresponding decrease in the cost of labor has not occurred. Notwithstanding the statements of the former administration recommending legislation for readjustment of compensation of star-route contracts due to abnormal conditions, an unfavorable report was given by the Post Office Department on various bills introduced in Congress during the past two years for relief of star-route contractors of fourth contract section, 'the far West.'"

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, the peak of abnormal prices of material and supplies was reached.

This great fourth contract section, that lacks only less than 5 per cent of being as large in total as the other three sections combined based on the annual miles of travel, this difficult section, operating in the rural districts over mountains and through snow, transporting tons of mail daily, requires two separate equipments—motor service in summer and horse drawn in winter—transporting the excessive amount of parcel post due to advance in freight and express rates.

The contractors of the fourth contract section have used their savings for years to meet the unusual situation, operating on borrowed capital, their homes mortgaged, and in many cases the personal sureties advancing money. Up to this time their appeals have been in vain; they have seen their families denied the necessities of life, but these conditions have only nerved them for greater sacrifices, and as a result they are now appealing in person to you through a lone contractor who has journeyed across the continent to present their cause. The law for special privileges has no place in our American institutions. All contracts not founded upon justice are a violation of American rights; you may legalize a wrong, but you can not make it right. It is useless for me to enumerate the many readjustments and extra compensation given the railroads, running into many millions of dollars, due to unusual conditions, also the reclassification act adjusting all employees of the Federal Government. I am not here to quarrel with you on that account, but am here appealing that justice be done those struggling contractors of the West, that have so far been given no consideration.

Report of Postmaster General, page 71, 1921: "Humanizing the Postal Service is simply a 1921 application of the golden rule. We are trying to help declare the President's era of the golden rule by applying it to the Postal Service." We have read with deep concern the many publications in the press whereby unusual conditions will be met by new systems, and we firmly believe when the true facts relative to the condition and situation of the star-route contractor of the fourth contract section are known, doubtless a just administration will awaken to their relief.

Number of star routes in operation June 30, 1921.

First contract section, 2,975	$2,552,602.20
Second contract section, 2,118	2,112,487.45
Third contract section, 1,235	1,064,110.95
Fourth contract section, 4,366	5,737,784.07

The cost per mile of travel under these contracts is 15.57 cents.

Cost per mile of rural carriers (over), 20 cents.

Cost per mile, Government owned in cities, with driver operating on paved streets (1921 annual report, p. 182, Table 24):

	Cents.
Ford, three-eighths ton, per mile travel	31
Overland, one-half ton, per mile travel	34
Studebaker, one-half ton, per mile travel	52
Dodge, one-half ton, per mile travel	52
White, three-fourths ton, per mile travel	41
Reo, three-fourths ton, per mile travel	60
White, 1 ton, per mile travel	48
United States, 1½ tons, per mile travel	57
White, 1½ tons, per mile travel	55
Pierce Arrow, 2 tons, per mile travel	84
Packard, 3 tons, per mile travel	70

Page 52, same report:

"With the close of the fiscal year June 30, 1921, there were in operation 27 star routes with Government-owned equipment. Shortly after the present administration assumed charge and general survey was commenced on the assumption that the period for experiment to demonstrate the cost of efficiency of the service by Government-owned motor equipment as compared with like service under contract was at an end and that the department would now be justified in taking steps, where the cost of the service performed by Government-owned equipment is found to be excessive and out of proportion to the needs and requirements of the service, to ascertain whether service under contract could not be obtained at a more reasonable rate and equally as efficient. * * * As a result of this survey eight of the routes have been ordered discontinued and one route curtailed since July 1, 1921, and adequate service under contract will be substituted at much less cost to the department and without impairment to the service."

It is true the contractor of the West has not been able to send high-salaried attorneys here to plead his cause, as has been the case of large corporations, but I believe this honorable investigating committee will give due consideration to the facts presented.

The contractors of the far West are watching with deep concern the action taken on this bill, which they believe will permit a fair and reasonable readjustment and compensate them in part for actual losses which were sustained through no fault of their own, but which were the result of conditions that could not be foreseen.

LESLIE T. ALWARD,
President Star Route Mail Contractors' Association of Fourth Section.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 26, after line 21, it is proposed to insert the following;

In the selection and appointment of postmasters and letter carriers, either city or rural, any former honorably discharged soldier of either the Spanish or World War, when eligible, shall have preference in appointment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator will withhold the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I withhold the point of order.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, it was the intention of Congress to give honorably discharged soldiers of the Great War eligible for appointment preference in appointment to positions of employment under the Government. By what process of reasoning I do not know the Post Office Department of the present administration claims that this has no application to appointments as postmasters or letter carriers. I can not understand why the Senator from Michigan should insist that while the law now requires the departments to give preference to ex-service men where they are selected, we will say, as clerks in post offices, he is unwilling that the law shall be extended so that this preference may extend to the selection of postmasters and rural and city letter carriers. Therefore I sincerely hope that the Senator from Michigan will not make his point of order, but will let us give the former soldiers an opportunity to get honorable employment under the Government.

I know it was said over and over and over again, when these boys were called into the military service, that when they should come home, if God should spare their lives, they would be given the preference whenever any good places were to be given out; and I do not think we can afford now to deny them the modest employment of being appointed postmasters and letter carriers, either city or rural.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Especially in view of the fact that so many countless thousands of them are without any employment at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely; and there is not any reason this preference should not be extended to them. There is no justification for refusing to do it. We have promised them the preference. Let me call attention again to the statement of the former Postmaster General, Will Hays. He said in effect that any American employer who did not give the preference to a former service man when any good job was to be given out was no longer an American citizen. Can we, in the Senate, afford to fall within the class that the former Postmaster General reads out of American citizenship? Of course, the Postmaster General did not live up to his high premise. I hope the Senator from Michigan will not make the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have no objection to a vote being taken on that amendment if it can be taken right now, although it is subject to a point of order. I can not understand, except for political reasons, why it should be introduced here instead of being introduced first as a bill and presented to the committee; but I am anxious to get a vote on this matter. I hardly know what to do. I think I will make the point of order that this is new legislation and general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am astonished that the Senator should renew his point of order denying to the Senate the right to pass upon this question. Why should anyone object to giving these brave soldiers of ours a place of honorable employment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the point of order is well taken, being general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk; and I desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall move to suspend the rules in order to get a vote upon the amendment which I have just offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment which the Senator now offers will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Hereafter the heads of departments and independent establishments of the Government shall give to employees under their jurisdiction who have been honorably discharged from the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps on account of disability incurred in line of duty preference in assignment of positions and hours of duty and also seniority rights over other employees in the same grade or class.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I make the point of order that this is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. It is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I offer the matter which I send to the desk as a separate provision, to go at the end of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested to furnish to the Senate the name of every person appointed by Executive order setting aside the civil-service rules, and to furnish to the Senate the reasons therefor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I make the point of order that that is a resolution, as the Senator knows, which he can bring up at any time without putting it on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. I will bring it up immediately following the consideration of this bill, then.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I make the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it now being 25 minutes of 6 o'clock, I feel quite sure that the Senator from Michigan will not mind having the bill go over until to-morrow, since everything is finished except one amendment that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] offered, which is a very splendid amendment, and I am sure would be agreed to if the Senate could vote upon the proposition. So, under the rules of the Senate I give notice, if the Senator will put off the bill until to-morrow, so that we can vote to suspend the rules——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to say that I can not consent to put off the bill until to-morrow. We have the bill finished now, and I want it to be acted upon finally before we adjourn. I do not know when we can get the bill up again. To-morrow we shall again begin the discussion of the treaty, and it will doubtless be continued until Friday.

Mr. HARRISON. Can we not get a unanimous-consent agreement that to-morrow at a certain time we shall vote, immediately on the convening of the Senate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

SEVERAL SENATORS. No.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It can not be done. We have a unanimous-consent agreement pending now, and that agreement will be completed on Friday. It seems to me that nothing can be gained by putting off this bill in order that the Senator may present something else to the Senate. I shall make the point of order upon any proposition that proposes general legislation on this appropriation bill. All the other questions which the Senator wishes to bring up he can bring up either by resolution or by bill, and the legislative committees of the two Houses are ready to consider any reasonable, good-faith proposition that is presented to us.

Mr. HARRISON. This is offered in perfect good faith. It is the amendment that was just offered by the leader of the majority and is a very important amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But it went out on a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. It affects all the night employees in the Postal Service throughout the country, and they would welcome it. The suggestion I make is only to lay the bill over until to-morrow—I know of no other amendments that are going to be offered—so that we can vote on this matter to-morrow, as an expression of the Senate as to whether or not we are in favor of this amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I insist upon the regular order at this time, so as to get through with this bill. The Senator himself is no more in favor of dealing justly with the employees of the Government than I am, as the record will disclose; but I am not ready, as chairman of the committee, to admit matters that are not pertinent, matters that have not been discussed in our committee, and which ought to be considered in the committee. As I said a moment ago, it is not simply a question of shorter hours, but it is an alternative proposition of greater compensation for night work; and until we have had hearings on the subject and a determination of it I shall not consent to new legislation going on this appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, if the Senator insists on passing the bill to-night, and will not agree to letting it go over, the notice will avail us nothing.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a notice which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

I hereby give notice that on to-morrow I shall move to suspend Rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate for the purpose of offering the following amendment, to wit:

On page 26, at the end of section 9, add:

"In the selection and appointment of postmasters and letter carriers, either city or rural, any former honorably discharged soldier of either the Spanish or World War, when eligible, shall have preference in appointment."

T. H. CARAWAY.

MARCH 20, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that the clerks may correct any error that may have been made in the totals and in the numbers of the sections of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPOINTMENTS BY EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Mr. HARRISON. I send to the desk a resolution which I ask to have read, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 258) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested to furnish to the Senate the name of every person appointed by Executive order setting aside the civil-service rules, and to furnish to the Senate the reasons therefor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WILLIS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. It is out of order now, any way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

SERVICES FOR SOLDIER DEAD AT BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the American Legion, Department of New York, has invited the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to appoint a committee to attend the funeral services at New York of the last shipload of remains of the men of the American Army who were buried in France and are now being returned to this country. With that in mind, I have offered a Senate concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that I may report the concurrent resolution at this time, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution for the information of the Senate.

One-half of the expenses of such committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 20, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Spirit Divine, we draw near to Thee in confidence, because Thou art He who is ever touched with a feeling of our infirmities. Thou alone canst make even the night to shine as the day. Receive our penitent submission and be merciful unto our imperfections. With us may life be definite and full of thoughtful meaning. Compensate any who may feel the heavy hand of difficulty or misunderstanding. We bring to Thee our perplexities, our problems, and the exactions of duty. Grant that the Great Teacher, who has spoken in such deathless words, may help us through all the day. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] may have two minutes in which to open the storehouse of his information and let us know, if he will, about what happened at the White House and when we will take up the bonus bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. GARNER. What is the regular order? It is to put my request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Kansas practically objects, but the Chair will put the gentleman's request. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming may have two minutes——

Mr. GARNER. In which to tell us what happened at the White House and when the bonus bill is coming up.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Kansas demands the regular order, and the regular order is bills on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. The Clerk will call the first bill.

SEQUOIA NATIONAL PARK.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7452) to add certain lands to the Sequoia National Park, in California, and to change the name of said park to Roosevelt-Sequoia National Park.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed without prejudice.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I think we ought to have some information concerning the question when we are going to take up the bonus bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a reasonable request, and the Chair will say that no one will be recognized to bring that up to-day.

Mr. GARNER. Will the Chair be gracious enough to tell us when we are likely to have it taken up?

The SPEAKER. That is not within the province of the Chair, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. GARNER. Has the Chair any information on the subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not.

Mr. GARNER. The storehouse is either locked up or gone dry. I do not know which. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California that the bill retain its place on the calendar?

There was no objection.

SITE FOR ADMINISTRATION BUILDING, ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8675) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to accept a certain tract of land donated as a site for an administration building for the Rocky Mountain National Park.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, this bill was passed over two weeks ago, in order that gentlemen interested might get some information. I ask to have it passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMENDING SECTIONS 5549 AND 5550 OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1010) to amend sections 5549 and 5550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I do not know who drafted this bill, but whoever did was not very accurate or careful.

Mr. STAFFORD. This comes from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it was reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House.

Mr. MANN. The present law provides that in certain cases of imprisonment it shall be had in the house of refuge in the different States. This bill enlarges the scope of the law and then provides for confinement in the State reformatory. In one place in the bill it provides for contracts with persons having control of the State reformatories, and then goes on and further provides for the confinement in the house of refuge. It may be that the State reformatory and the house of refuge are the same thing, but it is quite certain that it is not very good form to provide for the confinement in a State reformatory and that the sentence shall be in the house of refuge. If they are the same thing, the same language ought to be used, and if not, whoever drafted it providing for confinement in one place and sentence to another place is not very accurate.

Mr. BRAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BRAND. I have looked into this amendment myself to some extent. The effect of the amendment is to sentence its offender to service in a State reformatory instead of a house of refuge. It does not leave it open to be sent to both places, or to either place in the court's discretion, but the direction is to send them to a State reformatory.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, here is the language in the bill, page 2:

SEC. 5550. The Attorney General shall contract with the managers or persons having control of such State reformatories for the imprisonment, subsistence, and proper employment of all such juvenile or female offenders, and shall give the several courts of the United States and of the District of Columbia notice of the places so provided for the confinement of such offenders; and they shall be sentenced to confinement in the house of refuge nearest the place of conviction so designated by the Attorney General.

That is an incongruity, to say the least.

Mr. BRAND. Section 5449, which this bill seeks to amend, says: "Juvenile offenders against the laws of the United States under the age of 16 years who may be hereafter convicted of crime shall be confined during the term of sentence in some house of refuge to be designated by the Attorney General and shall be transported and delivered," and so forth.

This section, as amended by the Senate bill, reads as follows:

That section 5549 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and it hereby is, amended by adding thereto the following: Whenever a woman or girl shall be convicted of lewdness, prostitution, or similar offenses, under circumstances rendering such offense punishable by imprisonment under the laws of the United States, such woman or girl may be confined, during the term of sentence, in some State reformatory to be designated by the Attorney General, in the manner provided in the case of juvenile offenders, by said section 5549, when, in the opinion of the presiding judge, that course seems justified by the circumstances of the case and the intelligence and previous character of the offender—

And so forth.

The object of this bill is to include women who have been tried and convicted of offenses against this statute. There is no objection to this. The only amendment to the statute as it stands is to change the place of confinement and instead of sending them to a house of refuge the amendment directs they shall be sent to State reformatories.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not read to us, at least, section 5550, and has not referred to it. The present law, section 5550, provides for entering into contracts with the managers of houses of refuge and the sentencing of prisoners to houses of refuge. This bill provides for entering into contracts with managers of state reformatories and the sentencing of the prisoners to the houses of refuge.

Mr. BRAND. I see the point. You are correct, as you usually are. It is a mistake to have left the words, "house of refuge" in the bill at the place referred to. As the bill passed the Senate, section 5549 of the Revised Statutes and the first portion of section 5550 were amended and the words "house of refuge" contained therein were stricken and the words "State reformatory" inserted in lieu thereof; but it seems by mistake the words "house of refuge," in line 17 of section 5550, were not included in the amendment. The words "State reformatory" ought to be in section 5550 just as they are in section 5549.

Mr. MANN. I have an amendment which I think would correct that, but I think the Committee on the Judiciary or some one who has charge of this ought to determine that question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman who has charge of this measure is unavoidably detained, as is also the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. Would the gentleman from Illinois object to having the matter passed without prejudice?

Mr. MANN. I would not. I think it is proper legislation, if put in proper form.

Mr. WALSH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the measure be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, for the purpose of getting information, does the gentleman from Illinois know whether the term "houses of refuge" is defined anywhere

Mr. MANN. It has been in the statutes for a great many years. I think it has a definition in the Department of Justice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the bill be passed over without prejudice? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will report the next bill.

GALLATIN NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 255) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Gallatin National Forest, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RED LAKE BAND OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS, MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6568) for the relief of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians, in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman from North Dakota whether these Indians will not be taken care of by this specific appropriation which was made some time ago for the relief of destitute Indians in that region?

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, it is not the theory of this bill that it is a charitable payment to these people or that it is a payment that is required absolutely for the purpose of saving them from starvation or anything of that sort. It is true that the Red Lake Band of Indians are members of the Chippewa Tribe of the State of Minnesota; that they did share in the $100 distribution made some time ago. This bill, however, is reported favorably by the committee and is recommended by the Indian Department rather upon the theory that there is a considerable amount of money in the United States Treasury which belongs to these Indians. They are a rather high class of Indians, frugal and intelligent; they all know that the fund belongs to them. The amount that is authorized to be paid by this bill, in the event that it becomes a law, comes from the timber fund belonging to the Red Lake Band, and it is considerable. When all the timber is sold I think the fund will aggregate something like a million and a half, and there are only 1,522 Indians altogether. In other words, the share of each Indian in the total fund will probably eventually approximate almost $1,000. If the $50 provided by the bill is paid to each of them, it will give to these Indians an opportunity to buy something they need, some agricultural implement or something of that sort, which will aid them in carrying on their agricultural work.

Mr. WALSH. Then this is not particularly to relieve destitution or anything of that sort?

Mr. BURTNESS. It is not.

Mr. WALSH. It is a distribution of money that belongs to that tribe.

Mr. BURTNESS. That is correct, giving them part of what they actually own, about 10 per cent of the cash now on hand, the balance of the timber fund on February 24 being $730,720.10.

Mr. WALSH. A sort of bonus payment, as it were?

Mr. BURTNESS. Not a bonus, but giving them a chance to use something which they already own but which is now in the hands of their guardian instead of in their own hands.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to withdraw from the fund in the Treasury of the United States arising from the proceeds of the sale of timber and lumber within the Red Lake Reservation in Minnesota according to the provisions of the act of May 18, 1916 (39 Stat. L., p. 137), a sufficient sum to pay per capita to the members of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians of the State of Minnesota living at the date of the passage of this act the sum of $50 each, and to make such per capita payment as soon as possible, this appropriation to be immediately available.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," strike out the words "and directed."

Page 1, line 4, after the word "withdraw," insert "as much as may be necessary."

Page 1, line 9, strike out the words "a sufficient sum to pay per capita to the" and insert in lieu thereof "and to make therefrom a per capita payment, or distribution, of $50 to each of the living."

Page 2, line 2, strike out "living at the date of the passage of this act the sum of $50 each, and to make the per capita payment as soon as possible, this appropriation to be immediately available" and insert in lieu thereof the words "under such rules and regulations as the said Secretary may prescribe."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTNESS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE OF ROADS, ETC., IN ALASKA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 282, to authorize the Secretary of War to incur obligations for construction and maintenance of roads, bridges, and trails in Alaska, said obligations to be paid from the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the joint resolution as introduced provided authority to incur obligations to the extent of 75 per cent of the appropriations. The committee amendment reduced that to 50 per cent. I am under the impression that the War Department appropriation bill now pending in the House makes immediately available 75 per cent.

Mr. CURRY. No; the appropriation bill in the House makes available 75 per cent of the amount due during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, provided the appropriation bill of the next year does not pass before March 1.

Mr. MANN. But this bill relates to appropriations for the fiscal year 1923.

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is the appropriation bill now pending in the House.

Mr. CURRY. That is true.

Mr. MANN. That bill, I think, makes immediately available 75 per cent.

Mr. CURRY. No; that bill does not make anything available out of that appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, money for road construction in Alaska in the item carried in the War Department appropriation bill, $425,000, is made immediately available; but that bill, as has been pointed out by the engineer having this road construction in charge, may not pass until June, or the latter days of June, and the engineer desires it be made immediately available, and that is the purpose of this joint resolution——

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. STAFFORD. To make obligations of 50 per cent of that amount which is appropriated in this year's bill.

Mr. MANN. I think the pending bill makes available 75 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; there is no limit as to the amount available; as the gentleman from California states, that gives the engineer authority to obligate to the extent of 75 per cent of the amount that is carried in this bill for work in the next fiscal year—that is, the year ending June 30, 1924.

Mr. CURRY. The amount in the pending bill is immediately available, but the probability is the bill may not pass the Senate until June.

Mr. MANN. I was seeking to inquire whether there would be conflict between the 50 per cent and the 75 per cent.

Mr. CURRY. There is no conflict. The original amount asked for in this joint resolution was 75 per cent. The chairman of the Alaska Road Commission and the Governor of Alaska stated that they could probably get along with 50 per cent, and they did not wish to make any more available than necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to direct the Board of Road Commissioners for Alaska to incur obligations prior to July 1, 1922, for the construction and maintenance of roads, bridges, and trails in Alaska of not to exceed 75 per cent of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, payment of these obligations to be made from the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "75" and insert in lieu thereof "50."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURRY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3209) granting to the Northern Pacific Railway Co. the right to construct and maintain a bridge across the Mississippi River at Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Northern Pacific Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation in the southwest quarter of section 24, township 29 north, range 24 west of the fourth principal meridian, at Minneapolis, in Hennepin County, State of Minnesota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 87 OF THE JUDICIAL CODE.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9671) to amend section 87 of the Judicial Code.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 87 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 87. That the State of Massachusetts shall constitute one judicial district, to be known as the district of Massachusetts.

"Terms of the district court shall be held at Boston on the third Tuesday in March, the fourth Tuesday in June, the second Tuesday in September, and the first Tuesday in December; at Springfield, on the second Tuesdays in May and December; and at New Bedford, on the first Tuesday in August: Provided, That suitable rooms and accommodations for holding court at Springfield and New Bedford shall be furnished free of expense to the United States.

"The marshal and clerk for said district shall each appoint at least one deputy to reside in Springfield and to maintain an office at that place, and they may each appoint a deputy to reside and maintain an office at New Bedford."

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That section 87 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 87. That the State of Massachusetts shall constitute one judicial district, to be known as the district of Massachusetts.

"Terms of the district court shall be held at Boston on the third Tuesday in March, the fourth Tuesday in June, the second Tuesday in September, and the first Tuesday in December; at Springfield, on the second Tuesday in May and December; and at New Bedford, on the first Tuesday in August: Provided, That suitable rooms and accommodations for holding court at Springfield and New Bedford shall be furnished free of expense to the United States: And provided further, That all writs, precepts, and processes shall be returnable to the terms at Boston, and all court papers shall be kept in the clerk's office at Boston, unless otherwise specially ordered by the court, and the terms at Boston shall not be terminated or affected by the terms at Springfield or New Bedford.

"The marshal and the clerk for said district shall each appoint at least one deputy to reside in Springfield and to maintain an office at that place."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WALSH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. LOWREY. To ask permission to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a copy of an article published yesterday in the Washington Star in regard to the amount of seed distribution. It is full of interesting facts to me, and I ask permission to extend my remarks by inserting it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extened his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article in yesterday's paper. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is this article about? We could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. LOWREY. This is a history and discussion of the seed distribution, and has much information in it that I think would be of interest to the general public.

Mr. WALSH. An article prepared by Mr. Jones, of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. LOWREY. No; I judge not. It seems to me it must have been prepared by some one connected with the paper. It is a good article, full of interesting facts and a history——

Mr. MANN. Well, of course we have a history of this matter brought up here every time there is an appropriation asked for.

Mr. LOWREY. It is in no sense a propaganda——

Mr. WALSH. All right; I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an article from the Washington Sunday Star entitled "Uncle Sam's free seeds expected to produce $150,000,000 crop," as follows:

UNCLE SAM'S FREE SEEDS EXPECTED TO PRODUCE $150,000,000 CROP.

At a cost of $360,000 food products to the value of $130,000,000 will be grown from 100,000 packages of vegetable seeds and 10,000 packages of flower seeds which are being sent out from Washington by each and every one of the 96 Senators and 435 Members of the House under 13,000,000 franks (free postage) to home gardeners in every State in the Union.

And aside from questions of policy regarding this often-called "seed graft," which causes an annual scrap and a yearly crop of derisive jokes, there is an interesting human-interest story behind this congressional distribution of free seeds—the origin of the custom, which gave birth to the present Department of Agriculture; the field and laboratory job of testing all these seeds, the physical task of putting them into packages and preparing them for postage, the fact that in some instances they are the only contact between men in the mountains and their Government, the letters from people who have derived pleasure and profit from these seeds—even the story of the historic building which is used as "the Government seed house," on the main thoroughfare of the National Capital.

This is Congress' seed season; doubly so, for the question of continuing for the fiscal year of 1923 the annual appropriation of $360,000 is now under consideration, and within the next two weeks the time expires for Members of Congress to complete the considerable task of writing names and addresses on the 13,000,000 franks or postage-free slips which will carry the seeds everywhere throughout this country.

Although the purchase and distribution of seeds by the Government, which began in 1839, laid the foundation for the establishment of the Department of Agriculture as it exists to-day, for some years now it has been the policy of the department to oppose this particular appropriation on the grounds that the money can be better spent on procuring new and rare seeds and cuttings from foreign countries, which activity by agricultural explorers has been previously described in the Sunday Star.

So the Department of Agriculture has acquired the habit of leaving out this item from its Budget estimates, and Congress just as regularly inserts it, according to time-honored custom and to meet the requests that come in a veritable flood of letters asking for free seeds. That's what the House has just done—inserted again in the Agricultural appropriation bill for the fiscal year starting July 1 next an item of $360,000 for free seeds for congressional distribution. It is a foregone conclusion that the Senate will approve this amendment.

Now, let us look over the historical background for this annual "graft." The purchase of seeds and plants by the Government may be said to date back to colonial days. As early as 1743 the British Parliament granted $600,000 to promote the cultivation of indigo and other crops in the American Colonies, and the assemblies of the various Colonies appropriated small sums from time to time to encourage the cultivation of plants new to the country, such as hops in Virginia, mulberry trees for silk culture in Georgia, and vineyards for the establishment of an American wine industry, lately Volsteaded out of existence in this country or at least driven under cover.

Our greatest patriots contributed active assistance to furthering this encouragement to food production. Franklin, while in England as agent for Pennsylvania, sent home silkworm eggs and mulberry cuttings. Thomas Jefferson, during the five years he represented this country as minister to France (1784–1789), forwarded numerous seed samples to the home country. Other representatives of this country during early days followed these notable examples until during the administration of John Quincy Adams instructions were given to all United States consuls to forward plants and seeds to Washington for distribution.

Notwithstanding these efforts to introduce new seeds and plants, many varieties of fruits and vegetables were scarce or unknown. There were few seed farms, nurseries, or seedsmen. Seed were mostly grown by the farmers themselves. Interest in better seeds and securing new seeds and plants resulted largely from the agricultural fairs.

In 1839, through the efforts of Henry L. Ellsworth, Commissioner of Patents, an appropriation of $1,000 was made for the purpose of collecting and distributing seeds, prosecuting agricultural investigations, and procuring agricultural statistics, with which 30,000 packages of seeds were purchased and distributed. This appropriation marked the beginning of the Department of Agriculture.

Demands upon Members of Congress for seeds became so numerous and insistent that it was impossible to fill the orders with new varieties of seeds. The practice of sending out larger and larger quantities of vegetable seeds thus developed. These seeds proved very useful, especially in the new communities to which they were largely sent.

During the years from 1889 to 1893 practically the entire seed appropriation was expended for standard varieties of vegetable and flower seeds. In 1894 a change was advocated and action taken to discontinue the customary distribution. This action was not approved by Congress, which, in an act approved April 25, 1896, changed the wording of the previous act. The Attorney General, to whom the question was submitted for decision, held that the purchase and distribution of seeds, including vegetable and flower seeds, were mandatory and left the Secretary of Agriculture without discretion. Congress has specifically reserved for itself the distribution, with proportionate allotments to each Member of five-sixths of all the seeds and plants purchased by the department. So that is where "congressional seed distribution" originated.

The value of the congressional seed distribution consists in the wide distribution by Senators and Members of Congress to applicants in all parts of the country of standard varieties of garden seeds of known value and of the best quality.

Now, then, it costs Uncle Sam about 3½ cents for every package of seeds sent out by a Congressman. Each package contains five different kinds of seed. The following kinds of vegetable seeds are purchased for free distribution: Peas, beets, lettuce, onions, radish, beans, corn, carrots, cucumber, parsley, parsnip, squash, tomato, turnip, and watermelon. There are 14 combinations, so that a Member of Congress can select the five different kinds of seeds he wants to send out in one package. Similarly there are 22 different varieties of flowers, such as chrysanthemum, aster, cosmos, balsam, candytuft, dianthus, nasturtium, poppy, sweet peas, petunia, zinnias, mignonette.

That package containing five small papers of seeds, which costs the Government 3½ cents, if bought in the open market would cost 50 cents.

The Office of Seed Distribution in the Department of Agriculture keeps an exact account for each Member of Congress, just the same as a bank account. The Member is credited with his quota and is allowed to draw against that quota, just the same as against a bank account.

From one sample package, containing five small papers of seeds, any person can raise at least $15 worth of food, according to the agricultural authorities. Deducting $5 for waste, loss in transit, or carelessness in planting or poor soil, it leaves a $10 net production. Members of Congress are sending out this year 13,000,000 of these large packages (five papers in each), which, it is conservatively estimated, will return $130,000,000 food products for an outlay of $360,000, which certainly should have some effect on the economic life of this country.

When the annual fight over the appropriation is being waged the claim is often made that the free-seed distribution comes near wrecking the Post Office Department and is responsible for an annual deficit. The records show that the run is usually from 1,500,000 pounds to 600,000 or 700,000 pounds, and that if the Office of the Seed Distribution paid postage on each package, the same as any private individual, the postage bill would never have been more than $131,000, and that it would average about $95,000.

Every seed sent out is tested for vitality and for trueness to name. These tests are made on the experimental farm of the department, near Arlington National Cemetery, although the germination tests are mostly made in the laboratory by using blotting paper. All seed has to be of the particular variety ordered. The department, while opposing the congressional distribution, takes very good care that the seeds are all good before they are sent out. It sets a very high standard to which the seeds must register, a much higher standard than is often required commercially. If the seeds do not reach that standard, they are shipped back to the contractor from whom they were purchased at the latter's expense. Some years they reject a very large amount—this year, for example, about 150,000 pounds, after it had reached Washington—because the germination was not high enough. This is sent back as not good enough for congressional seed distribution, but there is no assurance anywhere that the very same seed is not disposed of commercially.

Uncle Sam buys these seeds on straight competitive bids, and when any contractor's deliveries show a consistent poor germination he is blacklisted. Each bidder is informed why he did not get the contract, told who did get it and why and the price paid. This is a straight official letter.

The demand upon Members of Congress for seed this year is greater than ever, and in many cases appears to be owing to the poverty of the people. The Congressmen are getting more letters than usual asking for seeds, and usually from persons who say they can not afford to buy seeds this year.

Congressmen are coming more and more to send their quotas of seeds out, not to the voting lists in their districts but to the school children, to civic organizations, chambers of commerce, banks, and factories for workmen, and a great deal to miners. These packages of seeds in many places, especially in the mountainous sections, received every year through the Congressmen, are the only bit of mail that is received from one end of the year to the other, and are the only connecting link between these hardy mountaineers and their Government.

The seeds are designed primarily to meet the needs of the man with a little back yard in the cities and small towns, and induce him to have a garden and raise a few vegetables. Last year a new custom was started. On the back of each package was printed: "Don't waste this seed! If you can not make good use of the seed in this package, please see that it reaches some one who will. Note carefully the directions for planting on each package. If you want some more information on gardening, write to the Secretary of Agriculture for any of the following farmers' bulletins, which will be sent you free: The City Home Garden, The Farm Garden in the North, Home Gardening in the South, Control of Diseases and Insect Enemies of the Home Vegetable Garden, and Saving Vegetable Seeds for the Home and Market Garden."

It is from scores of letters coming daily in the mail of Congressmen that the best reflex from the free-seed plan can be had. By the thousands they testify that the congressional seeds do grow, and better than other seeds. A little schoolgirl writes in that she has raised $20 worth from one package. A Providence, R. I., man enthusiastically tells his Congressman that his garden netted him $50 and that he took a prize offered by a merchants' association. A home gardener in Chicago, Ill., asked his Congressman to find out why lettuce and onion seed sent out by Uncle Sam produced while others did not. Pictures sent in show that an elderly couple in Hamilton, Ohio, got a $50 prize for their back yard offered by the chamber of commerce, grown from a package of congressional seeds and watered from an old pump and an old-fashioned hand sprinkler. "The people are coming to know that the Government seeds are always good," writes in an agricultural college man from Mississippi.

Some Members of Congress get seeds for use on their own personal gardens, and one Texas Member has just sent in a testimonial to Uncle Sam saying, "I have had excellent results; the seeds germinated well and proved suited to our climate."

Detroit, Mich., is an excellent example of the new system in distribution of the congressional seeds. A great many packages are being sent to automobile factories for distribution among the operatives and which are being sown in plant garden plots. Similarly large quantities are being sent to the cotton mills in the South for distribution among the operatives.

Through a Vermont farm machinery company at Bellows Falls some seed packages were distributed last year. The Polish employees were especially enthusiastic and were allocated certain sections of a big park. Young truck gardens have resulted, and "this hitherto uncultivated land took on new beauty," writes the Congressman.

With the department opposed to the congressional seed distribution, and with Congress habitually for it, Oliver F. Jones, originally from Cincinnati, who is in active charge of this work, has had an unenviable job as buffer between the department and Congress for about 20 years. He probably knows all the Members of Congress more intimately than any other man in Washington, because he is calling upon them in their offices every day in the year. At present he is getting more than 200 telephone calls a day from them, dictates about 100 letters a day to them, and has 20 or 30 of them calling on him in his office each day.

The seed distribution is conducted under the Bureau of Plant Industry, of which Dr. William A. Taylor is chief, but he has too many other duties to give detailed consideration to this one Federal activity, although he does keep well informed about it. R. A. Oakley and J. E. W. Tracy purchase under contract all the seed that enters into the congressional distribution and supervise the mechanical and physical work of filling the packages and malling them. Mr. Tracy is in charge of the seed warehouse, located at 339 Pennsylvana Avenue, which is not at all modern, well ventilated or lighted, and not fitted with sanitary equipment of modern type.

This building is well worth special attention. It was erected in 1844 and was the scene of receptions, banquets, and inaugural balls for Andrew Jackson, Martin Van Buren, and Abraham Lincoln. It has been used as the seed warehouse for about 10 years. There are three floors in the front of the building and five floors in the rear. The second and third floors have 22 feet of headroom. The third floor, which was the banquet hall, is suspended by four 2-inch iron bars, and measures 44 by 88 feet. This was done so that there would not have to be supporting pillars from the floor below, which was the ballroom. The only entrance that the President had to the ballroom was down a winding stairs and through a small door not more than 5 feet in height, so it must have been an interesting spectacle to see Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln bending their tall frames to duck through this small doorway.

The third floor is now braced from the second floor with big timbers, because during the Spanish-American War the floor collapsed, due to the fact that in a space 25 by 22 feet boxes of ammunition were piled without any thought of weight until about 435 tons was too much of a load and the floors fell through. This is not a Government-owned building, but has been rented by the department and used as a seed warehouse for about 10 years.

The filling of the orders of Congressmen is an interesting part of the free-seed distribution. The Members supply their franks in sheets of ten. They are cut up into single slips and counted into bundles by expert counters from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. As a Member sends in an order a blue slip is made out calling upon the seed warehouse to deliver that quantity, and this is accompanied by the corresponding number of franks. The seed packages are either sent to the office of the Member of Congress, if the franks are not addressed, or are mailed out directly from the seed warehouse if they are addressed.

These franks are now coming in at the rate of 200,000 or 300,000 a day. March — is the last date on which orders may be submitted by Members of Congress, which means that about 5,000,000 franks have yet to be received within the next two weeks. All of these seed packages will be sent out before April 10. Each Member is entitled to 20,000 packages of vegetable seeds and 2,000 packages of flower seeds. As each of these packages contains five small papers of seeds, it really means that 110,000 papers of seeds are sent out by each Member of the Senate and House.

The way in which these seeds are first put into the small papers and sealed and then put one each of five different kinds into a larger package and sealed, with the Member's frank pasted on each package for direct mailing, is an interesting part of the congressional distribution system. This is done by contract, and this year a new contractor is on the job, Frank Clarke, of Waco, Tex., who has speeded up the work by devising a new gluing machine.

For only 3 years in the last 22 years has a company of Fitchburg, Mass., missed out on this contract. Mr. Clarke was making a seed distribution for some banks in Texas during the war that were giving away seeds instead of calendars. He heard of the congressional distribution, sent in a bid, and got the job. Under the terms of the contract he is severely penalized for any mistakes or damages—if a franked wrapper is torn, if the right assortment is not in each package, and even if the wrapper is soiled.

The seed envelopes are filled by machinery, which automatically weighs the contents of each envelope. Two girls work at one of these machines, one filling and the other sealing the little envelopes on a revolving belt. Filling and sealing 36,000 of these little envelopes is considered a good day's work. The girls get piecework over 20,000 a day. The writer saw two girls at work who have run up as high as 48,200, which means that they had to fill and seal 100 packages a minute all day long.

Other girls sit at big tables pasting the congressional franks onto the container on which are printed the names of the five varieties of vegetables or flowers that are to be placed within. A belt carrier runs beside huge bins into which the small packages of seed have been dumped. As the girls finish pasting the franks on the big envelopes they are carried, one at a time, along this traveling belt roadway and in front of a bin at regular intervals are girls, each of whom slips in a small envelope, and the container proceeds to an inspector and then past another girl, who seals up the package by machinery.

There are 64 of the seed bins, which, when less than half full, contain about 25,000,000 packages of seed. By the use of the automatic weigher on the larger packages of from 1 to 5 pounds, such as beans, alfalfa, and dry-land seed, it has become possible to run 100 pounds a minute, and increases the output from 10 to 20 pounds.

This is one of the very busy corners in Uncle Sam's world's largest industrial plant, which those who are prone to criticize the Government officers as taking a long time to do little or nothing do not see. The congressional distribution of free seeds is quite a more complicated business than people generally know. Members of Congress say their mail shows them that through the free-seeds plan Uncle Sam gets very close to the people.

BOARD OF EQUITABLE ADJUDICATION.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10443) to repeal section 2453 and to amend sections 2450, 2451, and 2456, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the object of this bill? I have not had time to examine the very careful report of the gentleman.

Mr. SINNOTT. The object of the bill is to eliminate the Attorney General's office from the Board of Equitable Adjudication and to repeal two statutes which are really deadwood. There is in the Interior Department a Board of Equitable Adjudication, which reviews cases where the matter is solely between the Government and the land applicant. The board is authorized to decide these cases according to equitable rules. The Attorney General has been a member of that board. However, the department finds that his participation upon the board causes a great deal of delay. He says so himself, and he requests that he be eliminated from the board, and that the matter be handled in the Department of the Interior, where it is really handled for all practical purposes.

Mr. WALSH. This would in no way prejudice the rights of the Government in passing upon these claims?

Mr. SINNOTT. It does not modify the present statutes at all, except to eliminate the Attorney General's office from this board.

Mr. WALSH. Will the solicitor for that department be consulted with reference to legal questions that might arise?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes; that is, of the Department of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think it is highly important that this legislation should be enacted. The reference of these cases to the Attorney General's office has been largely a matter of form for many years and has resulted in delay. Cases are ordinarily not tremendously important, but they are cases in which the equities are so very convincing and so strong that there can be little doubt, practically no doubt, in regard to their proper determination, though there may be some little question as to some technical point of law. I think it is in the interest of good administration, as construed by the Secretary, that the change be made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10443) to repeal section 2453 and to amend sections 2450, 2451, and 2456, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2453, Revised Statutes of the United States, be repealed and section 2450, 2451, and 2456 be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2450. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office is authorized to decide upon principles of equity and justice, as recognized in courts of equity, and in accordance with regulations to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, consistently with such principles, all cases of suspended entries of public lands and of suspended preemption land claims, and to adjudge in what cases patents shall issue upon the same.

"SEC. 2451. That every such adjudication shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior and shall operate only to divest the United States of the title of the land embraced thereby, without prejudice to the rights of conflicting claimants.

"SEC. 2456. That where patents have been already issued on entries which are approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon the canceling of the outstanding patent, is authorized to issue a new patent, on such approval, to the person who made the entry, his heirs or assigns."

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Line 3, page 1, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "sections."

After the figures "2453" insert "and 2454."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time and was read the third time.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, on page 2, line 6, to strike out the word "of" and insert the word "to" in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 2, line 6, strike out the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "to."

Mr. MANN. That does not read very well.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It reads:

Divest the United States of the title to the land.

Mr. MONDELL. That has been the law for a long time.

Mr. SINNOTT. The language given here in the bill has been the law for a good many years.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is incorrect, even if it has been in the law for a good many years.

Mr. SINNOTT. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. That is, the second word "of"?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The second word "of."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows:

A bill to repeal sections 2453 and 2454, and to amend sections 2450, 2451, and 2456, Revised Statutes of the United States.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OVERTIME COMPENSATION, MEAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10672) to amend the act of July 24, 1919, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question, but inasmuch as I do not see him on the floor I ask that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ERADICATION OF CITRUS CANKER.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10673) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to pay miscellaneous expenses incurred during the fiscal years 1916 and 1917 in connection with the eradication of citrus canker in the State of Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request as to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SCIENTIFIC INVESTIGATORS, ETC., DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 10819, relating to the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CONSTRUCTION OF RETIREMENT LAW OF 1920.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3265) construing the expression "all employees in the classified civil service of the United States," as used in section 1 of the act of May 22, 1920, entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I merely wish to make an inquiry as to the need for the last paragraph in the bill, as to why we should extend the construction of the phrase "classified civil service," to where it may occur in other acts of Congress.

Mr. LEHLBACH. While the opinion of the Attorney General defining the classified civil service contrary to the construction that has been put upon the term ever since the civil-service system of the country has been inaugurated was rendered in connection with the retirement law, nevertheless there are other acts under which the administration has acted in accordance with the original construction of the term and the construction placed upon it by this bill. It is thought advisable to have the term uniform throughout the legislation that might affect the subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of an objection.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—you use this language in the bill: "To include all persons who have been heretofore or may hereafter be given a competitive status in the classified service." That may require a definition. Of course these men are covered into the classified service. They are not given a competitive status, as a matter of fact. I do not know what call there may be that declares them to have a competitive status in order to be covered into the classified service.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will say to the gentleman that that same objection occurred to me, and I had drafted an amendment to this bill as it passed the Senate expressing in what I tried to make explicit language the cases which are meant to be covered by the term "having a competitive status." I had conferred in the matter with Mr. Wales, who had discussed the matter with the Attorney General's office and the lawyers of the Department of the Interior and with his own people, and all had agreed that the term "having a competitive status" was an unequivocal, well-defined, and generally accepted term, meaning an employee who is under the protection of the civil service law and the regulations thereunder, and that there can not be any question of any misconstruction of that term; and in view of that fact I decided to discard my amendment and adopt the language of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Very well. That will be satisfactory to me. But in view of the fact that the civil service law has been construed for 30 or 40 years as including in the term "classified service" all those who are covered into the service under the provisions of the act, and along comes a new employee of the Attorney General's office and says that the construction of everybody in the past is wrong, what assurance is there that an Attorney General a few years from now, or one of his subordinates, will not say that "a competitive status" means a status obtained by competition?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Whatever view may be taken of the question by any authority in the future, I can say confidently that there is no prospect of such an opinion coming from the present Attorney General's office.

Mr. MANN. I would hate to have to pass another law now, construing this one, as to the construction of a former law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman will understand that the possible construction of the language to mean a status obtained by competition is obviated by the language qualifying what is understood to be meant by the "classified service," stating that such a status may be "with or without competitive examination, by legislative enactment, or under the civil-service rules promulgated by the President, or by Executive orders," so that I think it is airtight at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the civil service retirement act approved May 22, 1920, the expression "all employees in the classified civil service of the United States," as used in section 1 thereof, shall be construed to include all persons who have been heretofore or who may hereafter be given a competitive status in the classified civil service, with or without competitive examination, by legislative enactment, or under the civil service rules promulgated by the President, or by Executive orders covering groups of employees with their positions into the competitive classified service or authorizing the appointment of individuals to positions within such service.

The expression "classified civil service" as the same occurs in other acts of Congress shall receive a like construction to that herein given.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEHLBACH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PATTERSON of Missouri (at the request of Mr. FAUST), for 10 days, on account of the dangerous illness of his father;

To Mr. FIELDS, indefinitely, on account of illness; and

To Mr. HAMMER (at the request of Mr. DOUGHTON), for 10 days, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 21, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

[Western Union Telegram.]

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 21, 1921.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

My attention has been called to a charge by Senator BORAH in the Senate to-day to the effect that I had stated that there was a secret understanding between the United States and Great Britain regarding far eastern and Pacific questions and that members of the Washington conference were my authority for this statement. I hope I need not assure you that this charge is unfounded. I never made such a statement nor have I ever talked with any member of the Washington conference on the subject of the alleged statement, or on any subject remotely resembling it. What I have said, in substance, on more than one occasion, is that to my mind the successful and sympathetic cooperation between the American and British delegations at the Washington conference, which is a matter of public knowledge, augurs well for future cooperation between those nations in dealing intelligently and effectively with the problems of the Pacific. My attention has just been called to what purports to be the stenographers' minutes of an informal discussion at a recent meeting of an organization known as the council on foreign relations, in which I took part. I infer that the language attributed to me by Senator BORAH must be based on a paragraph from those minutes which attributes to me language which, to the best of my recollection I did not use, but which, if used, was the language of informal discussion that did not accurately convey my meaning. When those minutes were submitted to me I corrected them so as to convey my true meaning, and in their corrected form they were printed and circulated by the council of foreign relations. I did not remotely have in mind any secret agreement or understanding between the American and British Governments, but simply that sympathy and understanding which is engendered by successful cooperation and mutual confidence.

PAUL D. CRAVATH.

Mr. LODGE. I also ask to have read a brief letter received from the Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, March 21, 1922.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I notice that the latest charge in the course of the debate over the four-power treaty is that there is a secret agreement or understanding between this Government and Great Britain with respect to Pacific matters. Any such statement is absolutely false. We have no secret understandings or agreements with Great Britain in relation to the four-power treaty or any other matter.

In my letter to Senator UNDERWOOD on March 11, in relation to the four-power treaty, I said:

"There are no secret notes or understandings."

Permit me to express the hope that the American delegates will be saved further aspersions upon their veracity and honor.

Faithfully yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the telegram and the letter may be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to take just a few moments in reply to the communications just read?

Mr. EDGE. In the course of my remarks, which will require only about 15 minutes, I purpose touching indirectly, if not directly, upon this so-called controversy. I desire to be courteous to the Senator from Idaho, but I am afraid if he starts we would have a running debate for an hour or two.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; I shall not inconvenience the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, either the four-power treaty should be ratified by the Senate, or any further thought of limiting armaments should be indefinitely postponed. The necessity of ratifying both of these agreements or neither is so obvious and self-evident that any other viewpoint is beyond comprehension.

If the Senate by its own vote defeats the ratification of the four-power treaty and thus demonstrates its distrust and lack of confidence in the intent or integrity of other powerful nations, by that very admission it conclusively proves the necessity of our maintaining the most powerful Navy in the world.

If two-thirds of the membership of the Senate favor a limitation of naval armament and a cessation of competition between nations in building warships and ironclads, which action the country undoubtedly demands, then we must encourage international comity and assume some cooperative responsibility to help maintain the peace of the world.

I do not propose to take the time to discuss the technical differences that have arisen in this debate as to when a treaty is an alliance or is not an alliance, or as to the menace of the existing Anglo-Japanese alliance, or to indulge in a historical review covering past happenings in connection with ententes, triumvirates, or other international compacts. We are now dealing with something entirely different and all precedents fail. I will very briefly confine myself to what I consider the practical effect of the proposed four-power compact and its influence on the world's future.

I see a great difference between the League of Nations covenant, with its agreement to preserve the territorial integrity of practically all the country in the world, especially when urged without far-reaching reservations, and a compact between four nations, in effect agreeing to respect each other's present possessions in the only section of the world in which the United States is interested from a territorial standpoint, coupled with a further agreement to confer in case of threatened danger.

For me it is difficult to reconcile the position of those who, during the league debate, argued that we should accept mandates practically to direct the affairs of such turbulent countries as Turkey and Armenia, and who now express a fear of entangling and destructive alliances, which they say would be calamitous when it is suggested that we sit around a table and discuss possible remedies for international problems that may threaten a section in which we have important interests.

We are a Pacific, not a European power.

Apparently no effort at international cooperation would now gain the support of those who take that position, and yet many of the present opponents of the pending treaty were prepared to accept the League of Nations without reservation or amendment. Surely, if the league with its guaranty to preserve existing territorial possessions was not conducive to war, then there would be no danger in that regard under the four-power treaty.

Whether the Anglo-Japanese alliance was a menace to the United States or otherwise, it appeals to me as common sense to scrap a two-party offensive and defensive alliance and replace it with the assured participation of the four powers particularly interested in Pacific possessions and to endeavor by our very presence to influence a recognition of the policies and traditions to which the United States has always subscribed.

Much of the criticism of the pending treaty is centered upon the question as to who wrote it or who inspired it, coupled with expressions demonstrating suspicion of the real intent and purposes of the statesmen representing the different nations. There is criticism even of the home reception of a distinguished foreign delegate. Every rumor of secret understanding, regardless of whether it is officially denied, is seized upon by opponents of ratification as an evidence of complicity. Frankly, I do not believe any of these objections will, or should, greatly influence an impartial judge or critic. If the compact is dangerous or inimical to the interests of this country, no matter who wrote it, it should not be ratified, but the objection should be based upon the terms of the compact itself, and not upon its authorship.

Let us deal in facts, not rumors or fancies.

Speaking as a layman, I do not know how an international understanding could be written in simpler language or in words less susceptible of misunderstanding than the treaty now under consideration. It furnishes the best guaranty for world peace ever presented. How, therefore, can we refuse to do our part?

So far as I am concerned, I have always been convinced that the United States must assume her part in the settlement of international problems, and, under this compact, I do not harbor the slightest fear of international entanglements.

Mr. President, it is a libel on American statesmanship to assume that our representatives at any conference in which we may participate under the terms of this compact would be unable to protect properly the interests of the United States. It is unthinkable that we would not be an important influence in helping to settle threatened difficulties or that the force and power of the participation of our country would not minimize rather than accentuate strife or friction.

Is it not reasonable to assume, if the peace of the Pacific were threatened, that we would naturally be brought into the conflict, whether we were a part of the four-power treaty or otherwise?

Were we not drawn into the Great War without being party to any alliance, compact, or international combination whatsoever? And just as surely as we are debating this treaty to-day, if there were an attempted aggression in the Pacific upon the part of any power, sooner or later we would become involved in the controversy.

Many an international misunderstanding has developed and been fanned into flame because of the distance intervening between those arguing by cable or diplomatic notes. Such calamities possibly could have been averted if representatives of the contending nations could have gathered around a table. People often hate each other at a distance; it is difficult to hate side by side.

Is it not better by far to be associated with the other nations particularly interested in a certain quarter of the world and agree to discuss any threatening situation which may arise and thus give the world, as well as ourselves, the benefit of our influence and power in an effort to prevent war than to endeavor to stop it after it has commenced?

Has it occurred to the critics of this treaty that the obligations under its terms are not all and alone upon us? Might it not be helpful at some time to have other powerful nations bound to respect our rights as well as we to respect theirs? Our policy and rôle are peaceful, and territorial aggression forms no part of our national ambitions. Is it not reasonable to assume that through this mutual understanding and the force and power of this union future invasions will be discouraged, or at least minimized, and that we, as well as our neighbors, shall profit?

I repeat what I said, in effect, upon the floor of the Senate a few days ago, that, in my judgment, so far as our being in any way morally or legally bound to enter war is concerned, the pending treaty, without any reservation whatsoever, permits us more freedom in this regard than would the League of Nations, even with the reservations which were supported by a majority of the Senate at that time.

I reiterate that I can not see the consistency of Senators on the other side who were supporters of the original League of Nations without any reservations picturing all the horrors of entanglements and war in which the United States will become involved if the four-power treaty be ratified.

Personally, I do not believe the pending treaty needs a single word of reservation or interpretation to protect us from either a moral or legal obligation to go to war or to defend any of our associates should they go to war.

I do not object in principle to the proposal that an invitation be extended to other powers that may be involved in misunderstandings in the Pacific and join in any conference called. However, I see no necessity for such a reservation.

I can not conceive of a misunderstanding in the Pacific involving a power other than the four associates in this compact, where their first act and natural policy would not of necessity be an invitation to such nations to send representatives to attend a conference and endeavor to adjust the difficulty.

I object to reservations to this treaty because of the unnecessary distrust reservations indicate, and to me the treaty's language, terms, and meaning are so simple that the tacking on of reservations would only tend to confuse rather than to clarify. Such action would invite similar reinterpretations on the part of other countries and perhaps ultimately delay, postpone, or interfere with the main accomplishment of the conference, namely, the permanent naval holiday provided for. If I shall vote for any reservation, it will only be to insure the treaty's ratification.

After all is said and done, should not other countries of the world very properly look to the United States for practical help and cooperation and expect sympathy and counsel?

By the result of the Great War a world's leadership was inherited by us that we can not refuse to assume and assert. It need not involve us in the domestic politics of other nations; it need not, and should not, alter or destroy the national traditions of America; but it can no more be set aside honorably than can our known responsibilities in any cause of humanity be willfully ignored. If we viewed the world's situation only from a selfish standpoint, we would of necessity be compelled to aid in the readjustment of economic affairs, because it has become apparent, never more concretely than at the present moment when we are confronted with existing industrial depression, that our great country with its largely increased power of production can not be really prosperous by limiting exchange and trade with ourselves.

So far as my personal viewpoint is concerned, I would harbor no fear of America suffering in any way should we participate in the Genoa conference. In our own interest, sooner or later, we must assist in adjusting the economic difficulties of the various nations of the world, whose markets we seek and which as customers contribute to our prosperity. At the same time I recognize the logical reasons advanced for postponing this participation and trust that shortly the difficulties of the situation may be adjusted.

Oh, Mr. President, in my judgment it would be a calamity from which we could not recover for generations if the agreements of the Washington conference were repudiated and it were recorded that the Senate of the United States declined to trust not only the representatives of other nations of the world but even the distinguished Americans who represented us.

Certainly under this compact nothing could be binding without unanimous consent, and certainly no man can find in the plain English presented either a moral or legal responsibility which would involve us, unless we felt that the cause was justified. Efforts have been made to establish this responsibility by comparing the pending treaty with the Entente alliance, but the language and commitments are very different. If, as I have attempted to point out, and as history demonstrates, trouble should occur in the Pacific, we would be involved in any event.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the very best evidence that this new plan for the interchange of diplomatic viewpoints will succeed is the result of the Washington conference itself. Here were the representatives of nine powerful nations of the world conferring without the interposition of superconstitutions or international understandings of any kind whatsoever. As a result of their deliberations six far-reaching treaties were unanimously agreed upon. Questions which arose from time to time during the course of the conference were compromised or adjusted, and the result of the unanimous action is before us to-day.

Is it not, then, reasonable for us to assume, whatever future difficulty may menace the Pacific, that, with the convening of the representatives of the four powers and an invitation to representatives of other nations which might be involved, an adjustment of some kind will be reached and thus war averted?

The Senate of the United States, it seems to me, with its great power, is now at the crossing of the ways. Either through a ratification of the pending treaties we will admit a willingness to meet in the endeavor to adjust possible difficulties with our neighbors, or we will go it alone. On the other hand, if because of some technicalities or doubts we place our stamp of disapproval upon this final effort mutually to face and adjust world problems, then we must realize that we assume a grave responsibility.

What further suggestion can any statesman offer for world cooperation? Our refusal, Mr. President, as I contemplate the situation, means isolation with all the selfishness and misunderstanding that such a policy must invite. I have never believed that our country should hold itself entirely aloof from all international concerns. I have never feared our ability to protect ourselves in diplomatic intercourse, or, if need be, in the resort to sterner measures. We can not face international problems as the country faced them a hundred years ago. We live in a different world to-day. The problems confronting the world are more interlocking; America is more powerful and potential; and the position of leadership in the world which she is destined to occupy can not be lightly or selfishly thrust aside. A disturbed and distracted world requires our sympathy and advice. We must not, we can not, refuse our aid.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to take advantage of my position in the Senate to say anything concerning Mr. Cravath that I would not say in a personal interview with him or in a personal discussion with him. I do want, however, to examine his statement in the light of the facts. He has sent a telegram to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in which he says:

> My attention has been called to a charge by Senator BORAH in the Senate—

I do not know what he means by "a charge." I made no charge at all. He made a charge, a most grave and serious one, and I read it. I read his statement and permitted it to speak for itself. The whole matter, therefore, turns upon the question of whether or not I was misled in quoting him.

Further, he says:

> I infer that the language attributed to me by Senator BORAH must be based on a paragraph from those minutes which attribute to me language which, to the best of my recollection, I did not use; but which, if used, was the language of informal discussion that did not accurately convey my meaning.

Of course, if that kind of a plea were made in court, the court would pronounce a judgment of guilty upon the man making it.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is not a great international lawyer making that kind of a statement?

Mr. BORAH. Now, this is the part to which I call attention:

> When those minutes were submitted to me I corrected them so as to convey my true meaning, and in their corrected form they were printed and circulated by the council on foreign relations.

Mr. President, I have the document which was printed and circulated by this body of which he is vice president, and I am going to read from this authorized and corrected statement, and I ask the Senate to follow me by reading what I read yesterday, and it will be found there is not a change of a word, not even of punctuation. If this represents Mr. Cravath's view, I take it; I accept it.

I read from a document which bears upon its cover:

> No. 29.
> Proceedings of the Council on Foreign Relations, Inc.
> Comments upon the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments and Far Eastern Questions.

On the inside page I read:

Conference of the Council on Foreign Relations, Inc.
Hotel Astor, New York City.
February 17, 1922.
Subject:
Comments Upon the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments and Far Eastern Questions.
Presiding: Hon. John W. Davis, former ambassador to England.
Speaker: Hon. Norman H. Davis, formerly Undersecretary of State.
Discussion led by Mr. Paul D. Cravath.
Officers and directors:
President, John W. Davis.
Vice president, Paul D. Cravath.
Secretary and treasurer, Edwin F. Gay.
[Directors:] Isaiah Bowman, A. C. Coolidge, Norman H. Davis, Stephen P. Duggan, John H. Finley, David F. Houston, Otto H. Kahn, Frank L. Polk, W. R. Shepherd, Paul M. Warburg, George W. Wickersham.
William C. Grace, general manager, 25 West Forty-third Street, New York City.

I did not purloin this document. It was given to me by a gentlemen who is a member of the corporation who was present that night when the discussion took place and who says that this is the discussion which did take place, and Mr. Cravath says it is not only the discussion but the corrected and printed and circulated discussion. I read:

Now, to my mind—

Says Mr. Cravath—

a very important part of the achievement of the Washington conference is not recorded at all in black and white in that treaty or in any of the other treaties that were negotiated. And that is the bringing about of what seems to be a sympathetic understanding between the United States and Great Britain regarding the Far East and Pacific questions generally. I quite agree that under the program produced by those treaties we have practically surrendered our naval position in the Pacific. I assume that without further fortifications in the Pacific and that with the fortifications and fleets as agreed upon we could not successfully compete with Japan in the Pacific alone, and certainly we could not compete with an Anglo-Japanese fleet in that region. On the other hand, and to my mind this is the much more encouraging statement based on the same facts, an Anglo-American fleet in the Pacific would dominate Japan, and it seems to me that we have substituted in place of the necessity for creating the greatest fleet the world has ever seen, with all the expense and temptations that involves, an understanding and basis for cooperation with Great Britain which gives those two powers the control of a combined fleet in the Pacific which will be large enough to dominate Japan and make her live up to the obligations she has assumed.

This is the correct statement, Mr. President.

Mr. DAVIS.—

Now, mind you, Mr. Davis asks for specific information. They were engaged in a joint debate.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to know if you are making that statement as a fact or is it just your own opinion of what would happen?
Mr. CRAVATH. I have been told by every member of the American delegation—and while I haven't been told by every member of the British delegation—

Corrected copy!—

Notice the distinction—

I know definitely that the view is held by Mr. Balfour and I think by every other member of the British delegation, that the result of the Washington conference has been not a formal agreement by any means but an understanding, and such a degree of understanding, and such a basis of sympathy has been created between Great Britain and the United States, that both sides assume that in all future emergencies they can both count on having the very closest cooperation.
Mr. DAVIS. No; that isn't what I mean. What I mean is as to the agreements on fortifications and the agreement as to the naval ratio—do you mean to say that both fleets would dominate the Japanese fleet?
Mr. CRAVATH. Of course, I have no independent knowledge of that. I am not a naval expert, and have no independent opinion on that point, but I am informed that our technical advisers are satisfied that if the United States and Great Britain are on one side and Japan on the other, that the Anglo-American fleet and the entire Anglo-American naval position would dominate that of Japan in Japanese waters.
As I say—

Continuing Mr. Cravath's revised version—

I have no independent opinion of my own on that. I am simply repeating what I have been told in Washington, but, in all events, we are very much better off if I am right in assuming that underlying sympathy with Great Britain than we would have been with as large a fleet as the one that we have had in contemplation and on our building program, being opposed with the largest fleet that Japan would find herself physically able to build, and Great Britain being bound as a matter of course to keep pace with both. So, assuming that our theory of Anglo-American cooperation is well grounded, it does seem to me that our naval position, as against Japan, has been improved rather than weakened, and we have the great advantage in the reduction of our naval program and all that that means financially and otherwise.

Mr. President, if there is a change of a letter, a change of a word, a change of punctuation, I ask some Senator here who may have followed me to correct me when I say there was none.

Now I am going to bring forth another proof that that actually happened there, because Mr. Davis replied to it. On page 37 of this printed edition—this edition made after due reflection, after the great international lawyer had considered his words and the import of his words—I find this. Davis says:

Really, this whole business now strikes me as being worse after hearing your explanation than I thought it was in the beginning, because you say in substance that we really couldn't tackle Japan. We couldn't whip her alone. So we just decided that as Japan was wanting all these things out there and as she was preparing for war against us the only way to stop her was to surrender any claim or right that we might have there. Of course, you can stop any war that way. Give the party what it wants and it will quit fighting you. That is easy. No country is fool enough to keep on fighting if you will let her have what she wants without fighting for it. You go ahead to say "What have we done?" We have done a marvelous thing. We want to deal fairly with Japan, and all that, but at the same time we have gone ahead and formed a combination whereby we can crush her to pieces if she should refuse to do what is right—what we think is right. We have got so much force now that we can force her position. Now, that is not getting very near to the League of Nations.

Mr. Cravath had assured them in a former part of this debate that this was a step toward the League of Nations.

As much as I favor Anglo-American friendship—and I do most heartily—the very moment that England and America get together to bulldoze the rest of the world they will destroy all their usefulness. They must respect the rights of the small nations just as much as anyone else. You don't seem to think that this is an alliance?

And then they went off on a discussion of the alliance.

Mr. President, whatever injustice I did Mr. Cravath, I did not misquote him. I permitted him to make his own case. I leave him to his own reflections.

I assume, Mr. President, that when I stated yesterday that I read from the stenographic report, Mr. Cravath assumed that I did not have an edition, and he felt safe in the course he adopted to extricate himself.

He begins his speech in a way that leaves no doubt as to the verity of this report. He says:

I approach the discussion of these treaties very much from the point of view of Mr. Davis. Like him, I favored ratification of the treaty of Versailles—bad as I thought it to be. I favored our entering into the League of Nations—dangerous as article 10 and the obligations there imposed seemed to me to be.

And so forth.

Mr. President, I am only going to discuss one feature of the matter to-day, and that is as to whether I correctly quoted Mr. Cravath; but I want to insert in the RECORD the entire debate between Mr. Norman H. Davis, Paul D. Cravath, and the others who took part in it, who were Mr. Roland S. Morris, formerly a representative of this Government in China; Mr. C. G. Young, Mr. J. G. McDonald, Mr. H. S. Houston, Mr. Albert Rathbone, Mr. Sidney L. Gulick, Mr. Dawson, and Mr. Paul Fuller, jr., and the remarks of Mr. John W. Davis, as chairman. He says:

We are indeed fortunate to have the two gentlemen who will open the discussion for us, Mr. Davis and Mr. Paul D. Cravath. The evening belongs to them until they are ready to surrender it. I hope you will all take advantage of the opportunity when they are finished with their addresses, and you are at liberty to shoot at one or both speakers. If you don't care to have them as your target to shoot at, why then set up your own target and shoot at that. I now call on Mr. Norman H. Davis.

Mr. McCORMICK. Apparently the invitation still holds good.

Mr. BORAH. There is another feature of this, Mr. President, which I shall discuss later, and that is as to why this debate took place, why this was said, and why this pamphlet is being circulated in certain circles throughout the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I simply want to correct the Senator in one statement. Mr. Morris was our representative in Japan, not in China.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is correct.

I ask to have the entire debate inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks, and printed in 8-point type.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

CONFERENCE OF THE COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS (INC.), HOTEL ASTOR, NEW YORK CITY, FEBRUARY 17, 1922.

SUBJECT: COMMENTS UPON THE CONFERENCE ON THE LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS AND FAR EASTERN QUESTIONS.

[Officers and directors: President, John W. Davis; vice president, Paul D. Cravath; secretary and treasurer, Edwin F. Gay; Isaiah Bowman, A. C. Coolidge, Norman H. Davis, Stephen P. Duggan, John H. Finley, David F. Houston, Otto H. Kahn, Frank L. Polk, W. R. Shepherd, Paul M. Warburg, George W. Wickersham; William C. Grace, general manager, 25 West Forty-third Street, New York City.]

Hon. JOHN W. DAVIS (chairman). Gentlemen of the council, our topic for this evening is undoubtedly the most important of all topics as affecting the foreign relations of this country—the Washington conference and its effect on our foreign relations.

We are indeed fortunate to have the two gentlemen who will open the discussion for us, Mr. Davis and Mr. Paul D. Cravath. The evening belongs to them until they are ready to surrender it. I hope you will all take advantage of the opportunity when they are finished with their addresses, and you are at liberty to shoot at one or both speakers. If you don't care to have them as your target to shoot at, why then set up your own target and shoot at that. I now call on Mr. Norman H. Davis.

Hon. NORMAN H. DAVIS. The achievements of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament and Far Eastern Questions have been of considerable importance. First among these was the revival of a state of mind by which attention was directed to the superior benefits of peace and cooperation over those of selfishness and strife.

It is of course easy to criticize the failures of the conference. It is easy to show that many important questions still pressing for a solution were not settled and that some of those heralded as happily disposed of may remain sources of future trouble. It is also easy to point out that in so far as any real progress was made, it was only by following in the footprints leading to the League of Nations and world-wide cooperation. Our national welfare is, however, too dependent upon the contribution we make to an improvement in international relationships to excuse a partisan, unintelligent, or emotional consideration of such a vital question. America and the world have suffered almost to the breaking point, partly as a result of the unfortunate controversies over the work of the Paris peace conference, because criticism of real or alleged defects in the treaty of Versailles were allowed to obscure and deprive us of the good and lasting achievements. We must accept and hold to the benefits secured at the Washington conference, but these may be lost if we fool ourselves into believing that all the necessary objectives have been reached and fail to press forward. It is therefore our duty to take stock and examine any defects and mistakes, not with a view of belittling the good results but for the purpose of correcting the defects or avoiding the mistakes in order to preserve our gains and strive for greater achievements.

The apparent rapid progress made at the outset in Washington raised undue expectations. It may be that we advanced too rapidly in some directions and not enough in others. Constructive improvement in international relations comes slowly, because it is regulated by the rapidity with which the respective nations are prepared to adopt enlightened policies. Each delegation at Washington was restricted by what it was thought the peoples acting through their Government would accept. In order to appraise the work of the conference it is therefore necessary not only to survey the principal questions which were causing friction and preventing a decrease in armament for which solutions were sought but first of all to review the state of national opinion as to the relevant matters involved and the circumstances under which the conference was called. We may then examine more in detail some of the questions in the agenda and consider to what extent the difficulties indicated have been removed; what, if any, false steps have been taken, and what further steps should be taken.

The war aroused a general public demand for measures which would prevent a recurrence of such a catastrophe and relieve the peoples of the burdens growing out of armaments. The first serious attempt to bring this about was through the creation of the League of Nations. With the realization that the problem must be dealt with as a whole; that nations would not reduce or discard their arms without some assurance that their rights and interests would be otherwise protected and secured, the League of Nations was formulated on a comprehensive plan which it was believed would attain this result. More than 50 nations, being convinced of the necessity for world conference and cooperation, joined the league. The United States refused to do so or to otherwise cooperate with those powers in reaching settlements which would restore confidence and facilitate a general world-wide reduction in armaments.

Our failure to do this militated against naval disarmament as well as recovery from the world-wide industrial depression. We could not safely throw up our arms without substituting for them protective agreements with the other powers, and obviously the League of Nations could not take steps for effective disarmament, one of its principal objectives, without the concurrence of the United States, the most powerful Nation. As a result we continued to increase our Navy, and England and Japan did likewise. I shall not attempt to state why we failed to enter the league. Suffice it to say, we took the opposite course. Embracing the fiction that we were not concerned with outside controversies, we spurned this opportunity for service and leadership.

As the tide of passion and prejudice which came in the aftermath of the war began to subside, our vision and higher qualities began to emerge, the myth of American isolation began to vanish, and the necessity for international cooperation became more apparent. As Europe's economic collapse spread to the United States as a result of her contracted purchasing power, it began to be seen and admitted that we were concerned in outside questions, at least in those of an economic character. Developments soon showed that Europe's failure to recover industrially was primarily due to political policies, actuated by fear or greed, which prevented a restoration of confidence and stability—the prerequisites to economic recovery—and to a failure to reduce armaments and taxes; and therefore that industry and commerce would not recover in advance of political security and the adoption of political policies which would set the economic forces free. In the Far East trouble and friction were increasing because of the efforts of certain powers to secure for themselves preferential economic and political advantages or controls detrimental to the rights and interests of other nations, as well as to those of the people directly concerned.

It became more apparent that if we were to protect our own economic structure we must change our course and do something definite to assist in the improvement of foreign political and economic conditions, which could be done only by working in concert with the other powers. We began to see how much loss and damage had been caused by our previous failure to realize these facts and to act accordingly; and how unfortunate it was that our participation in world affairs had become the source of such a bitter political controversy that it could not then be dealt with frankly on its merits.

I have held the belief that once the leaders of the present administration were confronted with the same facts and problems which confronted the last administration, and with the same solemn official responsibility for decision and action, they would reach substantially the same conclusions and see the wisdom of adopting the same true American course. My belief has been substantially confirmed, except as to our ratification of the treaty of Versailles and entrance into the League of Nations. Although some of the Republican Senators opposed in principle our entrance into the league, the large majority of them, including Senator Harding, professed to favor it in principle, but insisted upon reservations to rectify or remove certain alleged defects. Furthermore, 31 distinguished citizens, many of whom, including our present distinguished Secretary of State, were intellectual leaders in the Republican Party, had in an open letter on the eve of the election in 1920 expressed the firm conviction that the United States should ratify the treaty of Versailles and enter the League of Nations, and had assumed the solemn moral responsibility of assuring the American people that the election of Mr. Harding would insure our taking this wise course. We must assume that these views, under the circumstances in which they were given publicity, must have been reached after most earnest and well-matured consideration; and also that these 31 gentlemen still believe as we do that this would have been the wise and logical way to secure world-wide cooperation and to deal with disarmament; otherwise they surely long ago would have so informed the public who in such great numbers placed their faith in that assurance. It must be admitted, however, that the "irreconcilables," although in the minority, professed equal assurance that Mr. Harding, if elected, would keep us out of the league. Instead of clarifying issues, the 1920 elections confused them. The overwhelming Republican victory obtained by the temporary combination of groups holding most conflicting views gave to each of them an opportunity to claim approval from the people. Whatever may have been Mr. Harding's views as a candidate, as to which there is still a divergence of opinion, he did talk about a new association of nations without involvements, but did not as President show any inclination to enter the existing one, or to give any clear lead as to a possible new one. To make confusion worse, the public were not told nor could they see what course the administration proposed to take. As a result, the Senate virtually took control of our foreign relations.

Shortly after the present administration came into power, and before it had formulated or announced any definite policy in respect to the future relationship of the United States to world problems, it considered itself forced by a resolution of Congress to make a separate peace with Germany. It would seem, however, that this was in accord with the President's own ideas, since he as a Senator had voted for a similar resolution and after election had invited such action. Before negotiations for a separate treaty with Germany were concluded, the administration considered itself again forced to take another step, as a result of a congressional resolution, to call a conference for the limitation of armament.

Obviously the separate peace resolution and the disarmament resolution were attempts by Congress to respond to a public sentiment again becoming articulate, and to an increasing pressure for a solution of the disturbing world problems, in view of the fact that the administration was failing to act or point the way.

The President and the Secretary of State were evidently in possession of facts which convinced them of the inexpediency and futility of attempting to bring about a limitation of armament without the concurrent settlement of other questions so intimately related to, if not the cause for, maintaining and increasing armaments. As a settlement of the various controversies relating to China and Siberia had more relation to naval armament, and as it was probably considered premature to tackle European questions, the scope of the proposed conference was enlarged but practically limited to far eastern questions, although conditions in Europe were causing more loss and trouble. There had not been so much controversy or fear over our becoming entangled in Asiatic controversies. Some minds functioned differently in respect to questions in Asia, 7,000 miles to the west of us, than in Europe, 3,000 miles to the east. Future developments may, it is hoped, enable a shortening of mental range, even to the extent of realizing that questions in Europe may have a most important relation to those in Asia and even the Pacific Ocean and to world peace.

I believe, as did those 31 gentlemen who signed the aforementioned letter, that our logical and safe course was to have entered the League of Nations, or, failing in that, the administration should at least have offered some other definite, comprehensive plan for world conference and cooperation. Having done neither, it was decided to tackle the problems piecemeal and to invite to a conference on the limitation of armament and far eastern questions eight members of the League of Nations, apparently with the object of thus securing a part of the desired objective. With the specter of the mangled treaty of Versailles hovering over them, and the uncertainty of what policies would meet with approval, our delegates embarked upon their course without a compass.

We may now review the far eastern questions included in the agenda of the conference which were to be taken up in connection with a limitation of naval armament and see to what extent they have been settled. Most of these relate to the so-called open door, a policy originally announced by the United States, which had by successive interpretations come to mean equal opportunity for all powers in trade and commerce in China and respect by all powers of the territorial and political integrity of China.

All of the powers represented at the conference had for 20 years officially professed to accept this policy, but it was being constantly violated. On account of more recent developments, the United States Government took the position that the principles embodied in this policy should also be applied to Siberia. Japan had been charged with the most serious disregard of these principles in Manchuria, Shantung, Siberia, and Sakhalin.

In 1915 Japan submitted her famous 21 demands, which in effect would have made Manchuria a Japanese Province. The Japanese delegates at Washington announced an intention not to press for acceptance by China of some of the most objectionable of these demands, but this question remains unsettled.

One of the most important questions to be settled was that relating to the Chinese Eastern Railway. This railway, which crosses Manchuria and connects at Manchouli with the Trans-Siberian Railway, belongs to Russia, through the nominal ownership of the Russo-Asiatic Bank, and ultimately reverts under certain conditions to China. On account of the vital necessity of this railway for commerce into Manchuria, Siberia, and Russia, the allied and associated powers, constituting themselves as trustees, took control during the war and appointed an interallied committee, headed by a distinguished American engineer, Mr. John F. Stevens. This committee has been operating the road in the interests of all concerned, pending its return to the owners. Successful operation was prevented, however, by a lack of proper cooperation and because the committee's control did not extend over the Ussuri Railway, which is now in control of Japan and connects the Chinese Eastern with the terminus at Vladivostok, nor over its other outlet at Port Arthur, the terminus of the South Manchurian Railway, which is also under Japanese control. Without the removal of these obstacles it is evident that the operation could not prosper and that the open door would be a joke. No progress was made toward a settlement of this matter.

In Shantung Japan had by force taken over the ex-German interests, the right to which was claimed under secret treaties with the Allies. At the Paris conference the Japanese promised to get out, but did not fix a definite date. At the Washington conference this promise has been made good, in part or in full. It is too early to herald a complete and unconditional withdrawal in Shantung, but it is an excellent start. If, however, this withdrawal is to be made at the expense of a more secure hold on Manchuria, and especially on Siberia, it would be a costly one and will not help the situation.

In Siberia the United States has a considerable material interest as well as a moral obligation. For the purpose of extricating certain Czecho-Slovak troops in Siberia and for protecting military supplies at Vladivostok the United States agreed, in the summer of 1918, to the dispatch of allied troops under an arrangement which provided that the United States and Japan would send there a military expedition of an equal number of forces. Japan at once sent several times her quota. The Czecho-Slovak troops were embarked, and in 1920 the American troops were withdrawn. The Japanese forces, although reduced, have not been withdrawn. In spite of the fact that the Japanese Government in August, 1918, at the time of dispatching her troops to Siberia, made an official statement explaining the above object of the expedition and reaffirmed as the Japanese policy that of "respecting the territorial integrity of Russia and abstaining from all intervention in her internal affairs," and furthermore that upon the realization of that object the troops would be withdrawn, leaving "wholly unimpaired the sovereignty of Russia in all its phases, either political or military."

After the withdrawal of the American troops Japan took control of Vladivostok, which is the door to Manchuria and all of Siberia. Subsequently the Japanese troops occupied the northern half of the island of Sakhalin, which is held as a hostage until Japan receives from Russia satisfaction for certain alleged atrocities committed on the Russian mainland against Japanese troops. The original Japanese pledges have been recently renewed, but now those pledges are contingent upon settlements with Russia satisfactory to Japan, and upon a restoration of order in Siberia, which the Japanese occupation and activities make increasingly difficult. These vital questions remain unsettled, and unless and until they are settled we can not expect peace and stability in the Far East.

The controversy over the island of Yap was settled by our agreeing to Japan's claim for a mandate from the League of Nations over the island, subject to our right to land and operate cables there. It is to be presumed that the league will approve this because this island, which formerly belonged to Germany, is of vital importance for cable communication to the Far East, and can serve no other useful purpose.

The Anglo-Japanese alliance was one of the principal obstacles to a settlement of the far eastern differences as well as to naval disarmament. As long as the British were allied with the Japanese they could not act independently in the Far East and we could not consider the two navies separately. It must be admitted, however, that this alliance was not the sole obstacle to British support, because the British Government has not felt as we have the wisdom and justice of applying to Russia the same principles of nonviolation of political and territorial rights which have been professed in respect to China. There has been little, if any, opposition in England to a dismemberment of Russia, and apparently little support at the Washington conference of our views relating to Siberia. While the British realized the desirability of terminating the Anglo-Japanese alliance, they evidently did not consider it expedient to do so until they knew what our future naval and foreign policy was going to be. On the other hand, they were most desirous for a naval agreement, and equally as desirous as were we for a closer understanding and friendship between the peoples of the British Empire and the United States, which could not be had without the termination of this alliance. Japan had no desire to terminate it and was placed in a position to exact something in exchange.

The first step taken at the conference toward a settlement of the above questions was the proposal submitted by Secretary Hughes, to scrap certain battleships already constructed or in process of construction and for a period of years to limit further construction and to retain the status quo of certain fortified islands in the Pacific. This at once gave conclusive proof of our good faith and peaceful intentions and must have allayed any Japanese fears as to the hostile use of our fleet, because it was not made conditional upon Japan allaying our fear that she might continue her present activities in China and Siberia, of which we had heretofore complained. Besides stopping for at least a number of years the naval competition between England, Japan, and the United States, the naval treaty results in a division of naval spheres of influence. The United States is not permitted to increase fortifications at Guam and the Philippines, which in effect confines our naval operations to American waters. England, being permitted to increase her naval bases at Singapore, Australia, and New Zealand, may transfer a large part of her fleet there, which leaves the British and Japanese fleets in control of the Far East.

Subsequently the nine-power treaty was negotiated, which specifies so clearly the principles by which the powers are to be guided in the maintenance of Chinese integrity. This is probably the most promising agreement reached at the conference. It is unfortunate that provision was not made for canceling existing treaties (secret and public) made in violation of these principles and for a supervising organization or board with power to apply those principles rather than to report their findings to the respective Governments, but it is, after all, a fortunate beginning. It is also unfortunate that the spirit of the treaty has already been violated by the refusal to permit China now to levy import duties of more than 5 per cent, especially when other powers levy as high as 200 per cent on certain Chinese goods. This is unfair and unwise, but China came out of the conference with much more than she went in with.

The next step taken to compose the difficulties in the Far East, including ostensibly the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, was the four-power treaty between England, France, Japan, and the United States relating to the islands in the Pacific Ocean. It is more difficult to understand why this step was taken and why it was considered necessary. As the Anglo-Japanese alliance was the principal obstacle to an agreement for the limitation of naval armament, it would have been most logical and natural for our naval proposals to be made contingent upon the cancellation of this alliance, which England and Japan most surely would have welcomed and accepted had they been given the opportunity and alternative.

The Anglo-Japanese alliance covered specifically China and India and in effect provided most definitely for the maintenance of the open door, equal opportunities for all nations, and the territorial and political integrity of China. If we were to sign any treaty in substitution of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, it should have been the naval treaty or even the nine-power treaty on Chinese integrity, which is in complete harmony with the preamble of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and which should have been made applicable to Siberia as well as to China. Why cover a new portion of the world, unless it were to switch from land to sea in order to baptize us into the system of alliances? Could it be that in exchange for the intangible security to Australia and New Zealand, provided for under the Anglo-Japanese alliance, the British preferred a more tangible security from Japan and the United States, or was it to assure Japan that we would not interfere by force in her activities of which we have heretofore complained?

There exists some fear that we may be morally obligated under this treaty to use force. Senator LODGE has explained that no such obligation exists, but, in so far as I know, he has not made clear just what our obligation is not to use force. It seems to me that we are obligated not to use force without first attempting in conference to adjust any controversy in the Pacific. If a controversy should arise over the failure of one of the powers to keep its pledges in respect to China or Siberia, it is not quite so clear what our rights or duties would be under this treaty. As this and the naval treaty are not in any way conditional upon the observance of those pledges, it would seem that we are in effect estopped from using force in case of nonobservance. It would seem, therefore, that our delegates determined we would not in any event resort to force to secure our rights and interests in the Far East or that they can be properly safeguarded without it. Evidently the principal objective was to relieve all suspicion and tension in the Far East, and the remedy given was for the United States to relieve the tensions by the unconditional withdrawal of the pressure. The wisdom of this depends upon future developments and the extent to which moral force and pressure can be applied. There is undoubtedly an overwhelming demand that international disputes be settled without resort to war. I am a firm advocate of this and also of disarmament, but I am convinced that wars can not be prevented merely by discarding obsolete instruments of war. The cessation of naval competition is a wise economic move and also has a tendency to dispel fear and suspicion, but it will not prevent war. The only possible way to prevent wars is to establish some world-wide effective machinery for securing justice and respect for rights without the necessity of resorting to force except in so far as it may be required to support the machinery of justice. Unless and until the United States forms a part of such machinery, which shall include all of the powers, large and small, I am doubtful of the efficacy or wisdom of surrendering our inalienable sovereign right to use force.

President Harding stated in his message to the Senate that the four-power treaty contains "no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no written or moral obligation to join in defense, no expressed or implied commitment to arrive at agreement except in accordance with your constitutional methods." I do not understand what he means by arriving at agreement in accordance with our constitutional methods. Apparently we are committed beforehand in this treaty to a method of adjusting differences between the parties to the treaty, and in case of aggressive action by an outside power to confer and decide what to do about it. This must mean something, because, as President Harding says, "it is easy to believe, however, that such a conference of the four powers is a moral warning that an aggressive nation, giving affront to the four great powers ready to focus world opinion on a given controversy, would be embarking on a hazardous enterprise." It, of course, might be unnecessary for these powers to join armed forces to deprive other nations of their rights, but what aggressive nation have they in mind? It is conceivable that China and Russia might some day become aggressive in order to recover their territorial and political integrity, to which the United States has contended they are entitled. Surely we would not want "to focus world opinion" against them or to increase the hazard of such an enterprise by having our hands tied with those who have provoked the aggression.

The explanation for the four-power treaty may be that it was considered a most innocuous way to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance in so much as it means nothing more than to confer. If that is so, is it a wise practice for nations to sign treaties that mean nothing? Will not one nation think it means more than another does, and thus cause misunderstanding?

According to an Associated Press dispatch from Tokyo dated January 31, Baron Uchida, Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs, in replying to interpellations in the House of Peers, stated, in substance, that "the four-power treaty was not intended to abrogate the Anglo-Japanese alliance, but rather to widen and extend it." It would seem that instead of getting rid of this alliance we have entered it, widened, enlarged it, and changed or expanded the territory covered by it.

This new pact has been praised for its shortness and simplicity. Will the Chinese and Russian peoples feel that it is so simple, innocuous, and meaningless? Is it not very probable they may conclude that we have abandoned our independence of action and traditional friendship for them by entering into a pact with their oppressors? Will not this diminish our prestige and moral influence in the Far East and dishearten the peoples of China and Russia in their struggle to maintain their independence pending the working out of their salvation and the establishment of effective governments?

The powerful influence of America has been due in great measure to our impartial advocacy of justice for all nations and our freedom from alliances with one or more nations which would ignore the rights and claims or even arouse the suspicions of other nations. The hope for peace rests not in this four-power pact, but, if anywhere, in the will of the Japanese people for cooperation and peace and their ability to reverse the imperialistic policy initiated by the militaristic party. Fortunately, there appears now to be a growing public sentiment in Japan against her former aggressive policies and a growing realization that it is, from every standpoint, to the interests of Japan to cooperate with the other powers in applying the open-door principles to Siberia and China. There is no difference in principle between the two territories and nationalities; justice, future peace, and stability can not be served by one or more powers taking advantage of unfortunate political conditions in Russia any more than by doing so in China.

Would it not have been well to incorporate this in a treaty? There should have been no objection if the Japanese pledges to abstain from all intervention in the internal affairs of Russia in Siberia and to retire from there are to be complied with in good faith. This would have strengthened the liberal elements in Japan who advocate her withdrawal from Siberia.

If the military party maintains control of Japan and continues its past policy in respect to Manchuria, Siberia, and Sakhalin, the four-power treaty as it now stands may simply tie our hands, protect the Japanese rear, and encourage that party to proceed all the more vigorously with the aggressive policies on the Asiatic mainland. Although these policies were in clear violation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, the practical effect of that alliance was to assist instead of deter Japan. Now that Japan has refused to evacuate Siberia or to do more than repeat her former pledges to get out after conditions improve to her satisfaction, and the other powers have failed to protest officially against the Japanese actions, was it wise, logical, or necessary for us to bind ourselves unconditionally?

Our liberal and reasonable proposal for a naval holiday created an unusual atmosphere of good will and confidence, which should have facilitated a settlement of the other equally if not more important questions for which the conference was likewise called, particularly those relating to Manchuria, the Chinese Eastern Railway, Siberia, and Sakhalin. After we had agreed to stop naval competition and to enter the four-power pact there was not so much interest shown in settling the other questions.

The treaty on Chinese integrity was signed, but all that was done toward a world-wide reduction of land armaments was to pass a resolution recommending that the Chinese armies be reduced while foreign troops are on her soil. Afterwards some good resolutions were passed and agreements reached condemning the use of poisonous gas and outlawing the use of submarines against merchantmen, but it was impossible to agree upon a definition of a merchantman. Because of the limited number of powers represented, these agreed principles could not be embodied in international law, but they may help formulate and enlist the support of public opinion for future action in a world conference.

While the Japanese Government may have been more determined to hold on to Siberia and Manchuria than we were inclined to try to force them out, I am convinced that Japan was just as anxious to avoid trouble as we were, and that it could have been avoided. Japan knew any possible conflict with us could be easily avoided by a frank compliance with her pledges, but instead she secured from us a pledge of good behavior in the Pacific without giving a reciprocal assurance to cease doing on the Asiatic mainland the very things we have objected to as being unjust and hazardous to peace in the Far East.

Japan owns the southern half of the island of Sakhalin and claims, through occupation, some sort of an interest in the northern half. Would an attempt by Russia to recover control there threaten Japanese interests? Suppose Russia should find it necessary to land troops on the southern half in order to recover possession of her northern half. In that case what would be our obligation or position?

All differences of opinion as to whether or not the Japanese homeland was one of the islands included in the four-power treaty have been cleared up. This never seemed so important to me. The unanswered question in my mind is why was the four-power treaty negotiated and where will it lead us? Certainly it can not remain static. No treaty or alliance does. Few alliances have done what they were intended to do. Is this treaty an alliance, or is it merely an agreement to confer before going to war? If it is an alliance, against whom is it directed? It provides that a conference will be held to adjust any differences arising between the parties to this treaty, but also to determine what to do in case of aggressive or disturbing action in the Pacific by some other power not a party to the treaty. Apparently in the latter case it would automatically develop into an alliance against other powers. If it is not an alliance against other powers, but is merely an agreement to confer in order to prevent trouble among themselves or with any outside power or to settle amicably questions which concern other nations, would it not be logical to widen its scope and to fulfill that purpose by permitting any nation which may now or hereafter have an interest in the Pacific Ocean to become a party to the treaty and to attend the conferences which may be held to consider and settle such questions? That would accord with American ideals of right and justice.

There would be no impartial conference unless all of the powers which may be concerned are permitted to attend and confer as equals over any questions that may arise. Certainly Holland, Portugal, China, and Russia—when there is a recognized Russian Government—all of whom have vital interests in the Pacific, should be parties to this treaty, and why should Italy have been left out? Italy has no island or mandate in the Pacific, but she might under certain conditions be adversely affected by this pact. She supported probably more than any other power at the conference the American views, and it can not but cause some regret in Italy that she was not considered of enough importance to be asked to join in this with the other powers with which she has been associated in war and post-war activities. If a war should come between France and Italy, the latter might have a vital interest in the Pacific, if for no other reason than that of protecting her mercantile marine. If it is not an alliance, there should be no objection to bringing all of these powers in; and if it is an alliance the American people ought to know it and have an opportunity to decide whether or not they want us to adopt the European system of alliances. While there may be a difference of opinion as to the mandate of the American people to enter or stay out of the league, no one claims that they have ever given a mandate to enter an exclusive alliance.

It is difficult to see what objection there could be to inviting all of the nations to join this pact. The answer to this may be that the nations who are to-day members of the League of Nations would be entering into a superfluous agreement because they have already agreed to confer, not only on all questions arising in the Pacific but in any other portion of the world. England, France, and Japan in signing this treaty have of course agreed to nothing whatever except that for which they were already bound as members of the League of Nations, unless it be that it is an alliance meaning more than its advocates contend and that article 2 of the four-power treaty is more binding upon them than article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Many of the islands in the Pacific, the title and possession of which are in effect guaranteed by us and the other parties to this four-power treaty, are trust estates over which the League of Nations exercises jurisdiction. England, France, and Japan, as members of the League of Nations, are obligated to file this treaty with the league before it is binding on them. Was it advisable for us without even a request from the league to give this guaranty? If we wish to assist the league, is that the best way to do it?

Statesmen have been particularly concerned about two outstanding situations which were disturbing the economic and political equilibrium of the world. I refer to conditions in Europe and the Far East, which have been created more particularly by the state of mind and political policies of two nations, France and Japan, respectively. As heretofore indicated, the difficulties in the Far East which the Washington conference endeavored to solve were due primarily to Japanese activities, to which other nations, and especially the United States, were opposed, and to the fear on the part of Japan that force might be employed to stop them. The situation referred to in Europe has grown out of the war. The principal obstacle to a restoration of confidence and stability, as well as to a reduction in armies, is due to the French policy of taking measures to secure dominance in Europe and so prevent another invasion by Germany. The settlements in the Far East may all be upset unless Europe is straightened out. It is apparent that without some measure of assurance against aggression France can not be persuaded to disarm and contribute her share toward the restoration of Europe's equilibrium. We refuse to give any guaranty to France, or, better still, to enter the League of Nations, and make it such a factor that France would not require further assurance, but we have asked France to join with us in the four-power treaty to guarantee peace in the Pacific and tranquillity to Japan.

In so far as concerns the participation of any one nation in international affairs, there have been up to now only three distinct policies advocated or followed:

First. That of so-called isolation; the refusal to enter into offensive or defensive alliances or to act in concert with the other powers for the settlement of international controversies.

Second. The European system of alliances, or so-called "balance of power." This means agreements between certain groups of nations to act in concert, usually against certain other groups of powers.

Third. Cooperation between all of the powers.

The policy of isolation has under modern conditions become impossible and has now been definitely discarded by the present administration.

In spite of the fact that Europe is strewn with wrecks caused by alliances, wrecks which a "balance of power" has not prevented, there are still those who cling to this forlorn hope. While the alliances, composed of a certain group of powers, have always been alleged as defensive, they are primarily intended to prevent other powers, composing another group, from interfering with alleged rights and interests. Controversial questions between the respective groups are not thus composed. The result has been ex parte arrangements and continued misunderstandings, which have resulted ultimately in armed conflict. While we must admit that through this system the recurrence of war may have been retarded, yet when a war has come it has been impossible to localize it, because so many powers are involved that it becomes a world war.

The third policy of cooperation is based upon the recognition of the failure of the two former policies. The first practical attempt to adopt this latter plan was through the creation of the League of Nations, one of the principal objects of which was to disentangle alliances by bringing all the powers together in an agreement to settle their controversies by peaceful adjustments rather than by force. This was also the first serious attempt made to bring the nations together to work in concert purely and solely in the interests of peace and equity.

I believe in the plan for universal conference and cooperation because the world has become too interdependent to function harmoniously without it, and because it is the only method offered whereby we may cooperate without becoming entangled by alliances.

I also believe in it because of the practical possibilities which it offers, because there would seem to be no harm in trying it, and because it certainly could not play any more havoc than has the system of alliances.

If there were some other means whereby alliances could be done away with and prevented, there would not be so much necessity for an association of nations. But how can this be accomplished unless all of the nations enter into an agreement to that effect and substitute more enlightened methods for adjusting differences and preventing conflicts?

America's first actual contact with the old system of alliances was when it brought us into the World War. Our second contact was with the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which we found to be quite an obstacle to just and peaceful settlements in the Far East. It is, therefore, well for us to know now whether we are rid of this obstruction or have increased its size by becoming a part of it. Alliances or special agreements between certain groups of nations arouse suspicions and militate against cooperation. The existence of the Anglo-Japanese alliance made it difficult to fix a naval ratio. It is equally certain that any subsequent alliance between one of the powers parties to the new naval treaty will upset the respective ratio of naval strength now fixed. It would therefore have been wise to prohibit any party to the treaty from making an alliance or agreement with one or more of the other members, which, since such an agreement would upset the ratio fixed, might ultimately involve joint naval action against any one of the other parties to the treaty.

It is presumed that those who have negotiated the various agreements in Washington will make very clear to us just which of the three above-mentioned plans they propose to follow. If the steps taken with a view to maintaining harmony in the Pacific Ocean and the Far East are part of a general plan to eliminate conflict in other portions of the world, it is difficult to form an intelligent opinion regarding one phase of a comprehensive plan without knowing what the entire plan is and how it will be applied to other regions of the world. If an attempt is to be made to segregate the world's problems into different compartments, would it not be well to know just what relation one compartment is to have to another? If the Far East is to be put in one compartment, the Near East in one, Europe in another, and South America in another, will it not be necessary to define how the relations between different compartments are to be maintained? How many of these groups are we going to join? Is any other power to be in them all? If a nation joins more than one, to what extent will it be a free agent and to which group will it owe most allegiance?

Surely this last war has taught us that conflicts which seem purely local and of little interest to the outside world may spread until they involve all of the powers. It is now generally admitted that some sort of international cooperation is necessary. The world has become too interdependent and interrelated to deal with its problems in separate compartments. What happens in one section affects another, and there can be no appreciable advance toward peace and prosperity until the problems are dealt with as a whole.

This last war, which involved the whole world, including the United States, grew out of issues primarily European, with which we were not supposed to be at all concerned. After that experience how is it possible to believe that questions in the Pacific Ocean merely concern the United States, Japan, England, and France?

It may be argued that this four-power treaty would be different from former or other existing alliances. That, it seems, is difficult to substantiate by existing facts. It had about the same kind of birth. The moral rights of other nations equally interested in the Pacific were ignored at the outset by not being invited to join it. Any alliance composed of powerful nations which ignores or violates the rights and claims of weaker nations would be repugnant to the fundamental and historical American principles of freedom, equality, and justice. Alliances or special agreements between a certain group of nations either originate from moral or material objectives not in harmony with those of other nations or inevitably develop conflicting objectives.

We have learned by experience that even a so-called diplomatic agreement between two powers relating to a particular question or territory results almost invariably in their acting in concert on questions outside the scope of their agreement.

America's moral influence has been due in great part to our freedom from agreements or associations with one or more powers which would commit or even influence us to act impartially against one or more other powers. If we enter the four-power pact, it will be the first time in our history that we will have entered an exclusive agreement of such a character. That, of course, is not in itself an argument against it, but should be sufficient to make us consider it very carefully.

An agreement between the four powers to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean and to confer on any controversy arising between any of them in respect thereto with a view of adjustment is not an alliance or objectionable. Article 2 of that pact is what creates the alliance or exclusive diplomatic agreement by providing that in case the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, these four powers shall confer with one another "in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation."

I am not contending that we are legally bound to do more than that, but I do contend that if it is the intention of the four powers to respect equally the rights and interests of all other powers in the regions of the Pacific Ocean those other powers should be parties to this treaty and be permitted to present their point of view on any questions that may arise and which may be of equal concern to them. Even if their rights should be scrupulously respected, their mere exclusion from this treaty and from the conferences over questions which affect their rights will inevitably cause suspicion and tend to create another group of powers to counterbalance the big four. Nine nations were asked to join in the treaty on Chinese integrity, and I can not understand why these same nations were not asked to join the four-power treaty, because whatever happens in the Pacific Ocean may be of great concern to China and also to those powers which were sufficiently interested in the welfare of China to undertake to safeguard it.

Some of my friends have, in spite of misgivings about this alliance, expressed the hope that it will, with the other agreements, ultimately lead us into the League of Nations or some similar association for world-wide cooperation. Some of them also advance the argument that since we made the mistake of not ratifying the treaty of Versailles we ought to take without question whatever is offered now, even if it is objectionable, and hope in time to improve it, because we can not afford again to repudiate the signatures of our plenipotentiaries. I regret that I can not share their optimism, because I have become convinced that the four-power pact as it now stands may not only jeopardize other agreements but that it will lead us in the opposite direction and into the European system of alliances, which will make it more difficult if not impossible thereafter to retrace our steps.

In view of our failure to ratify the treaty of Versailles, even with conditions, it is regrettable that any reservation should be deemed necessary to any of the treaties negotiated at the Washington conference. While it appears to me that the four-power pact was unnecessary and inadvisable, it has been negotiated and signed, and its complete rejection would have a very bad effect. It would therefore seem advisable to approve and ratify it subject to a provision which would clarify the doubts and eliminate the fundamental objections above indicated and thus bring it more into harmony with the letter and spirit of the other treaties negotiated as well as with American principles and practices.

The most serious doubts and objections to this treaty could be eliminated by a simple provision to the effect that any and all powers which may have an interest in the regions of the Pacific Ocean shall be invited to become a party to the treaty and to attend all conferences relative to questions arising there; that its maintenance shall be contingent upon the due and faithful adherence by each party to the principles embodied in the treaty on Chinese integrity and applied also to Siberia; and that the creation of any treaty, alliance, or diplomatic agreement in future between any two or more signatories to this treaty, to which the other signatory powers are not parties, which would tend to create a special community of interest, shall be cause for these omitted to reconsider or renounce this four-power treaty.

It is difficult to see how any one of these powers could have or raise any valid objection to this, because it will not affect them if they comply with the letter and spirit of their existing agreements and professed policies.

Unless the dangers indicated are avoided and unless we get started on the right course now we may soon find ourselves entangled in a chain of alliances covering different parts of the globe; the four-power treaty of alliance in the Pacific; the Anglo-French alliance, the Anglo-Belgian alliance, and the Franco-Belgian alliance against Germany; the Franco-Polish alliance against Germany; possibly a Franco-Rumanian-Hungarian alliance; a Balkan alliance; and then a German-Russian alliance. When all of these alliances get to working for the peace of the world we may well imagine how beautiful are the future prospects for peace.

Mr. PAUL D. CRAVATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the council, I approach the discussion of these treaties very much from the point of view of Mr. Davis. Like him, I favored ratification of the treaty of Versailles, bad as I thought it to be. I favored our entering into the League of Nations, dangerous as article 10 and the obligations there imposed seemed to me to be. I agree with Mr. Davis in hoping that we shall never return to the old system of alliances. I was one of the 31 signers of the proclamation of President Harding. I am as sincerely anxious as Mr. Davis may be that we shall work toward ultimate participation in the present league or some other league for universal international cooperation to prevent war and promote peace.

As far as I can see, the only difference between Mr. Davis and myself at the beginning is that he is a Wilson Democrat and I am a Harding Republican. That may be all the difference in the world, as far as I know.

But, before discussing the details of these treaties, there is one preliminary observation to which I attach very great importance. One of the chief arguments that influenced me in advocating our acceptance of the treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations, in spite of all the objections that I saw, was this: It seemed to me that it would be a disgrace to our country if a treaty negotiated by our President in the greatest international conference ever held, at the end of the greatest war the world had ever seen, would not be accepted by the United States Senate, and in spite of all the objections to it I think it was an eternal disgrace to this country that the treaty was rejected. For the same reason, it seems to me that unless the objections to these treaties are absolutely overwhelming, it will be another disgrace, a crowning disgrace, if the Senate should fail to ratify this series of treaties, or any of them, which were negotiated not by a President representing one party but a commission comprising our Secretary of State, our leading constitutional lawyer, and the leaders in the Senate of both parties.

Assuming that all the criticisms that Mr. Davis has made of these treaties are sound; assuming that many of us think that we would have done better if we had been members of the commission at Washington—as many of us thought we could have done better if we had been in Mr. Wilson's place at Paris—nevertheless, it seems to me that in the absence of what I call overwhelming objections, we should advocate the ratification of these treaties, because it seems to me that if now the Senate should reject any one of these treaties, our second failure to back up the conclusions reached by our authorized representatives would justly deprive us of the confidence of the world and would convince them that we are not qualified to effectively take part in international relationships.

That argument, gentlemen, to my mind is conclusive of the wisdom of the ratification of these treaties without material reservations, unless the objections are overwhelming, which they seem to me not to be.

I have not given the treaties such careful study as Mr. Davis has, nor do I approach the discussion of these treaties or any one of them with anything like his knowledge of the conditions which led up to the negotiations of the treaties. And yet, at the very outset, we must consider one aspect of the situation. There is a rule of law which is very familiar to us lawyers that in discussing a remedial statute, we must first satisfy ourselves as to the mischief, as to the evils which the statute is sought to correct. Of course, that rule applies to the discussion of this group of treaties which are clearly remedial treaties. They were made to meet the existing situation fraught with peril.

Now, what were the evils with which the negotiators of these treaties dealt? In the first place, at the close of the greatest war in history, this country was entering upon a career of naval expansion which was bound to lead it to enormous expenditures and the absorption of a very substantial amount of our man power, and also—as is very natural and as has been the case all throughout history—was bound to create the temptation that a great army and a great navy always creates—to use that army or navy by having a war with somebody. And so there was a strong popular feeling in favor of some program which would result in the radical curtailment of this gigantic program of naval expansion.

In the second place, and as the cause, the provocation of this great naval program, was the threatening attitude of Japan. Now, in this connection I want to say, and I do not think it is any secret, that the average well-informed man realizes how serious the threatening attitude of Japan was prior to the Washington conference. I happen to have received, to some extent here and to some extent during my visit abroad last summer, a good deal of interesting information bearing upon that subject. There can be no doubt that Japan was feverishly entering upon a career of radical military and naval expansion; that she was taxing her people as no people had ever been taxed before for war purposes for the enlargement of her army and the rapid increase of her navy.

There is no doubt at all that she was placing orders all over the civilized world for munitions and arms. There is no doubt in my mind that she was definitely organizing to take the attitude that she was aspiring to take in China and Manchuria and Siberia, snapping her fingers at the world and saying: "We have a great navy. We are masters of the Pacific. We have the greatest army, in fact the only army in the Pacific, and what will the rest of the world do about it?" I am convinced, I say, that that was Japan's attitude and that was Japan's plan, and I think the conviction that I express was the conviction held at Washington and the various chancelleries of Europe. Last summer I talked with a number of enlightened observers, both in England and France, and with but very few exceptions they expressed that conviction. Of course, this was before the Washington conference was called, but that was the official and almost universal view abroad, and that unless something was done to avert the disaster war between the United States and Japan in a comparatively short time, in the comparatively near future, was inevitable; their theory being that there was a sharp clash between the two countries in commercial interests, and the wholesale preparation for the emergency on the part of Japan, which have heretofore inevitably produced the conditions which have led to war sooner or later.

And then, as a minor question was that presented by the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Great Britain was not overenthusiastic about the alliance, but she honestly hesitated to denounce it for two reasons. The first of these reasons was that she felt that inasmuch as Japan had technically, at least, done her part as ally of Great Britain in the World War, it would be an ungracious and ungentlemanly act on the part of Great Britain to denounce that treaty the moment her service had been completed. And in the second place, official opinion and popular opinion in Australia was very strongly against the denunciation of the treaty.

Those were the problems that confronted this Government when the Washington conference was called. The Washington conference was not primarily a conference to bring about naval disarmament. That was an incident. That was a side show. The primary purpose of the Washington conference was to make such a disposition of the problems of the Far East, and more particularly of Japan's program which threatened the peace of the world, and more specially threatened war between this country and Japan, that the danger of war would be reduced to a minimum, and for that reason a radical program for the reduction of naval armament would be possible. That was the primary purpose of the Washington conference.

Now, let us see, bearing these evils in mind, and having the purpose of the Washington conference in front of us, what was accomplished? What has been the actual, concrete result of the Washington conference?

I want to say at the outset that I believe that my good friend Davis is wrong in saying that under the Harding administration the Senate has taken the initiative in respect of our foreign policy—in shaping our foreign relationships. As a matter of fact, I think the contrary is true. I think that Mr. Harding and Mr. Hughes have taken the initiative and have kept it, and on the whole I think that they have pursued a wise course and an effective course, considering—as they have had to consider—the state of mind in the Senate. It is perfectly manifest to me—and I don't believe that there is any secret about it—that the policy of Mr. Harding and the policy of Mr. Hughes has been to avoid a row with the Senate which might have resulted in the early days of the Harding administration in some adverse vote which would have entirely shipwrecked the ambitions of the administration for bettering our international position. The aim has been to go slowly, step by step, and let events force us to make the final and most important decisions. In the international position it was the ambition of Mr. Hughes, at least, that we should be closely identified with European affairs, and this was taken up by Mr. Harding and it finally resulted in Mr. Harvey's position on the supreme council, and having Mr. Boyden an unofficial member of the Reparation Commission. It was undoubtedly the ambition—and here again I believe I am saying something which is an open secret—of the Harding administration not to have a separate peace with Germany. They came to almost an open breach with the Senate over that issue, but they were finally compelled to abandon their ambition for the acceptance of the treaty of Versailles with radical reservations. They were convinced that such a treaty would not be accepted by the Senate, and they thereupon initiated a separate treaty with Germany that did not differ in its effects radically from the action originally contemplated of accepting the treaty of Versailles. And much to their surprise that separate treaty was accepted practically without any unfavorable comment in France and Italy. Even the trouble that was feared in Germany in this respect did not appear, and on the whole I believe that the administration accomplished a real achievement in putting through that separate treaty of peace with Germany in the way it did.

Then came the Washington conference. My own feeling is that the result of the Washington conference—while not altogether satisfactory; while open to many of the criticisms that Mr. Davis has just pointed out, though not all that he has made, as I shall try to point out in a few minutes—was, on the whole, a very brilliant diplomatic victory for the United States, considering the difficulties that confronted the commission.

And here I want to use in defense of these treaties and in defense of our delegation that negotiated these treaties, the same arguments that Mr. Davis used, that I used, and that most of us used in defending the treaty of Versailles. This is not an ideal treaty. It is rather a bad treaty in many of its provisions. But it is the best treaty that could have been worked out in view of the difficulties that confronted our commission. Mr. Hughes and his associates had great difficulties to contend with. I know that. You know that. We all know it. But I am using the same argument that Mr. Davis used frequently with very great effect in defense of the Versailles treaty. And so what I say is that these treaties, although not free from objections—but open, I think, to very less serious objections than were made to the treaty of Versailles and Mr. Wilson's League of Nations—were probably the best treaties that could have been negotiated by our very able bipartisan delegation under the circumstances in view of the difficulties that confronted them. I think that we should consider them from that point of view, and I think that you will concede that they did accomplish a great deal. We must agree that they did consummate for a period of 10 years at least a very radical program for the reduction of naval armaments, which was more than we were justified in hoping for at the beginning of the conference. If that program stands, if that program is carried through, this country will probably save two hundred and fifty or three hundred million dollars a year in naval expenditures, and will also be saved from the fearful temptations that are involved in having the biggest navy in the world and the biggest that the world had ever seen. God knows what would not be the dangers of our being in that position. We have avoided that, and that is a very great achievement.

And, of course, as is undoubtedly well known to you all, we did get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and that, you must agree, is a very desirable achievement.

Now, as to China. I think that we are all agreed that the more serious difficulties in the Far East grew out of the treatment of China, and it was our sympathy for China, conflicting with Japan's ambitions in China, that created the most serious problems. I won't take time to analyze—and I couldn't do it intelligently—the treatment of China under the nine-power treaty, but I will say this: Three or four weeks ago when I was in Washington I was told by observers, participants in the conference, that the Chinese delegation were very exacting. They had proven to be very difficult to handle, and it seemed very doubtful if they could be at all satisfied. Now, I have not only read in the newspapers that the Chinese delegation are satisfied with the provision made for China in the nine-power treaty, but I happened to meet Mr. Root yesterday, and he said that the Chinese delegation were going home not only satisfied but happy over the treatment of China in the nine-power treaty. Japan has certainly accepted in respect not only of China but in a less definite form in respect of Siberia, the basic principles for which we have contended. So far as China herself is concerned, those basic principles have not only been accepted in a general way but they have been accepted in considerable detail in the nine-power treaty and included in that treaty, and to such an extent has this been done that, as I have just said, the Chinese themselves, difficult and exacting as they were, seem to be satisfied that China had been fairly treated, all things considered.

And I want to say this: I join the regret of Mr. Davis that a definite agreement was not reached with respect to Siberia. I assume that Manchuria is covered by the nine-power treaty. Is that right or isn't that so?

Hon. ROLAND S. MORRIS. Only in part.

Mr. CRAVATH. Isn't Manchuria a part of China and treated as such in the treaty?

Mr. MORRIS. That's just the point. The dominant feature about that is the treatment of the railroad there.

Mr. CRAVATH. I should assume that whatever provision is made for China includes Manchuria as a matter of course. I am frank to say that I have no definite knowledge on that point.

Hon. NORMAN H. DAVIS. Manchuria is partly under the control of China, but that part of it which includes the Eastern Siberian Railroad——

Mr. MORRIS. Of course, that is not under the control of China.

Mr. CRAVATH. I can hardly conceive that the strip of land on either side of the railroad should be considered as excluded from China for the purpose of the application of the nine-power treaty. My understanding is that the Chinese themselves consider that the nine-power treaty does apply to the Chinese Eastern Railroad.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, there certainly is no claim on their part that the treaty and the principles that have been adopted by the Washington conference did not apply to the Chinese Eastern Railroad.

Mr. DAVIS. At the conference they brought up the point of secret treaties relating to China for this very purpose. We don't know the exact status of China with reference to the Chinese Eastern Railroad and thousands of other phases of the situation, and the intention was to bring up these secret treaties and air them so as to be in a position to make the nine-power treaty really effective, but they couldn't get anywhere on that.

We don't know how many hundreds of secret treaties exist with respect to China. There's the situation, and what was done about that?

Mr. CRAVATH. Well, at all events, none of us claim that the treatment of Siberia and the railroads in Manchuria under the control of Japan is all that we like it to be. But again, while we have not arrived at perfection, I think you must admit that we have made progress, and we probably achieved all that could have been achieved at that conference under the conditions that confronted them. But as far as general principles are concerned, the Japanese certainly have accepted those principles which, if honestly applied, ought to bring relief not only to China but to Siberia as well, and to the fate of the Chinese Eastern Railroad.

Now, to my mind, a very important part of the achievement of the Washington conference is not recorded at all in black and white in that treaty or in any of the other treaties that were negotiated. And that is the bringing about of what seems to be a sympathetic understanding between the United States and Great Britain regarding the Far East and Pacific questions generally. I quite agree that under the program produced by those treaties we have practically surrendered our naval position in the Pacific. I assume that without further fortifications in the Pacific, and that with the fortifications and fleets as agreed upon, we could not successfully compete with Japan in the Pacific alone, and certainly we could not compete with an Anglo-Japanese fleet in that region. On the other hand, and to my mind, this is the much more encouraging statement based on the same facts, an Anglo-American fleet in the Pacific would dominate Japan, and it seems to me that we have substituted in place of the necessity for creating the greatest fleet the world has ever seen, with all the expense and temptations that involves, an understanding and basis for cooperation with Great Britain which gives those two powers the control of a combined fleet in the Pacific which will be large enough to dominate Japan and make her live up to the obligations she has assumed.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to know if you are making that statement as a fact, or is it just your own opinion of what would happen?

Mr. CRAVATH. I have been told by every member of the American delegation, and while I haven't been told by every member of the British delegation, I know definitely that the view is held by Mr. Balfour, and, I think, by every other member of the British delegation, that the result of the Washington conference has been not a formal agreement by any means, but an understanding, and such a degree of understanding and such a basis of sympathy has been created between Great Britain and the United States that both sides assume that in all future emergencies they can both count on having the very closest cooperation.

Mr. DAVIS. No; that isn't what I mean. What I mean is as to the agreements on fortifications and the agreement as to the naval ratio—do you mean to say that both fleets would dominate the Japanese fleet?

Mr. CRAVATH. Of course, I have no independent knowledge of that. I am not a naval expert, and have no independent opinion on that point, but I am informed that our technical advisers are satisfied that if the United States and Great Britain are on one side, and Japan on the other, that the Anglo-American fleet and the entire Anglo-American naval position would dominate that of Japan in Japanese waters.

As I say, I have no independent opinion of my own on that. I am simply repeating what I have been told in Washington. But, in all events, we are very much better off, if I am right in assuming that underlying sympathy with Great Britain, than we would have been with as large a fleet as the one that we have had in contemplation and on our building program, being opposed with the largest fleet that Japan would find herself physically able to build, and Great Britain being bound as a matter of course to keep pace with both. So, assuming that our theory of Anglo-American cooperation is well grounded, it does seem to me that our naval position, as against Japan, has been improved rather than weakened, and we have the great advantage in the reduction of our naval program and all that that means financially and otherwise.

There is another consideration, or rather another form of stating what I have already said in this respect, and that is that it seems to me that the existence of these treaties is in itself a basis for cooperation between Great Britain and the United States, and this in turn has created an opportunity of those two powers in bringing pressure to bear on Japan in such a way as will prove the most effective. Now, I certainly believe, and I think we will agree on this point: That if the old conditions had continued, this country would not have deliberately gone to war for and on behalf of China. We could not have gotten the American people to spend billions upon billions of dollars to create a fleet to fight Japan in the interest of China, and we couldn't have gotten hundreds of thousands of American boys to go and fight for China in the Pacific. Now, then, Japan knew perfectly well that we wouldn't be prepared to enter a great war for the defense of China, and the result was that acting alone as we were, with Great Britain at bay with Japan on account of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, our pressure on Japan was not at all effective. We spoke from the outside, and we were not prepared to back our threats. The chances are that there would have been no war on that count. The danger of war was from an entirely different cause. It was that with a great American fleet and a great Japanese army and a great Japanese fleet, with public opinion in both countries inflamed and sensitive by some untoward accident, like the blowing up of the Maine in the Spanish-American War, that something of that nature would inflame the pride or the patriotism of the Japanese people or of our own people, and there would ensue a war, begun by an accident and fed by a patriotism and misguided pride, but not a war for the defense of China or for Siberia or for Manchuria. And the Japanese knew that.

Well, now we have the right to talk to Japan across the table and ask Great Britain and France to sit on our side of the table, and to say to Japan, "You have agreed to certain principles, and we insist on their being applied in your treatment of China, in your treatment of Manchuria, and in your treatment of Siberia," and I think that there can be no serious doubt that as to all important questions, Great Britain, France, and the United States would stand together as against Japan.

So I say that these treaties give us the only kind of pressure on Japan that will really be effective, and furthermore, that it doesn't involve the risk and responsibility and expense on our part wholly out of proportion to our material interests in the problems of the Far East.

Thus, very briefly stated, this is to my mind the real importance and the force of the treaties and the achievements of the conference. Many of the objections that Mr. Davis has given may exist, only I think he has exaggerated some of them. I think some of his fears are not well grounded. I think the basis of many of his misconceptions is his misconception of the scope of the four-power treaty. I confess that I don't understand the four-power treaty as well to-night after reading it more thoroughly and after talking to Mr. John W. Davis about it, but I do think that the scope is much narrower than Mr. Norman Davis assumed, and is much more narrow than I had assumed. Section 1 provides that if there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question involving their said rights—I should go back a little perhaps to make this a little clearer. It says that the high contracting parties, etc., agree to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean. Note that, their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean. And it goes on: That if there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights—and involving their said rights, it must do both—which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, shall invite the high contracting parties to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

Article 2 says—and this is what Mr. Davis especially fears—that if the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action; that is, the rights in relation to their insular possessions are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power—the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another freely and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most effective measures to be taken, jointly and separately, to meet the emergency of the particular situation.

Now, I construe that treaty to relate only to insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean. It does undoubtedly refer to the south part of the islands in the Japanese Archipelago, which I assume is an insular possession of Japan. It does not, however, relate to the rights of the high contracting parties in China, in Manchuria, and in Siberia. Those questions are not touched by this four-power treaty.

Mr. DAVIS. That's my objection to it.

Mr. CRAVATH. You stated it more broadly than that, I think. You assumed that this treaty would tie our hands in relation to Siberia and Manchuria. It doesn't say so in any way, and I therefore take issue with your statement that any of these treaties tie our hands or circumscribe our liberty and freedom of action in respect of the important questions that are likely to arise regarding Japan's action in China, Manchuria, and Siberia, and it seems to me that instead of our position being narrow and confined to a certain course, of necessity, the fact that these treaties exist and certain relations are established under them, gives us, as I said a moment ago, a definite method of approach and places us in a position of real power and influence in insisting across the table, in company with other powers, that Japan shall honestly apply the principles to China, Manchuria, and Siberia to which she has formally agreed.

Mr. DAWSON. In section 1 that you have just read, where it says "their said rights" instead of using the words "one another's said rights"—isn't it a strange use of the word "their"? Do you suppose "their" has any special significance or put in there for any special purpose?

It has been said "their" rights refers to "common" rights. It was put in there for that purpose.

I just want to know if you can see any special reason for the use of the word "their" instead of the other phrase.

Mr. CRAVATH. No. I think it means the rights of either of them. That's quite clear. I think we all agree that the four-power treaty is a self-denying treaty. I don't think it's an alliance in the ordinary sense of the term "alliance," and even if you call it an alliance, it is limited in that respect. It doesn't involve the obligation of our going to war. It's purely a self-denying treaty.

And so I come back to my original proposition—that admitting that the treaties have many faults, and doubtless they have many, but not nearly as many as Mr. Davis thinks, we should give due credit to the very wise members of our commission with having done the best they could, and the best that could have been done under all the circumstances; that real progress has been made in accomplishing all of the objects of the conference; in combating some of the evils—very real evils—by which our country was confronted; and that we will simply double the disgrace that our country is already resting under because of our failure to ratify the treaty of Versailles if we should turn down the recommendations of this bipartisan commission, made up of the ablest men that could have been chosen, simply because some of the provisions of the agreements reached happen not to suit us.

And finally, and I can't discuss this in detail because time doesn't permit, I can't see any complications or obligations to which these treaties commit us, even if you do call them alliances. Nor do I see how they are going to prevent our steady progress for our ultimate participation in some league or association of nations to promote world peace.

Mr. YOUNG. I sincerely hope that the Versailles treaty may be considered by the Senate in connection with the other two treaties, and some way discovered of adopting it.

Mr. DAVIS. The four-power treaty, Mr. Cravath, is that if there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights——

Mr. CRAVATH. That's it; and involving their said rights. You must take the two of them together.

Mr. DAVIS. Exactly. Take the case of Siberia, for example. That borders on the Pacific. If we started out for Siberia, if we should find it necessary to take any action on Siberia, doesn't that mean involving a Pacific question? How are we going to get there without using naval bases and other fortifications in the Pacific region? We have got no right there. We would be going to war over another subject. But you say that we would make Japan keep her obligations. My point is that Japan hasn't made any pledge with respect to Siberia. She has simply said that when conditions improve there to her satisfaction and she can get the proper protection from Russia—and her continued occupation of Siberia can prevent that for an absolutely unlimited period of time—then she will get out. I don't favor going to war with Japan. Besides, I think that Japan was not getting ready to fight us. I think that that whole business of militaristic Japan and her powerful army and navy all prepared to be flung at us an illusion. It reminds me of the person going down the street with stolen goods in his pockets and he thinks that everybody he meets is a policeman. Now, I don't advocate war with Japan at all. I think it would be inexcusable and unnecessary. But neither do I think that it was necessary for us to abandon China and Russia and to put ourselves in a position where we can't help them.

And I think that our moral influence in the Far East has gone down at least 50 per cent as a result of the Washington conference, as a result of our going into an alliance with Japan, because that's what it is and you can't get away from it. Really, this whole business now strikes me as being worse after hearing your explanation than I thought it was in the beginning, because you say in substance that we really couldn't tackle Japan. We couldn't whip her alone. So we just decided that as Japan was wanting all these things out there and as she was preparing for war against us, the only way to stop her was to surrender any claim or right that we might have there. Of course, you can stop any war that way. Give the party what it wants and it will quit fighting you. That's easy. No country is fool enough to keep on fighting if you will let her have what she wants without fighting for it. You go ahead to say, what have we done? We have done a marvelous thing. We want to deal fairly with Japan, and all that, but at the same time we have gone ahead and formed a combination whereby we can crush her to pieces if she should refuse to do what is right—what we think is right. We have got so much force now that we can force her position. Now, that is not getting very near to the League of Nations. As much as I favor Anglo-American friendship—and I do most heartily—the very moment that England and America get together to bulldoze the rest of the world, they will destroy all their usefulness. They must respect the rights of the small nations just as much as anyone else. You don't seem to think that this is an alliance?

Mr. CRAVATH. If it is an alliance, it is a self-denying alliance.

Mr. DAVIS. I don't know what you mean by a self-denying alliance. But in any event, what is the objection to doing what I propose? Why do you want to ignore the rights of Holland and Portugal and Russia, who have just as much interest in the Pacific Ocean as we have? What is the objection to that?

Mr. CRAVATH. There is no recognized government in Russia at the present time.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, let's leave Russia out for the moment. What's the objection to the other Governments? What's the objection?

I think that the Anglo-American combination is indefensible on that ground. I think that this Anglo-American alliance is unsportsmanlike. I don't think that we should have played a trick like that on Japan. I thought a new spirit of cooperation and friendship permeated these agreements. I was under the impression that a new spirit had been set loose at the conference. But evidently, from what you say, this has been the most hypocritical, diabolical game that has ever been played, and Japan has been made the victim.

Mr. CRAVATH. I don't think many tricks have been played on Japan.

Mr. DAVIS. I don't either. But you said it was an American victory. You hail the results of the Washington conference as an achievement and as an American diplomatic victory, and I was taking your word for it. As to the defects in the treaty of Versailles I agree with you, but I don't think that America put in a single one of them. They went in in spite of us; in spite of what we said, and in spite of what we tried to accomplish. We couldn't stop that tide of prejudice and greed that came in the aftermath of the war. But while we had to let those defects go in in order to get the treaty, nearly at every place a machine was set up to eliminate that defect just as soon as public opinion and public conscience would permit and demand. Now, what I am objecting to in the results of the Washington conference are the defects that we put in ourselves, voluntarily. We squirm all around to get rid of this Anglo-Japanese alliance, and then we let it swallow us whole, and then we make no provision about the formation of a similar alliance that would immediately upset the ratio. We don't say anything about that in the treaties. Why don't we? What's the objection to putting in a clause of that kind? Because, if an alliance is formed between any two powers, it will as a matter of course upset the naval ratio that has been fixed. You are not getting anywhere in that way. My God, that ought to be clear enough. I am convinced now that the Washington conference hasn't done the little good that I thought it had done, and I firmly believe that people are fooling themselves when they think that the four-power treaty is leading them to the League of Nations. I think that the people who don't care anything at all about the League of Nations ought to approve everything that has been done in Washington, because if we don't go into the league we have got to try this balance-of-power business. That is very clear to me. That seems to be the direction that we are going in, and, speaking for myself, I much prefer isolation, much as I think it unwise and practically impossible. But if we want to go into the League of Nations and if we want to deal fairly with these people that we have been dealing with in Washington, we don't want to create the impression that the United States and England have made a deal to bulldoze and run all over the rest of the world and make them carry out pledges that have been made. I don't think that we will ever get to the League of Nations that way. If we are ever to approach that goal another way has got to be found. That's what I am working for here—to preserve the good work that has been accomplished in Washington by eliminating some of the glaring errors and positive dangers.

Mr. CRAVATH. That was the only way to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

Mr. DAVIS. I don't agree with you. The logical way to get rid of the alliance was through the naval treaty. But instead of that we shoot off all of our ammunition right at the beginning and then we had nothing else to do. But since the treaty has been signed, and since I am just as reluctant as anybody here to increase the batting average of the Senate in knocking our treaties, I say let us eliminate the defects and the real dangers in the four-power treaty by inviting all of them, every power that is interested in the Pacific, to come into it, because as it stands to-day all of the powers that belong to the League of Nations are committed to hold a conference as members of the league over any controversies that arise in the Pacific. In this four-power treaty they are committed to hold another conference. Now, I think that we would be accommodating these nations by providing for only one conference. As we would not attend the League of Nations conference, we provide another conference and invite all the other nations to it. No use in having two conferences over the same question, and so they would naturally attend ours. There certainly should be no objection to opening this thing up and putting it in that way.

Mr. C. G. YOUNG. Could that be done by a reservation that would be acceptable to the Senate at the present time?

Mr. DAVIS. I think it is unfortunate that it is necessary to even consider a reservation. I would like to see us able to approve everything that has been done in Washington, but I think that it is a terrible situation that we have gotten ourselves into where we have got to accept any kind of an agreement that American plenipotentiaries may sign for fear that it may hurt our prestige. I mean that that is a terrible position for us to get in, and we are in such a position. I have come to this conclusion most reluctantly because I do feel that we ought to save our prestige—or what is left of it—all we can. We have lost enough of it, you will all agree. I think that over on the other side, in England as well as on the Continent, they are all laughing up their sleeves at us. Here we sit for three months at a conference. Just imagine—for three months we are sitting around a conference table with eight members of the league, and we do not dare mention the very name of the League of Nations. The world is laughing at us as a bunch of hypocrites. What I say is—let us find out where we are going. If we are going to adopt the system of alliances, and the balance of power and all that, let us know what we are doing and where we are headed for. And if not, if we are really headed for world cooperation and world sympathy and world peace, let us keep in that direction. I don't see how anybody in favor of the League of Nations can fail to favor a reservation to the four-power alliance which will open it up and make it fair and just to every nation that is involved in its subject matter.

Mr. DAWSON. Does Mr. Cravath have any objection to such a reservation if it could be gotten through?

Mr. CRAVATH. Without having definite knowledge of the matter, I think that a general opening up of the four-power treaty would be considered by the Senate as a nuisance, and that they would consider that it had lost its effectiveness.

Mr. DAVIS. Do you think President Harding and Secretary Hughes are really headed toward the League of Nations?

Mr. CRAVATH. I know that Mr. Hughes and I think that Mr. Harding both hope—I won't put it any stronger than hope—that they will eventually land this country into some kind of international association of nations, either the League of Nations or some other association of all the nations.

Mr. DAVIS. Just through the means of a few nations or all the nations?

Mr. CRAVATH. All nations. I think they are going just as fast as they can go effectively. I think they are being guided directly by Mr. Wilson's policies. They may be going a bit too slowly, but they are trying to avoid the wrecking of their program by trying to accomplish too much too fast, and I think in this respect they are very wise.

Mr. DAVIS. I think they are wise, too, but I am just wondering where they are headed for. They have never told us definitely which way they were going. It is very important for us to know where we are going. I don't believe anybody in the Senate is in favor of an alliance.

Mr. CRAVATH. They are not in favor of an offensive alliance.

Mr. DAVIS. There are some few people, I will admit, in favor of an American-Anglo alliance, but there isn't much talk of such an alliance over the country generally.

Mr. CRAVATH. If you had had your way, if your recommendations had been followed, as outlined by article 10 of the Versailles treaty, the nations would have had their respective interests guaranteed, and war was certain to ensue, but in the four-power treaty it's entirely different. If the principle of article 2 of the four-party treaty had been embodied in the treaty of Versailles, it would have been ratified by the Senate.

Mr. ALBERT RATHBONE. I don't believe it, Mr. Cravath. I don't believe the Senate ever intended to accept that treaty, no matter what happened.

Hon. JOHN W. DAVIS (chairman). I believe we have heard two of the most interesting addresses we have ever heard this evening, and I don't believe we are ever likely to hear more interesting ones. The meeting is now open for general discussion. We have heard Mr. Morris once before on the question of the Far East, and I know we would all like to hear him again.

Hon. ROLAND S. MORRIS. I feel that Mr. Norman Davis has raised not an incidental or a secondary question, but rather a very fundamental one. I have been concerned ever since I read the text of the four-power treaty as to whether or not it represented simply a rewording and an enlargement of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. I have felt that whatever may have been the European conditions that seemed 20 years ago to create the necessity for that alliance, they did not at that time, as I read history, arise in the open. They arose from the conditions of the balance of power in Europe, and that it had operated from the start as a deterrent in endeavoring to give to the Orient a full and free opportunity for its own development. When we endeavored to intervene in the interests of justice to China primarily by the announcement of the open-door policy, I think that there was then considerable hope that by that policy we might have prevented the apparent exploitation by not one but several nations of China. That we have failed to do that I have always felt was due in a large measure to the innocent and simple words of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. It acted as a screen to protect the rear of the nations that desired to get control and to go contrary to any fair policy and application of the open door. I had hoped that it might have disappeared in this conference, as it would have been automatically abrogated had the League of Nations succeeded and had we entered it. It does seem to me that that could have been done as part of the naval treaty, as Mr. Davis has pointed out. If it was attained only by our joining in the alliance, I do sincerely regret it, because I fear that by that act we are going to surrender the very extraordinary position that we had attained in the Orient.

The discussion here to-night has seemed to indicate that our position was one of antagonism toward Japan and wholly one of sympathy, for instance, for China. There were times when we very strongly sympathized with China, and protested against what we believed were wrong policies followed by Japan in regard to the continent of Asia. But our independence was the great thing. We were equally able to take another kind of position as regards China, and as a matter of fact did do so during the Boxer days. Thus, even prior to the war between Japan and China we were always in a positicn where we could stand equally with one side or the other or against one side or the other, and insist upon policies that we believed were conducive to peace, although they were opposed by the Chinese people or the Chinese Government. In other words, our attitude was one of independence. Our desire was solely to have a real equality of opportunity and freedom from exploitation in the hope that there might be a normal evolution and development in which all the nations could participate in the Orient.

Now, then, as I understand the meaning of the term "alliance"—and I stand here to be corrected—it has nothing to do with its object. What it has to do with is the question of who is excluded from that alliance. If in a group of 10 men 5 of them go off by themselves and agree that on questions that might involve any or all of the 10 men they will confer together, that is an alliance. Their object may be peace or cooperation with the ones that are excluded or any one of a thousand other things. I can't see any possible answer to the suggestion that Mr. Davis has made, that if we are going to have conferences in regard to interests in the Pacific, we should not make them ex parte, because you can't tell where that is going to lead. Where one group within another sit down to discuss a situation among themselves which may be created by some one of the whole group that is not there present, you have got a situation that is going to lead almost inevitably to a balancing alliance of some sort to meet that situation.

And here you have China, Russia, Portugal, Siam—interested in the problem, and yet they are excluded from the consideration of that problem which may be of more interest to them than to any one or all of those in conference. This is the first time in our history that this has happened—that we have gone into a limited combination—and I don't think we ought to do it unless we are quite clear that we are now started on our only alternative, which is a series of such alliances, in the hope that we can thereby stabilize the issues of the world and thereby insure peace. I only want to emphasize the distinction that I make between a league of nations which would include all of them, where our independence would be included in the whole group and where we would still retain our so-called American position, and a position where we join one side, one element, a certain number out of many that may be against the rest of the world, who will decide not necessarily antagonistic to the others, but the fact would still remain that we are in and they are out, and proceed to discuss these questions which so vitally affect them. One, I take it, is an alliance, and the other is a world conference for peace.

Now, if we are going toward that alliance system isn't it fair that we should analyze this and determine that factor? The extraordinary position that we occupied in the Orient was attained chiefly because we have earnestly striven for over a quarter of a century to protect what were not only our rights but the rights of the world in the development in every phase of life of the Orient. And now we have put ourselves in the position where we are going to surrender that by apparently going into an alliance and subsequently as a matter of course into a conference behind closed doors and discuss questions affecting China where China can not be. Isn't that a dangerous thing to do, and isn't it likely that sooner or later we will see growing up gradually, more in thought first than in definite action, a combination of Russia and China and perhaps Siam and all other nations that are interested in the question up for discussion, and of necessity try to counteract and undermine any conclusions that may be reached by the conferences of those from which these nations were excluded? That, I take it, has been the history of these alliances from the beginning. They always tend to create groups, and then begins this balancing of power which has always ended in a catastrophe. There is a very real possibility of a Russian-German-Chinese alliance. A sympathetic connection between those countries is closer than, I am afraid, is generally realized. Russia has been able to understand China and has been able to work in closer harmony and cooperation with her because of the curious relationships along that long border line between the two countries, and she has done this better than any other of the European nations, and it well might be that in the course of the next 15 or 25 years that you will see the closest relations between them, not because we were opposed to them, their ideals and ambitions, but because we had excluded them from the consideration of those problems in which they were vitally interested by entering into some form of cooperation with only a portion of the nations interested, and that, I fear, is the way we are going. If this is true, I would put aside all appeals not to tear down what our officials have built up—all appeals to our pride. If I felt that we are running in that direction and away from the peculiar position we once occupied, far better total disaster so that we may keep that unique character tbat we have had in international relations, in these problems of the Orient. We could go in with all the parties interested and within that group retain our independence of action and cultivate what we like to believe is our underlying altruistic attitude toward the developing of the Orient. But if we go in with any one portion of that group I fear we are driving right against some position which will in the end totally destroy all the influence that we have in China, and will destroy likewise, as it has destroyed in the past, our influence in regard to Russia. Of course, Russia now has become also one of the sick nations like China, and yet with potentialities that are simply beyond the dreams of man for their future development as nations. Both China and Russia are going to be great and reconstructed nations. No one has seen them and not been filled with that feeling of confidence as to their future position in the world, and we have established during the past two or three years a sympathy with the Russian people, who stretch along that border of the Pacific right opposite us on the Pacific Ocean, which will be a tremendous asset to both countries in the years to come. Now are we going to ignore their interests in the Pacific and be part of an alliance which excludes them, particularly when that alliance is with nations who may not have the same feelings about the integrity and development of Russia as we have? They may have very different ones. We must not forget that, and must be very careful so that we do not find ourselves in a position that is contrary to our interests and to our desires.

And so I conclude by summing this entire thing up. Let's see whether we are right in our definition of an alliance—not its object, but whom does it include and whom does it exclude—and then remedy it. But—and this is very important—we are not to take any steps in any spirit of spite to defeat the accomplishments of the Washington conference; in no spirit, I beg of you, of any partisanship or feeling or anything of that sort. But in the interest of a policy that we have never changed, and to preserve the peculiar position that we have occupied for so long and with so much honor and prestige. Ought we not endeavor to include all those nations interested in the Pacific in our treaty?

Mr. J. G. McDONALD. Mr. Davis and Mr. Morris have raised very serious questions, and all of us have our doubts about the four-power treaty that we did not have before. I was not so much impressed by the basis of his argument, which was the avoidance of any departure from the accepted American program and policy. It seems to me that that was the dominant argument in the League of Nations debate, and we who believe in the league and hope that some day we may get into it should be very careful about urging that point, which with another purpose might be used very effectively against the entrance into the league under any conditions whatsoever.

We ought to give the administration the benefit of the doubt, so that we somehow may get into the habit of ratifying treaties instead of rejecting them, in order to get back some of the prestige that was once ours and try to retain it.

But at the present moment I am concerned with two other things. First, if the debate in the Senate drags out over a long period of months, it will inevitably assume a partisan character. The debate will not be conducted on the basis that this discussion has been conducted, and if we do not get prompt ratification of the treaties we will see something very like what we saw in the debate on the Versailles treaty.

One other point: Whether the conference at Washington has achieved the tremendous results that Mr. Cravath has stated or only those results which Mr. Davis has stated, it has met only one part of the problem. It has not touched Europe; American participation in European economic adjustments is essential. Let us get this over with quickly, to have America effectively cooperate with Europe in order to get a normal economic condition established there.

Dr. SIDNEY L. GULICK. I would like to speak about the effect upon Japan of the adoption of these treaties promptly and wholeheartedly. The effect is the encouragement of the liberal movement in Japan with the power which it will have if it is encouraged of overthrowing the militaristic movement in Japan.

The feverish preparations for war which Japan was making were based upon fear of America. They saw the rising tide of criticism of Japan; of talk of war with Japan; of insistence that we must have a war with Japan. That has been going on for more than 10 years in this country. And then they saw our coming into the Pacific with our very large fleet, and the building program that we had inaugurated. These gave to the militarists the opportunity to put through a program of preparation which probably they would not have been able to put through otherwise.

Through the medium of the Washington conference the liberals in Japan are going to have a fresh chance of pushing their program and of showing to their public that the fears put forward by the militarists are not well grounded.

Mr. PAUL FULLER, Jr. If the exact terms of the four-power treaty are considered, don't the parties agree to respect the territory of the other, in effect recognizing first the natural positions of the parties, and secondly in case some outsider takes that territory to consider what steps to take? Now, is that in any true sense an alliance? Is it really any more an alliance than, for example, the treaty relating to Belgium before the war? In that treaty they simply agreed to respect the territory of Belgium. Would you call this four-power treaty an alliance, being, as it is, limited to purely a self-denying feature?

Mr. MORRIS. I would say that it does make it an alliance. The alliance consists in whether those who have similar interests are excluded from the alliance. It means that a certain group determine the facts in regard to a given situation, without regard to what other nations having an interest similar in character to those represented by the nations in conference might say or do. You may say it is a self-denying alliance. It still is an alliance. And my thought about the matter is, and it has been proven in history time and time again, that the mere fact of exclusion of nations interested in the same things will inevitably create something to meet it and counteract it. I submit that as the real definition of an alliance. It is quite possible and even probable that it isn't a complete and full or fair definition, but I can't see it any other way.

Mr. DAVIS. And is not it true that the treaty of Belgium brought England into the war?

Mr. CRAVATH. That was a defensive alliance. In that treaty the powers agreed and joined in guaranteeing the neutrality of Belgium. It is true that that brought Great Britain into the war, but it was the force of public opinion which interpreted the obligation as meaning that Great Britain was to enforce neutrality if necessary. Lord Grey himself said that it was the Belgium incident that led Great Britain into the war.

One final word I want to say. I agree with all that Mr. Davis and Mr. Morris have said about the dangers of a policy of alliances. I do not know enough about international law to define the term "alliance." Maybe Mr. Morris is right that this is technically an alliance, but I think the kind of alliance that we are opposed to in principle is the offensive or defensive alliance, an alliance that requires affirmative action on our part for the assistance or protection of some other nation. For instance, if we signed a treaty with Mexico by which each party agreed to respect the territorial boundaries of the other, that might be technically an alliance, but it would not do us any harm. We are simply agreeing to refrain from doing what we have no right to do anyway. It creates no obligation beyond the control of our own conduct. Therefore I say that this four-power treaty is exactly on a parallel with such a treaty as between the United States and Mexico. It binds us individually to respect the rights of Japan and Great Britain in relation to their insular possessions in the region of the Pacific Ocean. That we are willing to do. There is no objection to our doing that. It gives rise to no involvement. It carries with it no obligation, and I should say that whatever the four-power treaty may technically be under the definition of an alliance, it is not the kind of an alliance or the kind of a contract that we are seeking to avoid. There may be room for debate about article 2 of the treaty. I suspect that would be considered by the Senate. The President has said publicly, and Mr. Hughes and Mr. Root have said privately—and perhaps publicly—that they do not understand and did not understand that that article placed any obligation beyond giving advice in case an emergency arose. I think there would be no objection in the Senate to adopting a reservation perhaps making it clear that article 2 did not require us to go to war or use force or for any other affirmative steps to be taken in the matter against our will, if I am right in assuming that President Harding was right in announcing that that was the intention of the parties. Therefore I say that while I do not think this is the kind of an alliance that we need fear or that we should seek to avoid, I will say that even though we should join Mr. Davis and Mr. Morris in preferring not to enter into such a contract as that, it is after all an unimportant concession of what seems to me to be a nonessential as a necessary step in accomplishing the important results.

Mr. FULLER. Would you be willing to advocate an amendment in the form of a reservation by the Senate to the four-power treaty, inviting any other powers with interests in the Pacific to join in the treaty without any change in the text?

Mr. CRAVATH. I think there would be no objection on the part of the United States to opening it up to any nation having any legitimate interest in the Pacific, but I should object to anything that would cause any of the three powers to withdraw their adherence. I think I know from conversations I have had with the British delegates both before and during the conference of what caused the most trouble. They say that the Japanese are exceedingly sensitive about consulting nations in problems which they consider their own. The British delegates said that the Japanese would be very sensitive in having purely Anglo-Japanese questions submitted to a conference participated in by France, Italy, and other nations that were not directly concerned, and I suspect that the treaty was confined to the four powers out of regard for the peculiar sensitiveness of the Japanese.

This town-hall method of discussing questions may be all right in its place, but it does not work in international affairs. One of the great disadvantages of the League of Nations was the assembly, which was a town-hall affair, with an unwieldy body, a great majority of the members having no interest whatsoever in the question before them at the time.

Mr. FULLER. I think your objection to the town-hall method is entirely correct and valid in regard to the negotiation of a treaty. But having been negotiated and signed, they should be accepted with the reservation that those may join who have given due notice of their interest, do not you think?

Mr. CRAVATH. Provided it did not imperil the acceptance of the others. As I said before, in the assembly of the League of Nations that point is a fatal one to-day because of the number of small nations having so very little interest and most of the time no interest at all in the problems in question.

Mr. DAVIS. One of the plenipotentiaries told me that this was an alliance, that everybody knew it was an alliance, and that they admitted among themselves that this was an alliance; but that he had favored it because he had come to the conclusion that we had to adopt the system of alliances. In his opinion the time had come when we should take that step. He was not an American, so a difference of opinion on that point is excusable. Your simile, Mr. Cravath, between America and Mexico is misleading, very misleading. Carry what you said out a bit further to conform more to the present situation, and let us say that America and Mexico sign an agreement whereby they agree to respect each other's territory, and to whip any other nation that comes between them, or to come together and to confer as to what should be done in their opinion should any other nation interfere with their arrangement even though that other nation may have had some right so to do.

Mr. CRAVATH. As I said before, it may be technically an alliance, but from my point of view it is not seriously objectionable because it is self-denying.

Mr. HERBERT S. HOUSTON. I want to say just this one word as a firm believer in the League of Nations. I am not an expert in the meaning of the terms used to-night, but it strikes me that what is much more important is the question whether or not the Government of the United States can function in respect to international relations. It does seem to me that if this country is going to enter into any kind of agreement, any kind of alliances, or if it is going into the League of Nations, we must function with respect to agreements that are entered into by our duly accredited representatives. It seems to me that the way to resume is to resume. Whether we go into the League of Nations, whether we enter into any agreements, or whether we do not, let us decide what we are going to do, and then let us do it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there seems to be about as animated a question of veracity between Mr. Cravath and his own statement, which was inserted in the RECORD this morning by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], as there is between him and Mr. Hughes and the other members of the American delegation. I do not care to enter into any discussion of the psychological processes by which Mr. Cravath arrived at these apparently conflicting conclusions and attempt to reconcile them. As far as the facts are concerned, whether or not there was any secret agreement for some alliance between Great Britain and the United States in this conference, I accept the unqualified and unconditional testimony of the distinguished Senators from Alabama and from Massachusetts and the Secretary of State, all of whom speak authoritatively, and who were the officials through whom any such agreement would have been reached if it had been reached.

In case there should be a controversy growing out of this treaty when it is ratified, as I believe it will be, between some of the parties to it, in which the United States should become involved, I personally would feel extremely gratified to have the support of any one of the other parties to the agreement in the contention in which we might be engaged. If Mr. Cravath's statement is a mere prophecy, if it is a deduction which he bases upon such premises as he may see fit to devise from the conditions which surrounded this conference, and such an unfortunate event should take place, it seems to me it would be a very happy issue out of our troubles if such a friendly feeling should have arisen in this conference that any one of the other parties to the four-power pact should take the side of the United States in any controversy which we might have against another.

As to the question of naval power, the question of whether or not the naval position of the United States is weakened by the agreement, that is very largely an academic question, for the reason that whatever our relative position would be under the terms of the treaty, the great question which confronts Congress and confronts the country is not the danger of limiting ourselves to the naval power provided for in this agreement, but the danger that we may not come up to it. The difficulty we are going to have is not by reason of any limitation placed by the agreement upon the building of a navy, but it is to secure the assent of both Houses of Congress and of the people of the country to appropriations which will enable us to maintain a navy upon the ratio provided in this agreement. That matter undoubtedly will be discussed in detail when the naval limitation agreement comes before Congress.

As to another phase of this discussion, we are confronted by the curious situation that the ardent advocates of the League of Nations are opposing this agreement because it differs from the League of Nations and that the opponents of the League of Nations are opposing it because they allege it is the same as the League of Nations. I want to point out just one or two of the essential differences between the arrangement made by the pending treaty and the League of Nations as they occur to me.

The first one which occurs to me is that under the League of Nations there was a visible and tangible organization of world government, composed of a body of men vested with world powers, as defined in the instrument, sitting at some place in Europe to exercise those powers upon the various members of the league and to a considerable extent upon the other nations of the world which were not members of the league. In the agreement which is pending before the Senate there is no such structure of world government. There is not an additional office created by this treaty.

There is no new agency of government, nor is there any new obligation, created by this instrument which does not already exist.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator from Washington agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] that under this four-power pact the United States Government would have a veto on the decision of the other three?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Unfortunately, I did not pay close enough attention to that portion of the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey to hear that statement.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. He did not state it in those words, but he said it would require unanimous consent, and that, of course, would give a veto to any one of the four.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My opinion is that the United States would be perfectly independent as to its own action. I fail to see how it would have the power to control the action of the other parties to the agreement. The treaty only provides for a conference as between these powers. The United States would determine as to what extent it might follow any agreement which was reached there, but I fail to see how the other three powers to the agreement could be put under the control of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will permit me, does he not think that where four sovereign powers are conferring in an effort to arrive at an understanding, the inevitable implication is that it must take unanimous consent for the four powers to arrive at an understanding?

Mr. POINDEXTER. For joint action.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For any action. If they arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient means to be taken to meet an exigency, can they arrive at an understanding except by unanimous consent?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No, they could not; but there is no compulsion on them to arrive at an understanding. That is the purpose for which the conference is called; but they can not be compelled to arrive at an understanding.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with that; but my point is that if four powers agree to meet in time of danger and attempt to arrive at an understanding as to what measures are to be taken to meet the danger they do not arrive at an understanding unless they all arrive at it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A majority vote of three would not bind the fourth, who objected to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly that is true.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is my view of this matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree entirely with the Senator in that respect. So the independence of action of either party to the treaty is perfectly secure.

Another curious development of the argument upon this treaty is that certain distinguished Senators object to it because it is an alliance, an offensive and defensive alliance, between the four powers who are parties to it, and at the same time they propose to improve it, according to their view, by extending its terms and provisions to all of the rest of the world, or at least to a great portion of the world.

If it is objectionable because it binds the United States to go to war in a quarrel of other powers, it would only be adding to that objection to increase the obligation by adding other nations whose controversies the United States would have to assume; but that is one of the arguments launched against this agreement.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said that he demonstrated its objectionable features by citing the example of the Triple Entente, which was described by the Prime Minister of Great Britain as merely a diplomatic group. He said that that was not considered as a menace to the independent action of the members to it, and yet that it drew Great Britain into the World War. The Senator from Idaho is not sustained by the official record of the powers engaged in the World War and their own statements as to the reasons and causes upon which they based their action.

This agreement provides for a conference. The Senator from Idaho said that if a conference could have been arranged between all the powers of Europe, very probably war could have been averted. So he proposes, as I understand his conclusion, to provide that Russia, Germany, and China shall be admitted as parties to this arrangement, and that provision be made for a conference between those powers and all the powers who have signed the pending treaty.

That was the objection which the Senator from Idaho made to the League of Nations, that it bound up the United States with the rest of the world. One of the features of the League of Nations which does not exist in the pending agreement was the provision that every controversy in which the United States should be engaged should be submitted to a foreign tribunal, and that the United States should be subject to its decision. No Member of the Senate can point out in this treaty any implication by which the United States could be involved in any such surrender of its sovereignty.

When the League of Nations was first suggested it was called a "Constitution" of government, but apparently realizing the obnoxious implications of that word, the name was withdrawn and it was afterwards called a "Covenant." When you write into a world agreement a provision that the organization which is set up by it shall have power to decide every controversy which may arise between the nations of the world, and that they must submit to it, you have transferred the sovereignty of those nations to that world organization. That is what the League of Nations did, and that constituted the chief objection to it. As I said before, no one can point out even an implication in the pending agreement of any such surrender of national sovereignty.

Mr. President, there was another provision in the League of Nations which I recall, of a specific and less important and yet of just as striking character, by which the sovereign powers vested by the Constitution of the United States in Congress were transferred to the council and to the assembly of the League of Nations. That was the provision that the League of Nations should have "supervision"—that was the word used—of the trade in arms and ammunition. There is no more essential power in the protection of the interests of a nation, an essential part of its sovereignty, than the power to regulate the importation or the exportation of the implements of war. That power is vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States, while by the constitution of the League of Nations the Congress of the United States was divested of it. It was transferred to an assembly and to a council sitting in Europe, over which the United States had no control whatever.

Are we going to deny the facts shown by the comparison? Can it be said that the pending treaty—which, it seems to me, amounts to nothing more nor less than a treaty of amity and friendship between these powers and an agreement to respect their reciprocal rights—is comparable in any way whatever to such a transfer of sovereignty as that to which I have referred?

Mr. President, I may mention another distinguishing feature which separates by a wide gulf this agreement from the constitution of the League of Nations. One of the most cherished doctrines of the American people is the Monroe doctrine, by which, in its last analysis, by the practice of successive administrations, as it was expressed by a great Secretary of State—I think Secretary Olney—the will of the United States is the law of the Western Hemisphere. That was an exceedingly bold statement, yet in the face of a great emergency in which the principles of that policy were challenged by a great European power, his interpretation of its effect and its application was uttered in those words and applied in action.

I believe that the existence of the free Republics in Central and South America is due more to that American policy than to any other influence under which they have been developed. Under the League of Nations it was proposed to reverse that great principle. It was proposed that in controversies between an American sovereignty and some other power—such as occurred between Venezuela and Great Britain in one instance, and between Venezuela and Germany in another; President Cleveland in one case and President Roosevelt in another, representing the United States—we should not have the power to interfere and to impose the policies and will of the Government and people of the United States in the adjustment and settlement of those controversies which, if persisted in, would have involved the territorial integrity and political independence of those American Republics, but that they should be decided in a court of last resort, from which America had no appeal, sitting in Europe and in which the United States would have had but one vote. So the Monroe doctrine, had the United States become a member of that centralized constitution of world government, would have become a thing of the past—destroyed by our own act.

The pending treaty does not relate to American questions in the sense in which the Monroe doctrine applies to them. It does not relate to territorial questions affecting the countries of the Western Hemisphere. So I am led to state what I believe to be one of the chief virtues, if not the chief virtue, of this agreement, that which makes it a practical working arrangement, and that is that it is limited in its scope both as to the subject with which it deals and as to the area which it covers. It is limited to the region of the Pacific. I think that is a benefit.

Some gentlemen are opposed to it because it is so limited. They would extend it to the mainland of Asia. If it were extended to the mainland of Asia every difficulty, every seed of trouble which they allege is to be found by some difficult and abstruse implication in its words, would be multiplied a thousand times. If their construction is correct, by such extension we would become involved in far-reaching problems of world affairs which, as the treaty is written, are not touched by it. So, Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment I will yield. It is not only limited to the region of the Pacific, but even as to that region it is confined to what practically amounts to an agreement for friendly relations, for amity, not contrary to the principles of George Washington, but in conformity with them—that "honest friendship" which George Washington laid down as the basis for the relations of this young Republic, as it was then, with the rest of the world.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, he thinks the four-power treaty is greatly improved because it is limited to the insular possessions of the four signatories to the treaty. I ask him whether he believes there is any possible controversy that might arise between the United States and Great Britain over any of Great Britain's insular possessions in the Pacific?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, there is a possible controversy, but not a probable one.

Mr. KING. But there is no probable or even possible controversy, is there, between the United States and France over any of France's insular possessions in the Pacific?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will make the same answer to that question that I did to the former one.

Mr. KING. Certainly the Senator must concede that the United States does not claim the southern half of Sakhalin or the Pescadores Islands or any of Japan's insular possessions in the Pacific?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The United States does not. I wish the Senator would get down to the application he desires to make of these questions.

Mr. KING. The Senator has kindly answered two questions. Will he answer the third? Does the Senator think there is any possible controversy between the United States and Japan over Japan's insular possessions in the Pacific?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish it were not possible.

Mr. KING. The United States does not claim Sakhalin or the Pescadores or any of the Japanese possessions in the Pacific, does it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; the United States does not claim it, and yet why should the Senator or why should any of us close our eyes to the world-wide belief that there was a cause of friction and the germs of difficulty between Japan and the United States in their relations in the Pacific? The Senator does not deny that that existed.

Mr. KING. If the Senator propounds that as a question, I will say that I think there was a great deal of fantastic talk in the world as to the possibility of controversy between the United States and Japan; but I believe that whatever foundation existed for such talk related to the mainland and not to the insular possessions of either Japan or the United States.

One other question, and I apologize to the Senator for taking his time. Does the Senator believe that either Japan or Great Britain or France has any idea of invading any of the insular possessions of the United States which are covered by this treaty?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think so, especially after they have put their signatures to this agreement.

Mr. KING. But aside from this treaty?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I can not tell the Senator what my beliefs are, and I doubt very much whether it would be advisable to discuss the opinions and beliefs of Senators as to what the attitude of foreign nations might be toward the possessions of each other. I have called the Senator's attention to the existence of a controversy on various subjects between certain of the members of this agreement which I think were palliated, mollified, and largely prevented by their mutual agreement—the one which we now have here.

Mr. KING. May I say in conclusion that the answer of the Senator must be convincing, it seems to me, that if there is any source of controversy in the region of the Pacific it relates alone to the mainland, and the mainland under this treaty is excluded. Therefore this treaty, if it is not an alliance, relates to something that is innocuous and does not deal with any possible controversy that may arise between the four nations.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has put himself in this position: I understand he is opposing the treaty, claiming that it will get the United States into trouble.

Mr. KING. No. I have made no such statement. I have said but little upon the treaty, and have voiced no opposition to it upon the ground that it was an alliance. Indeed, I stated to a Senator the other day that I was not terrified by the idea of an alliance but that I wanted a world alliance, and an alliance with force and power behind it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, the Senator just said we are not liable to have any controversy with regard to the islands of the Pacific; and this treaty only relating to those islands, according to his view, it is not at all likely that there would ever arise any controversy between the parties to it or any difficulty whatever growing out of its terms. I think that is the legitimate conclusion to draw from the remarks which he has just made.

It would seem that some people were so terrorized by the terrible licking they got on the League of Nations issue that they shy at every ghostlike apparition that they think resembles the League of Nations.

It has deprived them of the power, apparently, to discriminate between what I have been free to characterize as an international "monstrosity," looked at from the standpoint of the man who loves the independence of his country—the League of Nations—and an agreement which is very similar in its character to the 72 other treaties and agreements for peace and amity which the United States has already entered into in the long course of its history from the days of George Washington down to the present time, by which it agrees to confer with reference to disputes, to adjust them upon a peaceful basis, to respect the rights of the other nations of the world, and to live, as George Washington said, in peace and "honest friendship" with other countries. They object to that because they were so overwhelmed by the people of the country in their support of the League of Nations that they think this may be confused with it.

Mr. KING. The Senator does not include me in the category of those who are afraid of the League of Nations or the ghost of the League of Nations, because I was for it and I am still for it. I want to state to the Senator that, in my opinion, notwithstanding the election returns, the League of Nations was not the cause of the Republican triumph. If the Senator will read a recent book called "The Great Deception," by a proleague Republican, he will find there an analysis of some of the reasons for the election of President Harding; they will not be assuring to the Senator and will, in my opinion, successfully controvert the views which he just announced as to the cause of the Republican success.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is all a matter of record. The objection to this agreement that it is an alliance is not based upon anything in the agreement itself.

Even the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] says that it is not an alliance; yet he opposes it as vigorously as does the eloquent Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who say that it is an alliance, and base their arguments against it upon that ground. An alliance, in the sense in which objection is made to this agreement, would be a treaty by which the parties would agree to support each other in case of war, would lend military aid and come to the assistance of the other parties to the agreement.

Now I lay down the proposition that a nation can not be bound to perform the act which holds more of good or evil fortune for its people than any other governmental act which it can perform, namely, the act of making war, unless it is provided for in the clearest and most express terms.

It seems to me to be quite contrary to any rule of interpretation of instruments, even those between private parties, to hold that there may be read between the lines and by implication an agreement to bind a power to lead its people into war. I deny that there is any such principle of construction of treaties or agreements between nations. Mr. President, the entire course of diplomatic history negatives that proposition. There can not be found in this agreement certainly any express provision that the United States shall lend its military aid to any one of the other parties to it.

In the agreement for the maintenance of the sublime porte there was an expression to the effect that invasion of Turkish territory or independence by any power should be a casus belli.

Mr. Gladstone and Lord Palmerston, representing the British Government, which was chiefly concerned and which was chiefly responsible for the status of the Turk in Europe, always contended and always applied the principle in the various controversies which grew out of the situation of the Turk upon the Bosphorus, that that provision imposed no obligation which required Great Britain to go to war on account of the violation of that treaty. Their position was—and it seems to me a perfectly reasonable one—that it gave Great Britain the right to go to war if she saw fit to do so; that its violation would be a cause for war. Mr. Gladstone said if the conditions and circumstances out of which war arose caused Great Britain to feel that war on her part was justified, or that her interests and her obligations looking toward the purpose for which the treaty was framed, justified and required her to take any such step, she should then go to war.

The Senator from Idaho the other day said that the Triple Entente caused Great Britain to go to the rescue of France in the World War. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the official declaration of war by Great Britain stated that the cause of Great Britain going to the assistance of France in that war was the invasion of Belgium by the German troops and the violation of the agreement which the powers of Europe had entered into in the treaty of 1839. That was written by Great Britain into her declaration of war against Germany.

However, Mr. President, pursuing the question of the interpretation of treaties, suppose for the sake of the argument that the Triple Entente had been the cause of Great Britain's going into that war, what language was there in that agreement which imposed that obligation upon her?

In the very speech of Sir Edward Grey, at that time the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Great Britain, which was quoted here by the Senator from Idaho, Sir Edward Grey declared in the House of Commons that Great Britain was under no obligation to render military aid to France on account of the Triple Entente. He even went so far as to declare that even the treaty of Belgium, in which Great Britain had used the word "guarantee" in defining her obligation as to the neutrality of that little country on the English Channel, did not compel Great Britain to make war. That question had been discussed on various occasions in the House of Commons by the premiers of Great Britain, including Mr. Gladstone, and it was the settled and express policy of Great Britain, even though Great Britain had said that she would "guarantee" the neutrality and integrity of Belgium, that that did not impose upon her an obligation to go to war unless she concluded that the interests of Great Britain justified it; and so it was declared on the outbreak of the great German war. I defy anyone—the Senator from Idaho, learned as he is, or anyone else—to point out in the history of international relations any agreement between nations by which any nation was ever held to be compelled to render military or naval aid to another nation unless there had been the most positive and express agreement in unmistakable terms to do so.

So, Mr. President, basing my construction of this agreement upon the precedents of nations, I say that it is not possible that it should impose any further obligation upon this country than that which it expressly contains.

I wish to call attention very briefly to one treaty of peace and amity which was made in 1797 between the United States and Tunis.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds to another branch of his argument, will he yield to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield to the Senator after I say a word or two more. The Senator from Utah will remember that we entered into various treaties, in many respects very much like the pending treaty, with little powers along the Mediterranean. They violated those treaties; made piratical attacks upon American trade and commerce, and we had to go over there and chastise them. Commodore Decatur burned their ships, and afterwards they thought they would be good, and they renewed their treaties of peace and amity with the United States, by which they agreed to respect our rights and we agreed to respect their rights. We agreed upon certain methods by which disputes between the two nations should be settled, by communication and by conference, just as is provided in the pending treaty. There was no objection on the part of George Washington to those agreements; on the contrary, he negotiated the treaties, in the first instance. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, taking the observations of the Senator to-day and his speech delivered a day or so ago together, I have reached the conclusion—and I do not wish to do the Senator an injustice—that the Senator's position with respect to the four-power pact now under consideration in brief is this: That it merely creates an armed status between the four powers—I was about to say a condition of armed neutrality—or, at any rate, it supposes a limitation of naval armament, and makes provision for consultation. The Senator stated the other day, in substance, that we must maintain our Navy and that no treaty, no matter its sanctions and obligations, would be sufficient to protect our Nation. He gave China as an illustration of an unprepared nation, and insisted that, notwithstanding this treaty or any other treaty into which we might enter, we must still be militant and belligerent and have an army and a navy for national protection; that we could not rely upon treaties, but we must rely upon our own resources and mobilized and prepared armies and navies.

Now I ask the Senator—and I do so for information—what is the benefit of this treaty? We are still to maintain a belligerent and bellicose attitude under the guise of peace; we are to be Talleyrands and Machiavellis, professing peace and amity, and at the same time we must have a hand of iron and the sword and the bayonet and the naval gun ready for action. The nations are only to consult if there are any controversies growing out of their insular posessions, but there is no authority in the treaty granted to any nation or any agency to exercise force in order to bring a recalcitrant nation into terms of amity and peace with the other powers signatory to the treaty. Now I ask the Senator what is his interpretation of what this treaty means? I ask the question in good faith, as I respect the Senator's judgment and his sincerity. I want him to tell us what he thinks this treaty does do. What will be the effect of it? What are the advantages to be derived from it if we are still to be belligerent and militant, and if we are only to be brought together at a sort of tea party to consult now and then as to what we may do?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that is a very complicated and elaborate question.

Mr. KING. I know it is; let the Senator cut the Gordian knot.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is based upon language of the Senator and not upon language of mine. I have never stated that we should maintain a bellicose or belligerent attitude. The great difficulty with the Senator from Utah, I infer from his remarks, is that he does not admit that it is possible for a self-respecting nation to maintain adequate means to protect its rights and its citizens in a friendly way, to be used only upon occasion when those rights are attacked or invaded or when some policy which it regards as essential is assailed. If I may refer again to Washington, he believed in adequate preparedness, and yet, at the same time, he stated that we should live in peace and honest friendship with all nations. The pending treaty goes along with the naval limitation treaty. The Senator can not consider them as entirely independent and unrelated. If those who negotiated the pending treaty and its advocates regarded it alone as sufficient to maintain and protect the rights of the United States, it is very likely that they would have made no provision in regard to the maintenance of a navy, and yet there was very careful provision, after elaborate negotiations, for a navy at a certain ratio with relation to the navies of the other powers to this agreement.

Mr. President, there seem to be two classes of people in this respect. One class seem to pursue such a policy that they will refuse to respect the rights of other people, at least, they will refuse to make an express agreement to do so; they are very careless about that; they have no hesitation about invading other people's rights, and yet at the same time they make no preparation whatever for meeting the consequences of that kind of action.

The opponents of this treaty, nearly all of them—at least, many of them—want to refuse by the adoption of the treaty to agree to respect the rights of the other parties to it, and at the same time want to abolish the Navy. They are not even content with the 5-5-3 ratio, but they want to do away with the Navy altogether. It seems to me that they occupy a very inconsistent and contradictory attitude. On the other hand, there is the other class, who are willing to agree to respect the rights of others, who are very punctilious about doing it, who would go a long way around to avoid offending one of their neighbors, and yet who are very particular to prepare themselves in such a way that in case they do become involved in trouble they can give a good account of themselves. That is the idea that was expressed by one of our great Presidents as "speaking softly and carrying a big stick"; not as seeking trouble, but as anxious to avoid it, but as prepared to meet it when it comes as it inevitably will come soon or late. He was in favor, and so are the advocates of these treaties in favor, of a punctilious observance of our international obligations, of adopting every measure that can be devised, in case a controversy arises, to avoid an armed conflict; yet they realize that you can not guarantee the performance of agreements of this kind. They realize the mutability of governments, the uncertainty of human nature, and that however good the faith may be when the agreement is signed it may be broken, and so they provide and propose to provide, if Congress will support them in it, for security upon this note.

There may be an obligation which a man owes to another which is unexpressed. In order to define and settle it, it may be put in the form of a promissory note. So it was done by writing our unexpressed obligation to Great Britain and to Japan and France, to respect their rights in the Pacific, into this promissory note which comes here in the form of a treaty, that we will carry out a certain course of conduct in relation to our neighbors in the Pacific. But when a man has signed a note, very frequently he wants an indorser besides the maker; so in this case we have as indorsers—each one of those who have signed the treaty—three other powers whose combined moral support will influence the conduct of each of the other nations in its relations with the other powers of the world.

Very frequently, Mr. President, when a man has secured even an indorser upon a note, he wants still further security. So, regarding the priceless value of the interests which are to be affected in controversies between nations, the lives of their people, the honor and the prosperity of their country, in order that no chances whatever should be taken, they pursued the course that is often pursued by wise business men even in matters which have no greater value than money, and that is to take some security in addition to the makers and the indorsers of a note. That security in this case is provided in the treaty in the form of a navy upon the 5-5-3 ratio.

So, Mr. President, there being no League of Nations, there being no surrender of sovereignty, there being no additional agency of government established, this treaty being in the nature of those which it has been the habit of our Nation to negotiate since it first took its place among the sovereign nations of the earth, there is no objection based upon any tangible or demonstrable fact to the ratification of the treaty by the Senate.

The treaty with Tunis, which I referred to a moment ago, is illustrative of many treaties which the United States has entered into. It provides that—

> There shall be a perpetual and constant peace between the United States of America and the Magnificent Pasha, Bey of Tunis; and also a permanent friendship, which shall more and more increase.

I might call attention to the preamble of this treaty; and if the preamble of this treaty did not do any damage, there is no danger of any preamble in any treaty ever doing any harm to those who sign it:

> God is infinite.
> Under the auspices of the greatest, the most powerful of all the princes of the Ottoman nation who reign upon the earth, our most glorious and most august Emperor, who commands the two lands and the two seas, Selim Kan, the victorious son of the Sultan Moustafa, whose realm may God prosper until the end of ages, the support of kings, the seal of justice, the emperor of emperors.
> The most illustrious and most magnificent prince, Hamouda Pacha, Bey, who commands the Odgiak of Tunis, the abode of happiness, and the most honored Irahim Dey, and Soliman, Aga of the Janissaries, the chief of the divan, and all the elders of the Odgiak; and the most distinguished and honored President of the Congress of the United States of America, the most distinguished among those who profess the religion of the Messiah, of whom may the end be happy.

We have concluded between us the present treaty of peace and friendship, all the articles of which have been framed by the intervention of Joseph Stephen Famin, French merchant residing at Tunis, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, which stipulations and conditions are comprised in 23 articles, written and expressed in such manner as to leave no doubt of their contents, and in such way as not to be contravened.

And so, of a similar character, we have negotiated 72 treaties, including one with Japan by Commodore Perry, ratified by the Senate, and another one with Great Britain.

I want to call attention, Mr. President, to the authorities on the interpretation of international treaties as to the obligation of making war, upon which alone can be based a decision as to what the obligation of the United States is under this agreement.

On April 15, 1856, France, Austria, and Great Britain—

I am reading from "England's Guarantee to Belgium and Luxemburg," on page 34—signed a separate treaty, which is important by reason of the use of the words "jointly and severally"; it provides:

"ARTICLE I. The high contracting parties guarantee, jointly and severally, the independence and the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, recorded in the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of March, 1856."

"ART. II. Any infraction of the stipulations of the said treaty will be considered by the powers signing the present treaty as a casus belli. They will come to an understanding with the Sublime Porte as to the measures which have become necessary"—

Language that is similar to that which is contained in the pending agreement, except that the treaty now before us does not contain the stipulation that violation shall be a casus belli—

"and will without delay determine among themselves as to the employment of their military and naval forces."

There military and naval forces were expressly mentioned; but it was invariably held by all the premiers of Great Britain, without objection from any other power, that it was entirely in the discretion of Great Britain as to what use she should make of her naval or military forces, and it was expressly asserted on various occasions that she was not under any obligation to any other power to go to war.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I was very much interested in what the Senator had to say concerning the sentiment in this country regarding the reduction of our Navy. Did I understand the Senator to say that there is some sentiment in this country in favor of reducing the size of our Navy even beyond the limitation provided for in the 5-5-3 ratio?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very sorry to say that there is, in the country and in the Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am amazed——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think, if the Senator will pardon me just one word, that the Senator will find, if he is here—as he no doubt will be, as he usually is in his seat in the Senate—that that is a very practical question, which the Senate very soon will be confronted with, whether or not we are going to maintain a Navy at the strength allowed and provided for by this treaty. I call attention to that because it seems to me to cast into the realm of the academic all questions as to whether we should have a larger Navy than that, when the great difficulty is to have one up to that mark.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I was especially interested, because I know of the Senator's special knowledge of naval matters and his great influence in formulating our naval policy as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee; but it is a matter of great surprise to me to learn that there is any sentiment or influence of substantial proportions in this country in favor of destroying our Navy or even reducing it to the extent of making it inferior to any other navy, regardless of the naval program or policies of other nations. I can understand a sentiment in favor of scrapping all navies, in favor of complete disarmament—not limitation of armament, but complete disarmament of both armies and navies—and I am in full sympathy with it; but I can not understand how our citizens, realizing that armies and navies exist for the purpose of our protection and the security of our rights against other countries that maintain armies and navies, would want our Army or our Navy to be second to that of any other country in its size and in its efficiency to serve and defend our country in time of need.

I am for no navy, if the world will disarm, but with the world armed, I want our country to be second to none in its capacity to protect our lives, properties, and rights. It seems to me that our policy ought to depend entirely upon the attitude of other nations, and that if other nations are going to maintain their navies, we can not afford to take the position of reducing our Navy beyond the size that guarantees reasonable security. We should, however, do everything possible to bring the public sentiment of the world to favor the abolition of all navies, but it is foolhardiness for a nation to begin to scrap its navy when every other nation in the world is increasing or maintaining its full naval strength.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I appreciate those sensible remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I am glad that he has uttered them here in order to call attention to and emphasize that situation, because it is an actual menace. Of course, the strength of the Navy does not depend merely upon the hulks of ships. It depends more upon men and upon the training of the men, and that can not be done without adequate appropriations for the purpose. There is a plan on foot in very responsible quarters, I am told—I do not desire to criticize them at all, because they are entitled to their views and their jurisdiction—for such provision for our Navy as would leave it, instead of the equal of any other navy, the smallest of the three great naval powers. Instead of a ratio of 5-5-3, there would be a ratio of 5-3-2, the United States occupying the position of 2.

So I am informed by the most expert and the most reliable naval authorities; and it is also my own conclusion, based upon a comparison of this with provisions which have been made for the Navy in the past. That is a question which we will have to determine, and we are not impeded in our determination of it by this treaty, or by any other treaty which is pending here, because we act entirely within the limits of the agreement. I may say, although I did not intend to discuss the naval-limitation treaty, that this naval-limitation treaty represents the first authoritative international recognition of the United States as a naval power equal to any other. So much for its effect upon the naval status of the United States.

I usually agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, but I do not do so in his declaration in favor of a complete scrapping of all navies. I do believe in a reasonable limitation, because I can see that where there is a race between nations, without limitation, each one trying to get bigger guns than the other, bigger ships than the other, and more of them than the other, there is no end of it, and whether it leads to war or not, there is a considerable expense, though not so much of an expense as has been represented on various occasions. We are beginning to find that out now. The navy yards are being closed down, and we find that most of the expense of navies goes in wages and into the channels of commerce and in trade; it does not bear the relation to the other expenses of the Government which has been represented by any means. It seems to me, however that may be, that it is perfectly absurd for nations, after they have reached a certain point in the establishment of naval supremacy sufficient to curb and to police the evil influences of the world, which do exist, whether we like to admit it or not, to go on in a continued race for size and number. In that respect, leaving us in the best relative position in which we have ever been, this series of treaties, all interrelated with each other, in my opinion, form a very excellent basis for the adjustment of that question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong the discussion, except to say that I quite agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] that so long as conditions in the world are as at present we must maintain a Navy of such size that it would at least be in a position to make a formidable defense of our rights. It is national suicide to reduce beyond the 5-5-3 ratio unless other Governments do likewise.

There is one thing more I want to say about the question of limitation of armaments. I think our country should have led, not so much in an effort to limit armaments as in an endeavor to bring about complete world disarmament. If a man has two revolvers and his antagonist also has two, and they wish to limit their arms, all they need do is to throw away one revolver, but they can still fight and kill each other. Nations can fight each other just so long as they have armies and navies, whether large or small. An agreement to reduce the size of armies and navies is merely an agreement not to fight so hard or so fiercely. Our Government lost a great opportunity at Versailles, and more especially at Washington, in not insisting on complete world disarmament. That does not mean that we should not have an Army and a Navy sufficient to do policing, but instead of limiting the weapons we shall use when we get into a fight, instead of saying we will not kill each other off so rapidly, we ought to demand that all honest and sincere peace-loving governments throw away all their arms and settle international disputes without having their peace negotiators or peace-shouting statesmen supplied with blackjacks.

As long as men have revolvers they will shoot. As long as nations have armies and navies they will fight. I repeat, we have lost a great opportunity to take the leadership in bringing about complete disarmament. There has never been a time since the coming of the Prince of Peace when the opportunity was so easily within grasp to do something for real world peace as it was for America as the result of the World War, to vigorously contend for and demand complete disarmament. I have not heard one of the leaders of this administration raise his voice in favor of absolute disarmament. Not to have at least made the effort is indefensible. All we have been urging is limitation rather than abolition of armaments. It is well as far as it goes, for it reduces somewhat the expenses of Government, but it does not begin to reach the real evil, which is war. Talk about limiting arms is really camouflaging the truth and misleads the peoples of the world who really long for peace. Our aim should be the ending of war by destroying the weapons of war and the prevention of their manufacture and use. Wars will never end until every nation scraps its navy and until every nation reduces its army to the size of a national police force. Let us give the world its choice—complete, honest disarmament—or if our allies deny us this assurance of peace then let us lead in the possession of the means of defense. We will be safest and the world will be more peaceful if the first course is followed. We will accept the compulsion forced upon us to protect ourselves only when the other nations compel it by refusing to disarm completely. In a world filled with war implements and trained armies and navies our security lies only in an Army and Navy of sufficient size to afford adequate protection.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I want to refer to another authority showing that there is no obligation to make war unless it is expressly provided for. On page 119 of the volume called "England's Guarantee to Belgium and Luxemburg" I find this statement:

> The real point is that British statesmen had never considered that there was an absolute obligation—irrespective of all circumstances—to take up arms in defense of Belgian neutrality. There is no need to repeat the evidence given in the last chapter.

Mr. President, as to why England did go into that war, as bearing upon the interpretation of treaty obligations, I want to cite very briefly a few of the official documents. The fact of the case is that she went into it because her vital interests were involved.

In the British Blue Book, giving the official correspondence and negotiations between the great European powers at the outbreak of the Great War—No. 3—I find the following statement in a dispatch from Sir Edward Grey to the British ambassador at Vienna:

> The possible consequences of the present situation were terrible. If as many as four great powers of Europe—let us say Austria, France, Russia, and Germany—were engaged in war, it seemed to me that it must involve the expenditure of so vast a sum of money and such an interference with trade that a war would be accompanied or followed by a complete collapse of European credit and industry. In these days in great industrial States this would mean a state of things worse than that of 1848, and irrespective of who were victors in the war many things might be completely swept away.

That is one out of a great number of documents which demonstrate the tremendous efforts toward peace made by the foreign office of Great Britain, contrary to the assumption of some Senators, who argue upon this floor that the triple alliance was the cause of the war. These documents show that, on the contrary, these efforts were put forth to prevent war; that they did have conferences; that they exchanged communications between the British foreign office and all the other foreign offices of Europe of countries which possibly might be involved in the war which was then threatening them.

That, Mr. President, is exactly what is provided for in the pending treaty, that there shall be full and frank communication, as provided in article 2; that there shall be a conference between the parties to the treaty, as provided in article 1, not to make war but to seek to do the thing which the nations which were confronted with the holocaust of world war failed to do, to find some means by which it could be prevented. In other words, the purpose is peace, not military aggression.

In No. 18 of the British Bluebook, in a telegram from the British chargé d'affaires at Berlin to Sir Edward Grey, the British foreign minister, of date July 25, 1914, he said, speaking of the German Secretary of State:

> Secretary of State said that he did not know what Austria-Hungary had ready on the spot, but he admitted quite freely that Austro-Hungarian Government wished to give the Serbians a lesson, and that they meant to take military action. He also admitted that Serbian Government could not swallow certain of the Austro-Hungarian demands.

In No. 36, dated July 26, Sir Edward Grey said to the British ambassador at Paris, and also to the chargé d'affaires at Berlin, and to the British ambassador at Rome:

> Would the Minister for Foreign Affairs—

That is, the Ministers for Foreign Affairs in these several countries where the representatives were located—> be disposed to instruct ambassador here to join with representatives of France, Italy, and Germany and myself to meet here in conference immediately for the purpose of discovering an issue which would prevent complications?

That was the effort to bring about a conference, just such as is provided for in the pending agreement.

In No. 43 of the same book, being a telegram from the British ambassador at Berlin to Sir Edward Grey, he said:

> Secretary of State says that conference you suggest would practically amount to a court of arbitration and could not, in his opinion, be called together except at the request of Austria and Russia. He could not therefore fall in with your suggestion, desirous though he was to cooperate for the maintenance of peace. I said I was sure that your idea had nothing to do with arbitration, but meant that representatives of the four nations not directly interested should discuss and suggest means for avoiding a dangerous situation.

No. 46 of the same book is a dispatch from Sir Edward Grey to Sir E. Goschen, the British ambassador to Berlin. I read a pertinent sentence from it:

> Just so other issues might be raised that would supersede the dispute between Austria and Serbia, and would bring other powers in, and the war would be the biggest ever known.

That is dated July 27, 1914.

In No. 49, from Sir Edward Grey to the British ambassador at Rome, he said:

> The Italian ambassador informed Sir A. Nicholson to-day that the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs agreed entirely with my proposal for a conference of four to be held in London.
> As regards the question of asking Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Serbia to suspend war operations pending the result of the conference, the Marquis di San Giuliano would recommend the suggestion warmly to the German Government, and would inquire what procedure they would propose should be followed at Vienna.

That was dated July 27. On July 28, No. 59 of this document, the British ambassador at Paris said to Sir Edward Grey, speaking of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, as follows:

> He is grateful for the communication, and quite appreciates the impossibility for His Majesty's Government to declare themselves "solidaires" with Russia on a question between Austria and Serbia, which, in its present condition, is not one affecting England.

In No. 60, dated July 28, from the British ambassador to Sir Edward Grey, he said:

> I discussed with my two colleagues this morning his reply, and we found that, while refusing the proposed conference, he said to all of us that nevertheless he desired to work with us for the maintenance of general peace.

On July 28, No. 67, Sir Edward Grey telegraphed to Sir Edwin Goschen, the British ambassador at Berlin:

> It would not be an arbitration but a private and informal discussion to ascertain what suggestion could be made for a settlement. No suggestion would be put forward that had not previously been ascertained to be acceptable to Austria and Russia, with whom the mediating powers could easily keep in touch through their respective allies.

In No. 87, dated July 29, Sir Edward Grey wrote to the British ambassador at Paris as follows:

> Even if the question became one between Austria and Russia, we should not feel called upon to take a hand in it. It would then be a question of supremacy of Teuton or Slav—a struggle for supremacy in the Balkans, and our idea had always been to avoid being drawn into a war over a Balkan question. If Germany became involved and France became involved, we had not made up our minds what we should do; it was that case that we should have to consider. France would then have been drawn into a quarrel which was not hers, but in which, owing to her alliance, her honor and interest obliged her to engage.

Now as to the obligation of the Triple Entente he said:

> We were free from engagements, and we should have to decide what British interests required us to do. I thought it necessary to say that because, as he knew, we were taking all precautions with regard to our fleet, and I was about to warn Prince Lichnowsky not to count on our standing aside, but it would not be fair that I should let M. Cambon be misled into supposing that this meant that we had decided what to do in a contingency that I still hoped might not arise.
> M. Cambon said that I had explained the situation very clearly. He understood it to be that in a Balkan quarrel and in a struggle for supremacy between Teuton and Slav we should not feel called to intervene; should other issues be raised, and Germany and France become involved, so that the question became one of the hegemony of Europe, we should then decide what it was necessary for us to do.
> He seemed quite prepared for this announcement and made no criticism upon it.

On July 29, No. 89 of the document, Sir Edward Grey wrote to the British ambassador at Berlin, and I will read just a brief extract from it:

But if Germany became involved in it, and then France, the issue might be so great that it would involve all European interests; * * * but we knew very well that if the issue did become such that we thought British interests required us to intervene—

British interests, mind you.

we must intervene at once, and the decision would have to be very rapid.

Omitting a part of the letter, I read further:

But if we failed in our efforts to keep the peace, and if the issue spread so that it involved practically every European interest, I did not wish to be open to any reproach from him that the friendly tone of all our conversations had misled him.

Turning to July 30, approaching very closely to the actual outbreak of the war, the British ambassador at Berlin communicated with Sir Edward Grey by telegram, and I read just one sentence from the telegram:

He—

Referring to the German Secretary of State—regretted this, as he knew France did not desire war, but it would be a military necessity.

That is from the German Secretary of State in conversation with the British ambassador reported by the British ambassador to Sir Edward Grey.

Turning to No. 105, inclosure 1, relating to the nature of the Triple Entente, I ask to insert that without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The document referred to is as follows:

(Inclosure 1 in No. 105.)

SIR EDWARD GREY TO M. CAMBON, FRENCH AMBASSADOR IN LONDON.

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 22, 1912.

MY DEAR AMBASSADOR: From time to time in recent years the French and British naval and military experts have consulted together. It has always been understood that such consultation does not restrict the freedom of either Government to decide at any future time whether or not to assist the other by armed force. We have agreed that consultation between experts is not, and ought not to be regarded as, an engagement that commits either Government to action in a contingency that has not arisen and may never arise. The disposition, for instance, of the French and British fleets, respectively, at the present moment is not based upon an engagement to cooperate in war.

You have, however, pointed out that, if either Government had grave reason to expect an unprovoked attack by a third power, it might become essential to know whether it could in that event depend upon the armed assistance of the other.

I agree that, if either Government had grave reason to expect an unprovoked attack by a third power, or something that threatened the general peace, it should immediately discuss with the other whether both Government should act together to prevent aggression and to preserve peace, and, if so, what measures they would be prepared to take in common. If these measures involved action, the plans of the general staffs would at once be taken into consideration, and the Governments would then decide what effect should be given to them.

Yours, etc.,

E. GREY.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No. 114, on July 31, from the British Minister of Foreign Affairs to the British ambassadors at Paris and Berlin:

I still trust that the situation is not irretrievable, but in view of prospects of mobilization in Germany it becomes essential to His Majesty's Government, in view of existing treaties, to ask whether French (German) Governments are prepared to engage to respect the neutrality of Belgium so long as no other power violates it.

That was the question that was asked just on the verge of war.

No. 119, July 31, from the British Foreign Minister to the British ambassador at Paris:

Though we should have to put our policy before Parliament we could not pledge Parliament in advance. Up to the present moment we did not feel, and public opinion did not feel, that any treaties or obligations of this country were involved. Further developments might alter this situation and cause the Government and Parliament to take the view that intervention was justified. The preservation of the neutrality of Belgium might be—I would not say a decisive but an important factor in determining our attitude. Whether we proposed to Parliament to intervene or not to intervene in a war, Parliament would wish to know how we stood with regard to the neutrality of Belgium, and it might be that I should ask both France and Germany whether each was prepared to undertake an engagement that she would not be the first to violate the neutrality of Belgium.

M. Cambon repeated his question whether we would help France if Germany made an attack on her.

I said that I could only adhere to the answer that as far as things had gone at present we could not take any engagement.

Further down in the statement:

I said that the cabinet would certainly be summoned as soon as there was some new development, but at the present moment the only answer I could give was that we could not undertake any definite engagement.

There are a few more of these documents leading up to the final declaration of war and showing the mistake of the Senator from Idaho in his assumption that it was the Triple Entente that caused Great Britain to enter the war.

No. 128, August 1, 1914, is a telegram from the British minister at Brussels to Sir Edward Grey:

The instructions conveyed in your telegram of yesterday have been acted upon.

Belgium expects and desires that other powers will observe and uphold her neutrality, which she intends to maintain to the utmost of her power. In so informing me, minister for foreign affairs said that, in the event of the violation of the neutrality of their territory, they believed that they were in a position to defend themselves against intrusion. The relations between Belgium and her neighbors were excellent, and there was no reason to suspect their intentions; but he thought it well, nevertheless, to be prepared against emergencies.

On August 1 Sir Edward Grey to Sir Edward Goschen, British ambassador at Berlin:

We are informed that authorities at Hamburg have forcibly detained steamers belonging to the Great Central Co. and other British merchant ships.

I can not ascertain on what grounds the detention of British ships has been ordered.

You should request German Government to send immediate orders that they should be allowed to proceed without delay. The effect on public opinion here will be deplorable unless this is done. His Majesty's Government, on their side, are most anxious to avoid any incident of an aggressive nature, and the German Government will, I hope, be equally careful not to take any step which would make the situation between us impossible.

On August 2, in a telegram from the British Foreign Minister to the British ambassador at Paris, he said—and I read only a portion of it:

I pointed out—

That is, to the French ambassador in London—

that we had very large questions and most difficult issues to consider, and that Government felt that they could not bind themselves to declare war upon Germany necessarily if war broke out between France and Germany to-morrow, but it was essential to the French Government, whose fleet had long been concentrated in the Mediterranean, to know how to make their dispositions with their north coast entirely undefended. We therefore thought it necessary to give them this assurance. It did not bind us to go to war with Germany unless the German fleet took the action indicated, but it did give a security to France that would enable her to settle the disposition of her own Mediterranean fleet.

M. Cambon asked me about the violation of Luxemburg. I told him the doctrine on that point laid down by Lord Derby and Lord Clarendon in 1867. He asked me what we should say about the violation of the neutrality of Belgium. I said that was a much more important matter—

That is, the violation of Luxemburg—

we were considering what statement we should make in Parliament to-morrow—in effect, whether we should declare violation of Belgian neutrality to be a casus belli. I told him what had been said to the German ambassador on this point.

Turning to No. 156, on August 4 the British Minister of Foreign Affairs wrote to the British ambassador at Berlin as follows:

I continue to receive numerous complaints from British firms as to the detention of their ships at Hamburg, Cuxhaven, and other German ports. This action on the part of the German authorities is totally unjustifiable. It is in direct contravention of international law and of the assurances given to your excellency by the Imperial Chancellor. You should demand the immediate release of all British ships if such release has not yet been given.

I want to read another telegraphic dispatch of the same date, August 4, from Sir Edward Grey to Sir Edward Goschen:

We hear that Germany has addressed note to Belgian Minister for Foreign Affairs, stating that German Government will be compelled to carry out—if necessary, by force of arms—the measures considered indispensable.

We are also informed that Belgian territory has been violated at Gemmenich.

This dispatch was dated August 4, and he refers there to the violation of the Belgian neutrality, which had, of course, occurred prior to that time. The German troops entered Belgium early on the morning of the 4th, and that was what was referred to by Sir Edward Grey in this dispatch. The declaration of war by Great Britain against Germany was not issued until the following day, so that the statement of the Senator from Idaho that the declaration of war preceded the violation of Belgian neutrality was a mistake.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think I was mistaken.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The records show that the Senator was mistaken. He is undoubtedly stating the German contention. I think the Germans contend that because the British had notified the French that if the German fleet attacked the north coast of France they would intervene, but the Germans proposed to agree with Great Britain that their fleet should not attack the north coast of France and the British denied that that was a declaration of war. We can not transpose dates, and there is no dispute about the actual dates on which these various documents were written. The declaration of war was promulgated on the 5th and the invasion of Belgium was on the 4th, so I find it difficult to see how the Senator can say that the invasion was after the declaration of war.

Mr. BORAH. May I say that Germany asked Great Britain specifically if they would agree to respect the neutrality of Belgium, would Great Britain decline to go to the assistance of France, and Great Britain said that notwithstanding they would respect the neutrality of Belgium they would not agree not to go to the assistance of France. Therefore I say that it was not the invasion of Belgium which was the dominating influence that guided England in the war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am going to cite some further documents on that point, but what I was discussing at this point was whether or not the declaration of war preceded or followed the invasion of Belgium. I may say, in commenting upon what the Senator from Idaho has just said, that the statement by Sir Edward Grey to the German foreign office that they would not agree not to go to the assistance of France, even though Germany should agree not to violate the neutrality of Belgium, was not, of course, a declaration of war or anything resembling it. It simply amounted to a statement that they would not commit themselves at that time as to what they would do. They made the same statement to France all through the official documents. There was a feverish activity on the part of French officials to commit Great Britain to a promise to come to their assistance. Sir Edward Grey very carefully avoided committing himself either to Belgium or France as to what he would do. He pursued that as a deliberate policy, because he said he did not want to state a definite policy, feeling that that would have a bad effect, did not want to mislead France, because he wanted to reserve the independence of action of Great Britain. That was the reason he made the statements to which the Senator from Idaho refers. The fact that he said he would not agree not to assist France was far from being equivalent to saying that he would agree to assist them. It was just a refusal to commit himself.

On August 4, 1914, Sir Edward Grey telegraphed to the British ambassador, Sir Edward Goschen, at Berlin. His message bears on the question which the Senator from Idaho has again raised as to whether or not it was the invasion of Belgium that was, to use his words, "the controlling cause of the British entry into the World War." Sir Edward Grey says:

> We hear that Germany has addressed note to Belgian minister for foreign affairs, stating that German Government will be compelled to carry out—if necessary, by force of arms—the measures considered indispensable.
>
> We are also informed that Belgian territory has been violated at Gemmenich.
> In these circumstances, and in view of the fact that Germany declined to give the same assurance respecting Belgium as France gave last week—

France had agreed to respect the neutrality of Belgium in the pressure of these rapidly occurring events on condition that Germany would not violate it.

> in reply to our request made simultaneously at Berlin and Paris, we must repeat that request, and ask that a satisfactory reply to it and to my telegram of this morning be received here by 12 o'clock to-night.

That was getting down pretty close to an ultimatum. The question which had to be answered was whether or not Germany would agree to respect the neutrality of Belgium, and whether or not Germany had notified Belgium that, in case she was not allowed peaceably to transfer troops across Belgian territory, she would take whatever forcible military measures might be necessary.

Mr. BORAH. What is the date of the telegram from which the Senator from Washington is reading?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is dated August 4. Let me complete it; it contains merely a few words.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The telegram continues:

> If not, you are instructed to ask for your passports, and to say that His Majesty's Government feel bound to take all steps in their power to uphold the neutrality of Belgium and the observance of a treaty to which Germany is as much a party as ourselves.

In view of that statement, how can it be said that the invasion of Belgium was not the controlling cause of Great Britain going into the war?

Mr. BORAH. But that was on August 4. On August 2 Sir Edward Grey gave Mr. Cambon this memorandum, which Germany had in her possession on the 3d:

> I am authorized to give an assurance that, if the German fleet comes into the channel or through the North Sea to undertake hostile operations against French coasts or shipping, the British fleet will give them all the protection in its power.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I referred to that a moment ago.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator referred to that, but on the 2d of August, when the question of the neutrality of Belgium was not imminent at all, England had given assurance to the French minister that if Germany attacked France she would go to her help. Germany was in possession of that information. Of course, after that the question of the neutrality of Belgium was a mere makeshift or a camouflage.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all; because, as I said a moment ago, Germany had agreed with Great Britain—and I have never heard anyone dispute the fact—that if Great Britain would agree to keep out of the war she would agree that her fleet would not attack the north coast of France. So that question was eliminated. Where the point of conflict and difference came was in Germany's refusal to agree not to invade Belgium. She did agree not to attack the north coast of France with a fleet.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not mean that Germany agreed to do so; he means that she proposed in case England would stay out of the war she would agree not to attack the north coast of France.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. But in the meantime she had in her absolute possession knowledge of the fact that England was going into the war for another reason.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That statement is not based on any document which has come into my possession.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it is based on the document which I have just read.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. I will read it again.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That relates to the attack on the north coast of France by a fleet and Germany, so it is said, was ready to agree not to do that. With all the efforts Sir Edward Grey had made to bring about some adjustment of this question which would not involve the world in war, the horrible consequences of which he fully foresaw, as is shown by his repeated declarations as to the misery and the economic losses and disturbances that would ensue throughout the world after war was over, the Senator does not suppose, if that had been the only question between them, and Germany had agreed not to take such action, that Great Britain would have gone into the war?

Mr. BORAH. I have not said that that was the only question. I said that the other question was the dominating question.

Mr. POINDETER. The documents, in my judgment, bear out the contention that the dominating and controlling and immediate and direct question was the invasion of Belgium, and that is shown by the declaration of war.

Mr. BORAH. As to that there is a difference of opinion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; and a difference also of authority.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is not a question of difference of authority.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On August 4, 1914, Sir Edward Grey telegraphed to the British ambassador at Berlin to the following effect:

> The King of Belgians has made an appeal to His Majesty the King for diplomatic intervention on behalf of Belgium in the following terms—

We must, if we are to read them intelligently, read these documents in sequence and in the relation one has to the other—

> Remembering the numerous proofs of Your Majesty's friendship and that of your predecessor, and the friendly attitude of England in 1870, and the proof of friendship you have just given us again, I make a supreme appeal to the diplomatic intervention of Your Majesty's Government to safeguard the integrity of Belgium.

That is the end of the message from the King of the Belgians. Sir Edward Grey goes on in his telegram, as follows:

> His Majesty's Government are also informed that the German Government have delivered to the Belgian Government a note proposing friendly neutrality entailing free passage through Belgian territory, and promising to maintain the independence and integrity of the Kingdom and its possessions at the conclusion of peace, threatening in case of refusal to treat Belgium as an enemy. An answer was requested within 12 hours.
>
> We also understand that Belgium has categorically refused this as a flagrant violation of the law of nations.
>
> His Majesty's Government are bound to protest against this violation of a treaty to which Germany is a party in common with themselves, and must request an assurance that the demand made upon Belgium will not be proceeded with and that her neutrality will be respected by Germany. You should ask for an immediate reply.

The British minister at Brussels telegraphed Sir Edward Grey, on August 4, as follows:

> German minister has this morning addressed note to minister for foreign affairs stating that as Belgian Government have declined the well-intentioned proposals submitted to them by the Imperial Government, the latter will, deeply to their regret, be compelled to carry out, if necessary by force of arms, the measures considered indispensable in view of the French menaces.

I quote further, No. 155, dated August 4, by telegram from Sir Edward Grey to the British minister at Brussels:

> You should inform the Belgian Government that if pressure is applied to them by Germany to induce them to depart from neutrality, His Majesty's Government expect that they will resist by any means in their power and that His Majesty's Government will support them in offering such resistance, that His Majesty's Government in this event are prepared to join Russia and France, if desired, in offering to the Belgian Government at once common action for the purpose of resisting use of force by Germany against them, and a guaranty to maintain their independence and integrity in future years.

No. 156, on the same date, from Grey to Goschen:

I continue to receive numerous complaints from British firms as to the detention of their ships at Hamburg, Cuxhaven, and other German ports. This action on the part of the German authorities is totally unjustifiable. It is in direct contravention of international law and of the assurance given to your excellency by the imperial chancellor. You should demand the immediate release of all British ships, if such release has not yet been given.

I will read only a brief extract from the report, designated as "No. 160," dated August 8, by the British minister in Germany to Sir Edward Grey, after the British minister had taken his passports and returned to England. He gives an account of the events taking place in Germany during the few days immediately preceding and on the same day that the invasion of Belgium by German troops occurred:

Herr von Jagow at once replied that he was very sorry to say that his answer must be "No."

That is as to the guaranty to respect the integrity of Belgium—

as, in consequence of the German troops having crossed the frontier that morning, Belgian neutrality had been already violated.

This is the statement of the German Secretary of State to the British ambassador on August 4. Proceeding further, Sir Edward Goschen says:

I again proceeded to the imperial foreign office and informed the secretary of state that unless the Imperial Government could give the assurance by 12 o'clock that night that they would proceed no further with their violation of the Belgian frontier and stop their advance I had been instructed to demand my passports and inform the Imperial Government that His Majesty's Government would have to take all steps in their power to uphold the neutrality of Belgium and the observance of a treaty to which Germany was as much a party as themselves.

Furthermore, in the same letter he says:

I protested strongly against that statement, and said that in the same way as he and Herr von Jagow—

The "he" to whom he was referring was the German Chancellor, von Bethmann-Hollweg—wished me to understand that for strategical reasons it was a matter of life and death to Germany to advance through Belgium and violate the latter's neutrality, so I would wish him to understand that it was, so to speak, a matter of "life and death" for the honor of Great Britain that she should keep her solemn engagement and do her utmost to defend Belgium's neutrality if attacked.

There is one other brief statement to which I desire to call attention. On August 5 Count de Lalaing, the Belgian minister at London, telegraphed M. Devignon, the Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs, in Brussels:

Germany having rejected the British proposals—

Those were the proposals as regards Belgium which I have just read—

Great Britain has informed her that a state of war existed between the two countries as from 11 o'clock.

So, Mr. President, while the Senator from Idaho says that Great Britain declared war against Germany 24 hours before Belgian territory was invaded, these official documents show, by the admission of all parties, that while Belgium was invaded early in the morning of the 4th, a state of war was not declared between Great Britain and Germany until the 5th, stating that war actually existed from 11 o'clock on the night of the 4th. So the whole argument made by the Senator from Idaho against the pending treaty, when he compares it with the triple entente and says that the triple entente drew England into the war instead of preserving peace, falls to the ground. The foundation upon which his argument is based is found to be merely imaginary; the alleged facts upon which he builds up this magnificent edifice of attack upon the treaty are found to have no existence.

But, Mr. President, suppose it were true that such an agreement or "diplomatic group" among nations as the triple entente did have the effect of bringing Great Britain to the assistance of France when Germany, after 40 years of preparation, launched her mighty military machine against her, and, as we believe, against the civilization of the world if she had succeeded in overrunning France! Was it an evil, was it to be deplored that there was in existence an agreement which had the effect of bringing the British Empire to the rescue of civilization? I fail to see it; I fail to understand how such a conclusion may be reached, even if the assumption of the Senator from Idaho in the eloquent attack which he made upon this treaty, which was based almost wholly upon that assumption, had been well founded.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator from Idaho does not need any defense at my hands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; he does not need any defense from me, because I am not attacking the Senator from Idaho. I am referring to matters in issue here in the Senate which he raised.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator from Washington, though, misconceive the position taken by the Senator from Idaho? The position of the Senator from Idaho has been and still is, if I correctly interpret it, that whenever an alliance is formed, such as the triple alliance, it will necessarily provoke a counteralliance, and that if there was an alliance anterior to the triple alliance, that alliance provoked the triple alliance; and so, if we entered into an alliance—I am not declaring that we did, but assume that we did in this four-power treaty—the position of the Senator from Idaho was that such an alliance would provoke a counteralliance, and that instead of emancipating nations from the conditions of the past and freeing them from the balance-of-power theory and the alliance theory this treaty tends in the direction of the past and will provoke a situation that will result in counteralliances to the disadvantage of the United States and the world.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; that is true; but that does not meet at all the point which I was making. That is the reason that the Senator from Idaho gave for his opposition, but the argument remains the same as it was before, that because it was the adoption of the policy of a balance of power it would lead to the creation of another alliance and tend toward armament and toward armed conflict.

The Senator from Idaho and other Senators who have taken the same position that he does were among the most formidable opponents of the League of Nations; and the grounds upon which those Senators based their objections were that it amounted to a world-wide alliance, and involved the United States in commitments and entanglements with every nation in the world. So, to accept the interpretation which is suggested by the Senator from Utah of his argument against the pending treaty, it seems strange to see the same Senators—not only the Senator from Idaho, but others—who assisted so much in a successful fight for the independence of their country against the world-wide alliance that was contained in the League of Nations—now proposing here to substitute for this simple, limited, and practical agreement between the powers of the Pacific Ocean to respect each other's rights—another League of Nations—to hear them argue that this treaty should be defeated because it does not go further and extend and impose upon us those same obligations and incur those same commitments—which they so much deplored in the League of Nations—to the mainland of Asia and Europe, to China, to Russia, and to Germany. I repeat what I said before: The fact that it does not do that, that it does not involve the United States in the controversies of the rest of the world, constitutes its chief distinguishing characteristic from the League of Nations and one of its greatest merits.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington, in the midst of his very able address, complained of the suspicion with which the four-power pact is regarded. He spoke of these suspicions as not being well founded and compared them to apparitions.

Mr. President, who is to blame if this four-power pact has excited suspicion—a suspicion whose ripples are widening every day? The Senate, after weeks of delay, adopted a resolution requesting the President to call in the three great naval powers to consult with us on the question of limiting naval armaments, and thereby tremendous naval expenditures. Without any suggestion from the Senate there was added to this program that of making what the Senator himself compares to a promissory note with indorsers on it, that which their leading debater, reading a carefully prepared speech, said, time after time, was an association of nations.

Mr. President, when the Senate confines itself to a request looking toward the limitation of naval armaments, and afterwards it is decided, for some reason not stated to the Senate or to the country, to bring into that conference the nation which has the largest standing army that ever did stand upon the earth, naturally people began to wonder why the name of France was added to those of England, Japan, and the United States.

A great deal of publicity was given to the opening of the conference, when, as the country understood and the Senate understood, the purpose was to discuss the naval holiday and the agreement on the relative proportion of navies. Who heard one word about a four-power pact? We could hear about all the other treaties. What did we hear about this? Nothing at all.

The hammers that drove the nails were muffled. The builders who built it built it as silently as those who built the ice palace of the Russian Empress Ann upon the Neva. "Silently as a dream the fabric rose. No sound of hammer or of saw was there. * * * Intrinsically precious, it was to the feet treacherous and false. It smiled, and it was cold."

Why was this greatest of all these pacts built in secrecy and silence? Did not the American people have some right to know what was going on? Did not the Senate have some right to know? Did not the public press have some right to know? Nobody knew, until it was suddenly brought forth here one day, and then the whole world knew.

What followed? It soon appeared that those from whom we had a right to expect information either could not, or would not, give it to us. Not only that, such mistakes were made when they did speak that it soon became a matter of ridicule in the newspapers not only by the editors but by the correspondents.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on yesterday became indignant as he spoke of "continual implications." Whose fault is it if we are not given the facts? We asked, "By what avenues of approach did you reach this agreement to lay aside the Anglo-Japanese alliance and take this as a substitute? Who made the first suggestion? What reply was made to that suggestion? What proposal and counterproposal, what tentative agreement, ripened into the final agreement? What reasons were advanced pro and con? What understandings were expressed as to its meanings?"

We are left without information. One could almost say that here we have what Cowper wished for—

> A lodge in some vast wilderness,
> Some boundless contiguity of shade.

He is in the wilderness and very much lost there. He is surrounded by shade. He does not stand in the light as he did when he was standing shoulder to shoulder with those who fought the League of Nations.

In an editorial in the New York World of last Sunday there is a general discussion of the lack of information prevailing as to this treaty. I read:

> This applies to President Harding and Mr. Hughes no less than to Messrs. LODGE and UNDERWOOD. Not one of them has given the Senate a lead, not one of them but has dodged the real issues or showed that he did not know what they are. They have all answered eloquently the footless objections about who wrote the treaty and whether it abolishes the Constitution of the United States and why it was not on the agenda, and the rest. But on the test question of whether this is a four-power defensive alliance against a fifth power they have said nothing that sheds any light.

In a previous part of the editorial attention is called to the fact that neither the Senator from Massachusetts nor the Senator from Alabama appears to know the location of the island of Sakhalin with reference to the mainland of Russia. Attention is called in this editorial to the fact that when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] asked the Senator from Alabama what was the distance between the mainland of Russia and the island of Sakhalin, the Senator from Alabama answered that he did not know exactly, but that if the Senator from Missouri wanted a guess, he would say several hundred miles.

As the editor states in this article, and as I remember Senator REED stated, the distance is only a few miles, and in the wintertime—and most of the year is wintertime there—ice bridges the island and the mainland, and anyone can pass from the one to the other on foot.

In the People's Forum appears a letter from a gentleman who does not sign his name, but who lives at West Hoboken, in which he calls attention to what he says are my "perversions of history." I am sorry he did not give his name, because I would like to have him state what they are; he does not state them here. He said that Senator LODGE told the Senate that Sakhalin is an island off Vladivostok, and the writer goes on to say that instead of being off the mainland at Vladivostok, and therefore very near the city, it is six or eight hundred miles away.

That is the kind of impression being made on the country at large, that those whom we deputized to make the treaty did not understand the fundamentals of geography.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that that is usual in all parlimentary bodies. It was Lord Salisbury who first suggested the use of large scale maps to show distances.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I gladly accept that luminous contribution to the debate.

Mr. President, I received a letter the other day from Mr. Theo. H. Lunde, whom I do not know, but who lives in Chicago. It is so very interesting that I will state the substance of it. He called attention to the fact that England is given permission to fortify Singapore, and that Singapore was accepted as a Pacific port. Here is the map, which shows that Singapore is not a Pacific port at all. It is situated at the end of the Malay Peninsula, on the China Sea, and the commerce of one-third of the human race passes through that port of transit. Near to Singapore is 90 per cent of all the visible tin in the world, a fact which certainly ought to be interesting to the canning interests of this country, and to other manufacturers in whose products tin is an important element. There are also enormous supplies of rubber near there, a fact which should interest those manufacturers in this country who have to use rubber as a raw material in the manufacture of their products.

Mr. President, I would like to dwell for a moment on this astonishing proposition, that because of the perils to us in the Anglo-Japanese alliance we must go into this shoreless, uncharted sea of the four-power alliance. Do Senators want to go to the extent of saying that they believe England meant to make an attack upon us in the Pacific, if we did not go into this four-power alliance? The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] certainly argued to that effect, and I understood one or two other Senators to take the same line. Yet they do not seem to realize that that would be the most frightful indictment which could be drawn against the governing powers in Great Britain.

Would Great Britain attack us when she still owes us, in round numbers, $6,000,000,000 and will not pay us even the interest on it? Would she finance her war against us with our own money? That is what it would mean. She collected like a Shylock the last dollar due to her for the transport of our soldier boys, who were her salvation; and then, having collected that debt for bringing her rescuers across the ocean, would she make war upon us with our money? That is an amazing accusation to bring against our late ally, but that accusation was first brought here by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, and it is in the RECORD. The collection of passenger fare for those soldiers who were speeding across the Atlantic to save England in her hour of peril was one of the most monstrous things that ever was known to history.

I wonder who paid the transportation when England hired the Hessians to come over here and fight our forefathers? I wonder if that little Kingdom of Germany had to pay Great Britain for the transportation of those Hessian soldiers who came over here to fight for Great Britain? A million Hindus went to Europe to fight for England in the Great War. I wonder who paid the freight? I wonder who bought the tickets? I wonder who bore the expense of the transportation? Now we see what England is doing to India as a return. If she would do to Arabia what she has done, after the Arabs helped her win the campaign which gave her Judea, Syria, and Mesopotamia, she would be capable of attacking us, if she thought she could win. England is now attacking her allies, without whose help she would have been crushed; and Japan is doing the same thing.

Who wrote this treaty? Whose brain conceived it? Whose will power put it through? I am confident that Elihu Root is the man who engineered the whole thing. Who is Elihu Root? In Harper's Weekly for January 3, 1914, I find an editorial paragraph with a heading, "Elihu," which reads as follows:

> ELIHU.
>
> The original Elihu was one of "Job's comforters," to whom Job made the remark, often quoted since: "No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you." It was after Elihu's long and able address, extending over six chapters, that the Lord inquired: "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?" But this was Elihu, the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram.
> Senator Elihu Root, in a long and able address, prophesied such an inflation of the currency through the Glass-Owen Act as would weaken the confidence of European nations in our financial system.

That was before they got our $25,000,000,000, which they will not pay back, and do not intend to pay. The article continues:

> He referred to railroad securities in particular, mentioning the passing of the New Haven dividend. He might have mentioned the shock to American credit, especially in France, from the recent Frisco fiasco. Senator Root might also have mentioned the destruction of confidence in the former street railway system in New York City, through another kind of inflation by the Whitney-Ryan interests, ably engineered by Senator Root himself, as their attorney. The Senator was wise not to have any illusions about the Presidency. The attorney of Ryan, Whitney, and of guilty New York aldermen and bosses will have enough to explain, if he attempts to retain his Senatorship in a popular election. The Senator's vigorous opposition to the constitutional amendment prescribing a popular election had a commendable degree of foresight.

In that connection it is not irrelevant to mention that, when it was discovered that Elihu Root constructed the New York constitution, which was being offered to the people for ratification, they refused to ratify it by 500,000, instinctively suspicious of Elihu Root.

In the New York World of March 12, 1900, I find an article headlined as follows:

Kilburn says Root arranged Office Boy Shea's $2,000,000 loan. Startling disclosures in official report on State trust scandal. Law clearly violated. Several large loans designated as either illegal or questionable. Several had no collateral. Lame excuses made for criminally loose methods and suppression of facts. Kilburn reflects Andrews's report.

Now I read briefly from the article:

"The Shea loan was arranged for by Elihu Root, a director and a member of the executive committee of the trust company and also its counsel. * * *

"Beyond all question this loan was illegal because excessive and because, in part, it was made indirectly to directors of the trust company. * * *

"So far as the company is concerned I am confident that the action taken by me meets every requirement of public interests. * * *

"If the individuals merit severer treatment, the courts are open and public officials may be called upon to take cognizance of illegal acts."

That is a quotation from the report on State Trust Co. made by Superintendent of Banking Frederick D. Kilburn to Governor Roosevelt.

In other words, the ranking member of this conference which arranged, in secrecy and silence, this four-power pact, against which only one great chain of newspapers has opened batteries—namely, the Hearst papers—is the man who, according to this official report, broke a bank and broke the law in doing so. He not only was able to keep other lawbreakers from punishment due to their crimes but he kept himself out also.

I read from the Pacific Fisherman, a publication at Seattle, Wash., of November, 1909, volume 8, page 12:

PROFITABLE PACKING WITHOUT FISH.

In the Senate of the United States a bill has been pending ever since 1905 which, if passed, will give the Wales Island Packing Co. (Alaska) the sum of at least $81,000 for an abandoned salmon packing shed—abandoned in 1903 on Wales Island, southeast Alaska. This bill has been repeatedly brought up in the Senate, but Senator OVERMAN has stood against it with a handful of hard facts to throw into the RECORD that declares this bill to be nothing less than robbery and most improper in its claim.

Further on, it is stated that Elihu Root was warmly urging the passage of the bill.

In the Pacific Fisherman, already mentioned, Seattle, Wash., August, 1909, will be found a full account of the depredation of the seal rookeries, and there again Elihu Root appears as chief engineer.

It will be remembered that Charles Edward Russell, who is occasionally a Socialist, went with Elihu Root to Russia. The Russian armies had been withdrawn, temporarily, from the combat. Soon after Mr. Root arrived and had a conference with Kerensky those armies were put back into the conflict; and that was the main cause of the second revolution, which put Kerensky out and put Lenin in. Upon his return Mr. Root was given "the valor medal," supposed to be deserved by those who had shown some active heroism on the battle field. All Mr. Root had done, so far as the public knew, was to go into Russia and to come out again. Can it be possible that he carried a bribe to Russia and influenced a change in her military policy? There is more than the insinuation to that effect, in these articles which appeared in the Washington Times, wherein Kerensky is pictured with a pocket full of money and Root is pictured as standing beside him, looking as wise as usual, wiser than any man could actually be.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KING. There are some things about Mr. Root that some of us do not like. I do not like his politics and many of his political policies. But, if the Senator will pardon me, and I hope I am not trespassing upon his time, I have sometimes felt that an injustice was done those with whom I did not agree and whose views to me were exceedingly obnoxious, and have occasionally ventured to interpose a word of defense.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I did not yield for a speech or for a defense. The Senator can take his own time to make that. I yielded for a question.

Mr. KING. It is not a question; it was rather an explanation of the purpose of Mr. Root's visit to Russia at a time that was important for the welfare of our own country. I feel that his work there entitled him to the thanks of the American people. However, I will not trespass upon the Senator's time.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. For what service was he given the valor medal?

Mr. KING. I am not sure that he was given that. I had not heard of it. I do not know that a valor medal was given him, but if it were I presume it was because he went there to represent this Nation, holding authority from the President of the United States, and for the purpose of expressing, as he did express in eloquent terms, the confidence of the American people in the Russian people, and also for the purpose of urging the Russian Government, whether it was represented by Kerensky or by some other person, to continue the war and to not desert her allies.

I would regard, and I think the Senator would, the departure of any of the allied nations from the fight at that time as an act more or less perfidious. Russia was giving evidence of abandoning the fight under the disintegrating influence of some of the socialists. After expressing the confidence of the American people in the Russian people and the gratification of the American people in the fact that a Russian republic had been organized, I have no doubt Mr. Root urged the Kerensky government to continue in the war. I think he should have urged that course, and, in my opinion, the Russian people should have continued in the fight, loyal to their country and to the common cause of the allied and associated powers.

I shall not trespass further on the Senator's time.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If we so loved the Russian people, why did we blockade their coast and make war upon them and bring upon them the first sufferings of starvation? You can not blockade a government. You can blockade a people, and that is what we did to Russia. We did it without any more provocation than that Russia claimed what has always been the American principle, that the will of the people must decide their form of government. That form of government has lasted now four years, and we will not recognize it.

Here is my authority for having said that a valor medal was given to Mr. Elihu Root, who, by the way, was not officially the person to negotiate with Russia on any subject whatever:

[Washington Post, Monday, August 13, 1917.]

VALOR MEDAL FOR ROOT—NATIONAL ARTS CLUB WILL HONOR HEAD OF MISSION TO RUSSIA.

Elihu Root, head of the American mission to Russia, is to receive the first valor medal of the National Arts Club.

Primarily the medals are to be presented as a reward for unusual heroism in the military or naval service of the United States.

[Washington Star, August 12.]

Its first valor medal to be given Elihu Root.

The text following is substantially the same as that in the Washington Post. If the Senator from Utah has some information that those statements were incorrect, I will very gladly let him state it now.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean with regard to the valor medal?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KING. I have no information one way or the other in regard to that, and that to me is wholly unimportant.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator questioned the accuracy of my statement.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not mean to question the accuracy of his statement.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not say that the Senator meant to question my word at all. He thought I was misinformed.

Mr. KING. I merely meant to state that I had not heard that Mr. Root received the valor medal.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I was in hopes that the Senator from Utah, whom I so much esteem, would keep an open mind on this matter of Elihu Root until I advanced a little further in my address.

Elihu Root is arraigned now for having been the principal author of the misfortunes of Korea, which misfortunes led to the persecution by Japan of the churches of Christ in that country. That country has been converted to Christianity. She had thousands of churches, thousands of schoolhouses, 9,000,000 converts. They have been subjected to massacre and torture, and Christ is being again crucified in their persons by the Japanese, and it was Elihu Root who made it possible for that dreadful consummation to come about.

Mr. President, in the very declaration of war which Japan made against Russia there was a clause guaranteeing the integrity and independence of Korea. Partly because of that, Korea became the ally of Japan and gave her the base for land operations, without which she could not have successfully waged the war. As I stated the other day, she gave Japan also the use of her railroads and telegraphs, indispensable to the conduct of the war.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator is now talking about a subject on which I think I agree with him. I agree that our conduct and the conduct of our Government, which involves the conduct of Mr. Root, in dealing with the Korean question at the time of the destruction of that Government may not be defended in morals nor upon the highest principles of international law.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It would have been impossible for Japan to have gained possession of Korea at that time, no matter what she might have done later, had it not been for the connivance of Mr. Elihu Root, our Secretary of State.

I will read the first article of our treaty of peace and commerce with Korea, made in May, 1882:

There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between the President of the United States and the King of Korea and the citizens and subjects of their respective Governments. If other powers deal unjustly or oppressively with either Government, the other will exert its good offices on being informed of the case to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their friendly feeling.

After the war had been won by Japan with the help of Korea she was tempted by the military weakness of Korea and the fact that she herself was in physical possession to abuse that possession and to perpetuate it. To do this she exerted all her powers of intimidation over the Korean prime minister. As I described the other day, he was taken into a private room, the door closed, a sword drawn upon him, and his life threatened. He refused to yield to these threats. He was left in the room under guard, and this same Japanese minister went to the Emperor, who naturally believed that his minister had been murdered, and who naturally feared the same fate, and he signed under duress the paper which the Japanese demanded the minister should sign.

An American, Mr. Hulbert, had been the adviser of the Emperor for many, many years—30, as I remember. This adviser counseled with the Emperor, telling him to appeal by letter to the Government of the United States.

The Emperor of Korea wrote a touching letter, which is so unusual in its character and of so much interest, if not of importance, that I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have it incorporated in the RECORD, in 8-point type, as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

"Ever since 1882 the United States and Korea have been in friendly treaty relations. Korea has received many proofs of the good will and sympathy of the American Government and people. The American representatives have always shown themselves to be in sympathy with the welfare and progress of Korea. Many teachers have been sent from America, who have done much for the uplift of the people.

"It is now apparent that Japan proposes to abrogate their part of this treaty and declare a protectorate over our country in direct contravention of their sworn promise in the agreement of 1904.

"It has been said that sentiment should have no claim in such affairs; but we believe, sir, that sentiment is the moving force in all affairs and that kindness, sympathy, and generosity are still working between nations as between individuals. We beg of you to bring to bear upon this question the same breadth of mind and the same calmness of judgment that has characterized your course hitherto, and having weighed the matter, to render us what aid you can consistently in this our time of national danger."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. In effect and in substance, the Emperor of Korea appealed to our Government to stand by that treaty to which our faith was solemnly pledged. Mr. Hulbert was given the letter and commissioned to present it in person to our State Department, at whose head was Elihu Root. Mr. Hulbert crossed the ocean and was on his way to Washington City, having reached Cincinnati, when this act of intimidation was practiced upon the Emperor of Korea by the Japanese, who did not dare to allow Mr. Hulbert to come here and present the case. No doubt after they had compelled the Emperor of Korea to sign that concession they cabled the fact to Mr. Elihu Root. Mr. Hulbert was within one day of reaching his destination, but he was cut off by a cable no doubt, for when he reached Washington the next day and knocked at the door of the State Department it did not open. Mr. Root was too busy to see him; the next day, and the next, he was also too busy to see him; but after the Emperor of Korea had been forced to sign that concession to Japan, and the crime had been committed, then Japan was willing for Mr. Root to receive Mr. Hulbert. However, Mr. Hulbert was told by Mr. Root that the protest came too late for serious consideration. The Emperor of Korea by some means managed to get a cable message to our State Department, and Mr. Robert Bacon—one of the partners of J. P. Morgan & Co., one of the main instruments of the money power, one of the main instruments in the framing of the deflation policy which has very nearly ruined our country—Mr. Robert Bacon told him, graciously, that he would file it in the archives of the department. I suppose it was filed there.

Then Japan carried out her designs, the first step of which was this: The Anglo-Japanese alliance pledged those two nations to respect the integrity and independence of Korea, but Japan prevailed upon Great Britain, after the close of the Russo-Japanese War, to recede from that pact and to substitute for it a clause in the treaty which virtually said to Japan, "Go ahead in Korea, provided that you do not exclude British commerce; with that exception, keeping the door open for our manufacturers and our financiers, wreak your will upon Korea, in spite of our plighted faith."

That is the ally we are to trust; that is the ally in whom we are asked to place confidence; that is the ally for whom we are to scrap the Monroe doctrine; that is the ally for whom we are to spurn the advice of George Washington.

But the worst of it was the Japanese got the consent, apparently, of Mr. Root to scrap the treaty of 1882, by which our national honor was pledged to at least use our friendly intervention for the protection of the Koreans.

What has been the effect of all this series of crimes? We are told in the book I hold in my hand, which is entitled "The Case of Korea," by Henry Chung, which is published by the Fleming H. Revell Co., and which is full of information which seems to be trustworthy. I should like, Mr. President, if the Senate will give me permission to print several paragraphs showing how Christian churches have been burned and the congregations burned with the churches. Nero never did anything worse against the Christians, and yet Nero's name is anathema maranatha to every Christian, as it has been ever since he set fire to Rome, ascribed the deed to the Christians, and thus provoked the first persecution that Rome knew in which martyrs shed their blood. The Japanese are doing in Korea right now worse things than Nero did in Rome. The Christian world does not know it; the papers will not tell them; the magazines will not tell them. Only those who can come to the Senate galleries, or who can read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or who read the Hearst newspapers, know anything about it. When the people of this country learn that the Japanese right now are burning schoolhouses and burning churches and burning Christian congregations and committing massacres as atrocious as ever were committed in the history of mankind, there will be flames of indignation that will run from sea to sea.

Mr. President, I now ask that the paragraphs to which I refer may be inserted in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"The Christianity of Korea is predominantly Protestant. Just before Japan began its policy of destroying the churches and schools there were 3,164 Christian churches, with 6,690 ministers. The Buddhists had 258 places of worship, with 313 priests, and the Japanese maintained 65 Shinto places in which to worship the picture of the Mikado. The Christian missionary field in Korea is highly developed and is more or less self-supporting, reaching out into activities that are carried on by the citizen adherents. The Presbyterians have 21 mission centers all told, with full complements of churches, schools, hospitals, etc. The Methodists have 8 and the Catholics have from 20 to 30. The Chuntokyo or 'Heaven worshippers' have a numerical strength about equal to that of the Buddhists, though they are not mentioned in Japanese statistics.

PERSECUTION OF THE CHURCH.

"A Canadian missionery, in a report to his home board, on April 25, 1919, writes:

"'They have questioned all prisoners particularly whether the missionaries led the uprising. Thank God, so far our people have had the strength through torture to tell the truth. In our town over 1,000 Koreans are in prison. Many are Christians, who are beaten and tortured in an endeavor to make them say that the missionaries led them into asking for independence. Women are kicked and beaten to make them tell where their husbands and sons are. A woman was brought in here yesterday, her body horribly mutilated, stamped on by spurred boots. Just the other day seven were beaten to death.'

"A lady missionary at another place wrote to the Rev. Mr. Armstrong, the assistant secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions of Canada:

"'A number of churches are being burned. One, where the Christians were called together by the authorities, was surrounded by soldiers, who fired among them and shot many of them; some tried to escape, only to meet the bayonet. The building was set on fire and the survivors burned to death, 31 in all. It is worse than the Hun and a holocaust that can not be beaten by the Turk. Torture in the prison is the order of the day. Many die under the stripes they receive. It is a reign of terror, with the Christians as marked men. Many a lash the poor Korean Christians in jail here receive, especially when they try to force them to say that the missionaries urged the Koreans in their call for independence. Schools are closed; our churches are still open, though they are closed and being burned in other places. March 4, with the first cry of "Mansei," my husband rushed down town. He was gone about an hour. He came back crying aloud, "My God! Such a sight! Japanese coolies out with fire hooks and clubs tearing and rending the poor, unarmed Koreans to bits!" He met my Bible woman's husband, dragged along by two coolies, his head gashed open and one leg dragging limp.'

"An exhaustive description of Christian persecutions by the Japanese in Korea during the year 1919 would fill a volume. The following extract, taken from the annual report (1918–19) of the American Presbyterian mission station at Pyeng Yang, is typical of the conditions of the church in its relation with the independence movement. From the description of the plight of this one district the reader may form an idea of the fate of other Christian communities all over Korea.

"To sum up what has been committed against the church in the Pyeng Yang territory by the police, gendarmes, and soldiers in line with the statements made above we give the following:

"1. They have arrested many of the leaders of the churches, including pastors, helpers, and school-teachers. Many of the rest have fled for safety, for the church leaders seem to have been singled out for punishment and persecution regardless of guilt or innocence.

"2. They have seriously damaged 19 church buildings and broken the bells in others.

"3. They have expropriated the property of at least one church for other purposes without asking for or receiving permission to use the same.

"4. Twenty-six churches have been forced to close for periods up to three months and more.

"5. Many church schools have been forced to close in both city and country, because of the arrest of teachers, for periods up to three months and more.

"6. Helpers, pastors, and Bible women have been ordered to stop preaching in many places.

"7. Christian literature has been seized and destroyed in many places.

"8. The police have ordered the non-Christians to drive the Christians out of their homes in several places.

"9. All the students in the Union Christian College and the Boys' Academy in Pyeng Yang were ordered arrested by the chief of police whether guilty of any offense or not.

"10. Christians have been discriminated against in many ways, of which the following are typical:

"(a) In the special severity shown Christians in connection with the spring 'clean up.'

"(b) In the frequency and severity of beatings administered by police in the performance of their official duties.

"(c) In the special effort to arrest and punish the leaders of the churches on the ground that they were per se leaders, too, in the independence movement.

"11. Christian women in the country have been terrorized by police, gendarmes, and soldiers.

"12. The pastor of the Congregational Church for Koreans (under Japanese control), Mr. Takahashi, has visited certain of our churches and, assisted by police, has forced Christians to gather and listen to addresses intended to alienate them from the missionaries and their present church connection, and attempted to proselyte for his church. This was done with the knowledge and assistance of petty government officials.

"The Rev. Edward W. Thwing, formerly of Boston, the secretary of the International Reform Bureau at Peking, China, was in Pyeng Yang, Korea, during March. After his return to Peking he issued a signed statement, which follows:

"'PEKING, CHINA, April 3, 1919.

"'In a remarkable manner the Korean independence movement has manifested skill, courage, and organization that has been a great surprise to many. It has shown more than ever before how unreasonable, without justice, cruel, and brutal the military rule of Japan is in this land. I could hardly believe these things if I had not seen them with my own eyes.

"'The police and soldiers have arrested old men and little children and cruelly beaten them. Little girls of only 10 years of age, women, and schoolgirls have been shamefully treated and subjected to physical punishment and torture for no other crime than shouting with peaceful enthusiasm for their own country and crying out for the independence which Japan had guaranteed by solemn treaties.

"'These things have been witnessed not by one or two, but by scores of missionaries and others in many parts of Korea during March. If the world could only know these things it would certainly heed this cry of distress from an oppressed people. But the Japanese are doing all they can to keep the world from knowing the truth. A report has just come that in one city, from which letters have been sent, they are making it very hard for the missionaries, even hinting at deportation, unless they stop telling out the truth.

"'The following are some of the things that I have actually seen with my own eyes:

"'Small schoolboys knocked down and cruelly beaten by Japanese soldiers. This was not a question of arresting them, but savage, unjustifiable barbarism.

"'Soldiers stop and deliberately fire into a crowd composed only of girls and women who were simply shouting "Mansei."

"'A small boy of 10 years shot through the back.

"'An unresisting old man of 65 years pounded, kicked, and beaten by several Japanese soldiers until he could not walk.

"'A crowd of about 20 schoolgirls, who were quietly walking along the public road, not even shouting, chased by soldiers, beaten with guns, knocked down, and so shamefully treated that it made one's blood boil.

"'Japanese firemen chasing boys and girls with long iron hooks, trying to catch them with them.

"'A Korean in a hospital, paralyzed, with his head crushed in with one of these hooks.

"'A man dying, shot through the back.

"'One hundred men, with torn and bloody clothes, tied together with ropes, taken to jail.

"'Two Koreans, so injured that they could not walk, tied down on a springless cart and brought to jail.

"'Men standing by, having no connection with the demonstration, and yet knocked about and attacked by soldiers, who will attack anyone, without regard to what they are doing.

"'An American missionary roughly arrested while standing in his own yard and looking on, but doing nothing else.

"'Women knocked down with guns and kicked into the ditch.

"'These and many other things I have seen with my own eyes. Other foreigners have seen the same and worse. One can little imagine the reign of terrior in all parts of this land at the very time when the Japanese peace delegates are talking of "humanity and justice and equality of races." They don't know the meaning of these words. And the punishments and tortures at the police stations and jails make a still more awful story. I have seen men who were beaten on wooden crosses by the Japanese.

"'And why is all this cruel punishment given? Not for rioting or for resisting arrest. I have not seen one case of this; not for carrying dangerous weapons; they have none; but just for shouting out the desire of their hearts for the independence of their country.'

MASSACRES.

"What has been set forth in the preceding chapter relates largely to methods pursued by the Japanese in cities under the observation of foreigners. In country districts, where there were no foreigners to chronicle the events, villages were wiped out and wholesale massacres took place. What little observations made by foreigners in the remote districts were a small percentage of the burnings and massacres which took place all over Korea. In a signed statement forwarded to the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America an American resident describes a massacre in northern Korea, at Maungsan, as follows:

"'During the first part of March, after the people at this place had shouted for independence, 56 people were asked by the gendarmes to come to the gendarme station, which they did. When they were all inside the gendarmerie compound the gates were closed, gendarmes climbed up on the wall and shot all the people down. Then they went in among them and bayoneted all who still lived. Of the 56, 53 were killed and 3 were able later to crawl out of the heap of dead. Whether they lived or not is not known.'

"Mr. William R. Giles, whom I quoted in the preceding chapter, in a statement issued at Peking June 14, 1919, after his visit to Korea, declares:

"'In a valley in southern Korea, about 50 miles from Fusan, the Japanese soldiery closed up a horseshoe-shaped valley surrounded by high hills and then shot down the villagers who attempted to escape by climbing the steep slopes. More than 100 persons were killed in this affray. * * *

"'The people are like sheep driven to a slaughterhouse. Only an independent investigation can make the world understand Korea's true position. At present the groanings and sufferings of 20,000,000 people are apparently falling on deaf ears.'

"In central Korea, near Suwon district, about 30 miles from Seoul, 15 villages were completely wiped out of existence by the Japanese soldiers and gendarmes. Many foreigners in Seoul, including British and American consular officials, visited these devastated districts and made direct representations to the Governor General. 'It was impossible for any evidence to be brought forward to disprove their statement,' wrote an American in Seoul at that time. 'The fact that so many foreigners visited the scene of this useless burning and murdering has forced the Government to take steps which otherwise it would never have taken. They are fully aware that it is useless to deny, as they did in other cases, that these acts of inhuman brutality did not take place; the evidence is too strong against them.' The Governor General, after receiving reports from the foreigners who visited the burned districts, expressed his regret and added that the guilty would be punished, which would mean, as one westerner pointedly commented, 'very likely that the perpetrators would be promoted to higher posts.'

"Whether the soldiers, guilty of massacring the innocent people, were actually promoted to higher posts or honorably dismissed from the Japanese Army is not known. But it is a proved fact that they were never punished, and burnings and massacres continued, despite the assurance given by the Governor General at that time that such outrages would never occur again. The following description of three devastated villages in the Suwon district, given by an American who visited them, furnishes a vivid picture of what has been going on in the remote parts of Korea ever since March 1, 1919:

CHAI-AMM-NI.

"'On Thursday, April 17, news was brought to Seoul by a foreigner that a most terrible tragedy had occurred in a small village some 50 li (17 miles) south of Suwon. The story was that a number of Christians had been shut up in a church, then fired upon by the soldiers, and when all were either wounded or dead the church was set on fire, insuring their complete destruction. Such a story seemed almost too terrible to be true, and being of such a serious nature, I determined to verify it by a personal visit. On the following day I took the train to Suwon, and from there cycled to within a few miles of the village; knowing the strenuous objections that would be made to my visit, I made a detour of several miles over a mountain pass to avoid the police and gendarme station which I knew was near the village.

"'Before entering the village I questioned many people as to the reported burning of villages, but none had any accurate information, and all were very much afraid to speak about the affair. I finally met a boy who lived in the village where the massacre had occurred, but he absolutely refused to tell me anything. He protested his ignorance—terrorism was bearing its fruit—the people were almost paralyzed with fear.

"'Making a sharp turn in the road I came suddenly into the village, and to my surprise found a number of Government officials, military and civil, holding an investigation. After a conversation with some of these officials, I was allowed to further look over the village and take some photographs. From Koreans I could get practically no information—they appeared to be dazed and stupefied, especially the women, while the younger men pretended ignorance of any details.

"'The appearance of the village was one of absolute desolation; about 8 houses remained; the rest (31) with the church had all been burned to the ground. All that remained were the stone jars of pickles and other edibles; these stood in perfect order among the ruins. The people were scattered about sitting on mats, or straw; some had already improvised little shelters on the adjoining hillside, where they sat in silence looking down in bewilderment at the remains of their happy homes. They seemed bereft of speech; they were probably trying to fathom why this terrible judgment should overtake them, and why they should suddenly become widows and their children orphans. There they sat, helpless and forlorn, entirely overcome by the calamity that had overtaken them.

"'Before long the Government party left the village, and when the officers were well out of sight, the tongues of some of these poor frightened people loosened, and they revealed to me the story of the outrage, which follows:

"'On Thursday, April 15, early in the afternoon some soldiers had entered the village and had given orders that all adult male Christians and members of the Chuntokyo (Heavenly Way Society) were to assemble in the church, as a lecture was to be given. In all some 29 men went to the church as ordered and sat down wondering what was to happen. They soon found out the nature of the plot, as the soldiers immediately surrounded the church and fired into it through the paper windows. When most of the Koreans had been either killed or wounded, the Japanese soldiers cold-bloodedly set fire to the thatch and wooden building, which readily blazed. Some tried to make their escape by rushing out, but were immediately bayoneted or shot. Six bodies were found outside the church, having tried in vain to escape. Two women, whose husbands had been ordered to the church, being alarmed at the sound of firing, went to see what was happening to their husbands, and tried to get through the soldiers to the church. Both were brutally murdered. One was a young woman of 19—she was bayoneted to death; the other was a woman of over 40—she was shot. Both were Christians. The soldiers then set the village on fire and left.

"'This briefly is the story of the massacre of Chai-amm-ni. The blame for this can not be placed on the shoulders of the ignorant and boorish Japanese soldiers—officials higher up were cognizant of it, if not directly a party to the plot. It is impossible that the strict discipline which prevails in the Japanese Army would allow any private soldier or sergeant taking such responsibility upon his shoulders.

SU-CHON.

"'The hamlet of Su-chon is beautifully situated in a pretty valley some 4 or 5 miles from Chai-amm-ni, where the previously reported massacre occurred. But the hand of the despoiler had been there, and his fingerprints, black and brutal, lay heavily upon the landscape. The narrow streets were lined with ash heaps; out of 42 cottages 8 alone remained. Little attempt had been made to clear away the débris by the survivors, for they had no sense of security of life and property, and they apparently feared that any attempt to gather their things together would only bring fresh disasters. Some few old women were sitting by their few belongings—their grief had overcome them—and they were listless and indifferent. I could not help thinking that perhaps they were wishing that they had perished in the cruel flames that had swept away their homes and robbed them of all their earthly comfort. There were some little children picking herbs in the fields—they must have something to eat, and all their stocks of rice and other food had been destroyed. The police and soldiers being absent, the people flocked around me and seemed anxious to tell me of their misfortunes. They had recovered from the first shock, but were in constant fear lest the soldiers should come back again and destroy them in the same brutal way that they had destroyed their homes.

"'The following is the story of the destruction of the village:

"'On April 6, before daybreak, while all were sleeping, some soldiers had entered the village and had gone from house to house firing the thatched roofs, which quickly caught and destroyed the houses. The people rushed out and found the whole village blazing. Some tried to put out the fire, but were soon stopped by the soldiers, who shot at them, stabbed them with their bayonets, or beat them. They were compelled to stand by and watch their village burn to ashes. After completing this nefarious work, the soldiers left them to their fate. I was informed that only one man was killed, but that many were seriously injured. I inquired if the wind had spread the fire from house to house. The reply was that the village was on fire at several places at the same time, and that the soldiers carried matches and set fire to the thatch of many houses.

"'I could find no real reason for this useless burning down of a village and making a number of people homeless. By such acts Japan is hardening the hearts of Koreans against her. The people are now beginning to feel that the Japanese intend to kill them whether they are innocent of doing any wrong or not, and are arriving at the conclusion that if they have to die they may as well do so striving for the liberty of their country. They have to die anyway, so what is the good of their trying to live within the bounds of the law—such as it is—when it is impossible for them to obtain justice in any shape or form?

WHA-SU-RI.

"'Wha-su-ri must have been a picturesque village before the barbarous troops of His Majesty's Government transformed it into an ash heap. The village is surrounded by wooded hills, which slope toward the valley of fertile paddy fields. In the center of the village there had been a lovely 'country residence,' which had a tiled roof and gateway. Now it is nothing but a huge heap of broken tile, dirt, and brick. Some thought that the owner had fled, others said that he had been imprisoned, but no one really knew what had happened to the 'squire.'

Out of some forty-odd houses 18 remained. No wind had spread the fire; something more sure, more definite, more cruel—the hands of Japanese troops whose hearts must have been filled with murder. Apart from the definite statement of the people to this effect, there was the evidence of the burnt houses. In some places burnt and unburnt houses alternated. And the space between burnt and unburnt houses frequently was some distance. As usual, all that remained were the earthenware jars used by every Korean household to hold pickles and water. Groups of such pots and the charred ruins of the woodwork, the ashes, and débris were all that remained of the erstwhile happy homes. Nothing had been saved from the flames—this could not be allowed by the soldiers of Japan. The devastation must be complete. A blanket, a sack of rice, a bowl, or spoon could not be saved on pain of death, so one feels justified in characterizing the refugees as absolutely destitute. Many of the poor people, whose homes had been burnt down, had been welcomed by more fortunate neighbors, to share their comforts of bed, food, and fire, while others were living under little straw shelters.

"'The following is the story of the burning of the village:

"'On April 11, some time before daybreak, the villagers were suddenly aroused out of their sleep by the sound of firing and the smell of burning. Running into the open, they found soldiers and police firing the houses and shooting and beating the people. Leaving everything, they fled for their lives, old and young, the mothers with their babies at their breasts, and the fathers with the younger children—all of them fled to the hills. But before they could make good their escape, many were murdered, shot by the soldiers, wounded, and beaten, while a number were arrested and taken to jail.

"'It is not a long story, but one is made to pause and think and to visualize the scene. Think of its occurring to your own home, to your own village; picture the darkness, the shooting, the beating, the screams of the women and children, the flames, and then the firing of the soldiers on those trying to escape.'

"The Rev. Albertus Pieters, of Japan, in an article, 'The moral failure of Japan in Korea—Responsibility of the Japanese Government and Nation,' denounced the massacres as 'unprovoked, deliberate, cold-blooded murder, for which no sort of mitigation or excuse has been alleged.' 'This was not an act of war,' said the Rev. Mr. Pieters; 'no state of war exists in Korea, or could very well exist, as the people have been completely disarmed. Neither was it done by a few rowdy or intoxicated soldiers, who had gotten out of hand, but by an organized detachment acting under orders of their regular officers. There was no resistance or riot to be quelled at the time.' After stating that the Governor General and the officials under him could not escape the responsibility of the crime, the Rev. Mr. Pieters continues:

"'But is there no further responsibility beyond that of the Governor General? What about the moral responsibility of the Japanese people at large? With the deepest concern I have been waiting for the past month, as, I am sure, have many other friends of Japan, to see whether there might be moral feeling and moral courage enough in Japan to find expression in a public protest against this outrage. I have waited in vain. The Japanese residents in Korea outnumber the foreigners many times over, and among them are men of high education and prominent position. The facts were as accessible to them as to the foreigners, but it was left to the latter to wait upon the Governor General and protest again at this crime. Why was there no delegation of prominent Japanese doing the same thing?

"'Tokyo is the nerve center of the Empire, the home of meetings and demonstrations of every kind. I looked and hoped for some expression of indignation from the Japanese people originating there, but nothing happened; no indignation meeting, no burning protests in the press, no denunciation by any political party, no evidence of any kind of concern for the welfare of the Koreans, for the maintenance of righteousness, or for the honor of the Empire. I am reminded forcibly of what a friend said to me at the time of the "conspiracy case": "The trouble with the Japanese is that they lack the capacity for moral indigation at wrongs done to others." It really seems so. The "capacity for moral indignation" is lacking, and hence it is a matter of no concern to the Japanese that unarmed Koreans are shot, bayoneted, and burned by men in the uniform of the Empire.'"

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. By the Yap treaty and by the pending treaty, we become tenants by sufferance in the great Pacific, and our landlords will be Great Britain and Japan.

We have been told here, again and again, that there was a Christian spirit in this treaty. A Christian spirit! With Japan's hand crimsoned with the lifeblood of thousands of Christian converts in Korea, how could any man allude to this compact as being inspired with the soul of Christ?

We have been told that this compact means peace. Why, then, do you vote down the amendments that would say that in plain terms? They are all voted down. Why leave any doubt?

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] said this morning that there would have to be a unanimous vote before any measures could be taken to repel the aggressions of a fifth power against one of the four parties to the treaty. Why, then, is it not so provided in the compact? In the covenant of the League of Nations it was stated that each nation would have so many votes; the voting power of each was arranged with great care; the manner in which questions should be decided was specified; nothing was left in doubt. The proponents of this treaty say that the measures to be taken to repel aggression do not mean war. Then why should they not have specified what they meant, if not war? If they mean arbitration, why did they not establish a tribunal which would pass upon the case? If the aggression was to be repelled by economic boycott, why was not that stated? If it was to be accomplished by the severance of diplomatic relations, why was not that stated? Why was it all left uncertain?

By going into this partnership with three of the members of the league we put it in their power to compel us to bring our case before the league, which would naturally be unfriendly to us, because we refused to join it. In their passing upon our rights the situation will be that of the three other powers leaving the settlement to their partners in the league, as against us who are not a member in the league. That will give us all of the disadvantages of the league without any of its advantages.

We have been told that if we refuse to ratify this treaty Japan and Great Britain will refuse to stop building ships. There we have the threat of war again. We have got to be scared into it; our fears are to be played on; we are to be placed in the attitude of cowards; we are to stand before the world afraid of Japan, afraid of England. Since when did we become afraid of any nation? Why should we be? Has the leopard changed his spots? What Japan did to Korea and to China she will do to us in the Pacific if she gets a chance. What England has done to her late allies she might do to us, if tempted and feeling secure, in the Pacific.

Mr. President, the fate of China is enough to concern the whole world. When our ancestors were wearing the hides of wild animals in the woods of Germany, eating raw meat and glad to get it, the Chinese had a beautiful civilization, a pure and lofty ethical code. China had science, literature, and art before Chaucer ever sang in England, before Alfred the Great ever had his face slapped for letting those cakes burn. China's golden rule is older than ours, and she has lived by it to a greater extent than we have lived by ours. Her great teacher, reformer, "guide, philosopher, and friend," Confucius, lived hundreds of years before our Christ, and for twenty-two hundred years her laws were almost unchanged.

Did you ever think, Senators, of the fact that China never made war on any other country during the whole of her career? She never did. She has been a nation of peace from the dawn of time. One of her Tartar kings made war; but China proper and the Chinese never did declare war against any other part of the human family. The same may be said of Korea; whereas Japan had always been warlike, until she got the worst of it in the war that she waged upon Korea, after which she remained within her shell for about 200 years. Korea had a beautiful civilization, literature, science, art, manufactures, ages before there was any civilization in the western world.

It is said that Congress has the power to declare war, and that no conference can take it from Congress. That argument is fallacious. A conference of American delegates, appointed by Congress or the President, can so commit themselves to a policy which the Senate might not like that the Senate would feel constrained to ratify it, lest the honor of the country be compromised in the eyes of the world. See how we are compromised now. The argument is used that we must ratify this four-power pact because our representatives were parties to it, and yet we did not authorize them to make any such agreement.

Mr. President, I do not know whether my conception of the independence of our country is too low or too high or absolutely correct; but my belief has always been that our forefathers fought for those seven years in order that they might establish in the New World a government different from any of those in the old. We can not go into a copartnership with Europe without being entangled in Europe's ambitions, rivalries, strifes, and clashes of interest, and the Republic can not be the partner of an imperialism without a reaction coming from the imperialism affecting democratic institutions and ideals in this country.

Oh, this compact seems to me a horrible thing, and it makes my heart bleed—indeed it does. I would that I had some power to stop the progress of this movement to enchain our country to the chariot wheels of the monarchies of the Old World and to the ultimate destinies of Africa, Asia, and Oceanica. If I had my way the ideal of the fathers, which the statesmen thought out and the soldiers fought out, would never be lowered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if my friend from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] will examine the records from which he read relative to the medal awarded Mr. Root, I think he will discover that it was awarded not by the Government but by the Arts Club of America. I may be in error, but that is my recollection.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, if I used the word "Government," it was a slip of the tongue. I did not intend to use it.

Mr. KING. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not remember whether I did or not. The RECORD, of course, will show; but I did not intend to say it.

Mr. KING. My understanding is that no recognition was accorded him——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. By the Government.

Mr. KING. By the Government for his services, in the shape of a medal; and I do not recall that either by the executive or legislative branch of the Government was Mr. Root given any mark of distinction or honor for his valuable services in Russia. I have no doubt but what President Wilson tendered to Mr. Root his thanks for the work performed during his visit to Russia.

Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into any controversy with my friend from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], and only rise to say a few words concerning Mr. Root and his mission to Russia in 1917. Perhaps a brief reference to conditions prior to our entering the war may be warranted by way of preliminary, and a few sentences concerning Germany and Russia may reflect some light upon the reasons for the Root mission. For years prior to 1914 the military element, the Pan-German forces in Germany, largely controlled Germany's foreign and domestic policies. They sought not only a "place in the sun" for Germany but they designed that she should be the dominating power in the world. A great navy was constructed and a mighty army was prepared for war. Germany became the great military power of the world. Austria-Hungary was her ally and, indeed, her tool. Serbia was to be destroyed by Austria and Germany was to secure territorial or economic gains in the Near East.

Russia, when Serbia was thus menaced, was roused to the danger to the Slav States and made preparations for the conflict.

The German Kaiser assigned as one of the reasons of the war the mobilization of the Russian Army. Of course, that was a pretext to hide the wicked course of the military cabal which was dominating the Central Empires. Russia could see danger to her territory and to her position in Europe and Asia if the scheme of the Central Empires was successful.

Russia was forced into the war by Germany and Austria. Russia's interests were threatened and she became a belligerent nation, not only to defend a weak Slav State but, as she believed, to protect her vital and national interests. Belgium and Serbia and France and Italy and Great Britain and the United States, as well as all of the allied and associated powers, were not only contending for their own rights but for the cause of justice and peace in all the world. Russia's interests were as vitally affected as were those of any of the allied nations. The Russian people were fighting primarily for their own rights and for their own country.

They rejoiced when the United States entered the conflict, because a powerful ally was thus assured and an old and tried friend stood with them. We did not push Russia into the war; she had been fighting heroically for nearly three years when the United States entered the war. We had no reason to believe that Russia would desert her allies and abandon her own interests. We regarded the Russian people with profound affection and trusted them as honorable associates in a great conflict which involved the interests of the world. In the beginning of the war Germany attempted the subjugation of Russia, and Russia, with fine spirit and great vigor, plunged into the mighty conflict. Perhaps of all the nations, not excepting France and Belgium, Russia suffered the most from the war. Her contributions to the war never can be measured in rubles or pounds or treasure or in human suffering and human blood; and any country that was opposed to Germany that attempts to belittle the work of Russia is doing an injustice to that unhappy land and manifesting an ingratitude that seems to me incredible.

During the war it was believed by many of the Russian people that there were traitors in their own Government who were plotting the destruction of their own country. Dissatisfaction developed among the people, and the inefficiency of the bureaucratic and monarchistic class caused widespread discontent. Finally the revolution came. The Czar was driven from the throne and the Kerensky government came into power. It was the purpose of Kerensky and Prince Lvoff and Professor Milukoff and those leaders of what might be denominated the moderate revolutionary party to prosecute the war and to remain true to the allied cause. They knew that the war was being fought as much for Russia as for France or for Great Britain or for any of the allied nations. Lenin and Trotski, and those who formed the radical element of the communistic group, sought the withdrawal of Russia from the conflict and the overthrow of the so-called capitalitsic nations of the world. They were at war with all nations and thought that an opportunity had come to destroy what they call "capitalism" as well as all governments, and to establish internationalism and the reign of the proletariat. They believed that if Russia could be withdrawn from the war and a communistic government erected therein the allied Governments would be defeated. Undoubtedly they regarded Germany as a fruitful field for the poison of their doctrines and believed that the German Empire would soon disintegrate and be swallowed up in the tide of communism.

Lenin and Trotski entered Russia and began their intrigues against the Kerensky government. They attacked the morale of the army and of the people and sowed the seeds of discord and destruction. The revolutionary government of Kerensky earnestly attempted to meet the situation, to stabilize conditions, and to carry on the war. They attempted to give the people a constitutional government, and, as I recall, made arrangements for a genuine constituent assembly. The United States took cognizance of the new condition of affairs and recognized the new government, not only as a de facto but as a de jure government. The President of the United States sought to understand the changing conditions, the aims and purposes of the new government, and the aspirations and hopes of the people. That he was anxious for the new administration to continue the vigorous prosecution of the war I have no doubt. And the allied nations were equally desirous that Russia should continue to do her part in the titanic conflict.

President Wilson, acting with high motives and guided by true statesmanship, sent a mission to Russia bearing a message of good will and fraternal greeting from this Republic to the newborn republic of the old world. Mr. Root was selected as the head of that mission. Some may question the wisdom of President Wilson in selecting Mr. Root to head the mission. I had some misgivings, not that I doubted the ability or the integrity of Mr. Root or his capacity to deal with big things in a big way. Perhaps intellectually there is no greater man in the United States or in the world than Elihu Root. Many differ from him in his political views. I have seldom agreed with his policies and never expect to follow his political school of thought, but I pay tribute to his intellectual powers. He is a world figure, though his statesmanship, in my opinion, is too often highly reactionary.

That he went to Russia inspired with a sincere desire to help the Russian people, and to patriotically serve his country, I have no doubt. I believe that Mr. Root, while there, exhibited ability, tact, diplomacy, and statesmanship of a high order. Perhaps no one could have done better service than did Mr. Root in a most trying situation, and for what he did, or attempted to do, as I suggested to my good friend from Georgia a few moments ago, I felt then, as I feel now, that he was entitled to the thanks of the President and to the thanks of the American people.

Unfortunately, the government of Kerensky was not supported by the Russian people. I will qualify that observation, because from all I can learn the Russian people, saddened and disheartened and discouraged as they were, were not desirous of leaving the field and abandoning the fight. Notwithstanding the fact that they had lost millions of men upon the battle fields, notwithstanding the fact that the transportation system had broken down, that their resources were practically exhausted, that demoralization had spread industrially and economically to all parts of the land, deep down in the hearts of the great mass of the Russian people there was an instinctive fear of Germany and a desire that the allied and associated powers should continue the war until a triumphant victory had been won.

But in their discouragement, having lost faith in the Czar, and uncertain as to the capacity and loyalty and integrity of all who appeared as political and, indeed, military leaders, they drifted in a helpless and hopeless and chaotic condition. In this situation they fell victims to the poisonous propaganda which was disseminated by the Marxian socialists of the Lenin kind.

These enemies of Russia became emissaries of the Central Powers. They deceived the soldiers and broke down the morale of the people. They spread the most abominable lies and made many of the people believe that France had withdrawn from the war, that American troops could not be transported across the water in sufficient numbers to be of any value, that the allied cause was about to collapse, and that Germany was assured of victory. The credulous, disheartened, and discouraged Russian peasants became demoralized, and the demoralization extended to the army. Finally there was a complete collapse of the Russian Army, and the Russian soldiers broke ranks and went back to their homes.

I regret that Kerensky's government, or some Russian government, did not come to power for the purpose of continuing the conflict. If Russia had continued for six months longer, the war would have been at an end. With Russia's withdrawal the Central Powers felt assured of success. The cause of the allied nations was greatly imperiled, and if it had not been for the energy and contributions of the United States another story might now be told.

There were certain revolutionary and radical forces in the United States who looked with the greatest glee upon the withdrawal of the Russian forces from the conflict. There were a few Americans who took that treasonable view.

Russia was in the war in defense of her own sovereignty and integrity and to protect the honor of the nation. Russia should not have withdrawn from the war, and it was the duty of the allied nations and the President of the United States to use all reasonable means, all moral suasion, to have Russia fulfill her engagements and to continue with the allied forces until the victory was won.

I again express my regret that Russia abandoned her associates. If she had been loyal to them and to her own interests, there would have been no communism, no bolshevism. She would have rejoiced with the Allies in a common victory and participated with them in making the terms of peace. She would have been at the peace table to help write the Versailles treaty, and the history of Europe from that day to this would have been entirely different. We would not now be discussing the four-power pact. Indeed, the problems of the Orient would have been vastly different. There would have been no Washington conference, and no four-power treaty. Russia, as a great and sovereign State, would now be at peace with all the world. With her inexhaustible resources she would have been the most powerful State of Europe, and pressing forward along the pathway of progress, she would have materially aided in Europe's rehabilitation.

But she fell away from the cause of justice and righteousness and abandoned her allies in the hour of their peril; but, notwithstanding that fact, this Nation has been the friend of the Russian people and is now their true and loyal friend. President Wilson, notwithstanding the treachery of the Bolsheviks, manifested his faith in the Russian people up to the very hour he left the White House. He stretched forth his hand upon many occasions to aid Russia; he lifted his voice in behalf of the Russian people and sought in every possible way the rehabilitation of Russia, the restoration of the Russian people to a condition of peace and prosperity. He was unwilling, when Russia was prostrate, to adopt any policy which would dismember the Russian State or weaken or destroy it.

The great state paper written by Mr. Colby shortly before he left the office of Secretary of State, in which he voiced the position of the then administration and spoke the views of Mr. Wilson, was a defense of Russia and the Russian people and a plea to all the world for the solidarity of Russia and for the maintenance of Russian territory against any possible aggressions. To-day the American people feel sympathy for the Russian people and they are anxious to do everything within their power to lift them up and to set Russia upon the pathway of peace and honor and freedom and lasting prosperity.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I always listen with delight to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON]. He is a distinguished Member of this body, an able lawyer, a famous editor, author, and historian, and it occurred to me he might be interested to have the attention of the Senate drawn to the fact that there is a considerable difference in editorial opinion in his State touching the so-called four-power treaty.

I gathered the inference from the remarks of my distinguished friend that he is not in favor of the ratification of this treaty.

In that connection I desire to read into the RECORD a statement from a very important journal of this country. As I now recall, the Hon. Clark Howell, a constituent of the Senator from Georgia, is the dean of the Democratic editors of the country. He has for many years been editor of a great journal, the Atlanta Constitution. In a recent edition of that paper I notice the following advice. I do not subscribe to all of it, particularly that portion of it in which he criticizes the motives and actions of Republicans, but I thought it might be helpful to our brethren on the Democratic side to know what the dean of the Democratic editors of the country thinks about the treaty. I am reading from an Atlanta Constitution editorial written by Hon. Clark Howell. Here is what he said, in part:

> The defeat of the four-power treaty would put the world back 10 years in its recovery from the destructive effects of the war.
> It is to be hoped that the Democrats in the Senate will, whatever the Republicans may do, keep their hands clean and their consciences clear, and that they will not permit their party, by the votes of a majority of the Democratic minority in the Senate, to be placed in the attitude of having defeated ratification of this treaty through an unholy alliance with irreconcilable Republicans.

Remember, I am assuming no responsibility for the comment he makes with reference to the Republicans, but I am calling attention to the advice which this distinguished editor is giving his Democratic brethren.

In another editorial he said:

> If enough Democratic Senators join forces with the irreconcilable Republicans in the final test of strength to defeat ratification of this treaty—as they unquestionably have the power to do—they will have assumed a fearful responsibility to their party, their country, and to the world.
> That they will do such a thing—that they will emulate the Republicans in the Versailles treaty fight by stooping to play personal or partisan politics—

Of course, I do not agree at all to the motives he ascribes to Republicans, nor to the criticism he implies of the very proper and patriotic action of Republicans in defeating the League of Nations covenant, but I am reading this advice from one distinguished Democratic editor to another distinguished Democratic editor—

> That they will do such a thing—that they will emulate the Republicans in the Versailles treaty fight by stooping to play personal or partisan politics with a principle that involves the prosperity, peace, and general welfare of the human race—is unthinkable.

Then, in that connection, to show the trend of editorial opinion amongst our Democratic brethren, I ask unanimous consent that there may be read at the desk the paragraphs that I have marked in a recent editorial appearing on the front page of the Commoner, a journal fairly well known throughout the country, edited by Hon. W. J. Bryan. This is the edition of March, 1922. I ask that the paragraphs from the editorial be read at the desk.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before that is read I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he were editing the first editorial whether he would strike out the syllable "un," so it would read "holy alliance," or whether he would still leave it "unholy"?

Mr. WILLIS. Not believing in alliances at all, I think I should not care to enter into that discussion. The Senator is familiar with my attitude on that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

> Because our fight must be made largely upon economic issues it is unwise for the Democrats to prolong the debate over the peace treaties. Every day's debate will tend to divert attention from the economic issues and the Democrats will not only suffer by this diverting of attention but they will suffer still more if they allow themselves to be put in the attitude of opposition to any steps toward peace. There is no reason why the Democrats should not indorse every good thing connected with the treaties and then claim, as they rightfully can, that such progress as has been made has been made along Democratic lines rather than along Republican lines. The Democratic Party has been the leader in the peace movement and it can consistently support any steps taken toward peace by the Republicans because they are taken along Democratic lines. Take, for instance, the four-power treaty. It is based upon the 30 treaties negotiated by the last administration. Those who framed the four-power treaty claimed that it implied a reservation of independence, but the Senate has insisted that that reservation be made specific. In doing this it has simply added the one provision of the 30 treaties that was left out of the four-power treaty. Why should the Democrats object to a treaty that carries out the ideas of the Democratic treaties? Eighteen of the 30 treaties were ratified in one day; after the first three were ratified there was not a dissenting vote. When the Democrats vote for the four-power treaty they are simply approving of their own policy which the Republicans have adopted. Is it possible that a Republican indorsement can destroy the value of Democratic treaties? The sooner these treaties are disposed of the better.
> This does not mean that no reservations should be adopted. Any reservations that any Democrat wants to propose should be proposed and acted upon, but there should be no unnecessary delay. We denounced the Republicans for delaying the action on the treaty of Versailles. Why should we bring condemnation upon ourselves by delaying action upon these treaties, especially when by doing so we divert attention from the economic questions which must be the paramount issue in our fall campaign?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, many of the people of the United States are deeply interested in Korea. This is true not only from the fact that the Korean Government is the historic patriarch among the Governments of the world, but it is also true because of the fact that in 1882 our country entered into a treaty with Korea which was ratified by the Senate in January, 1883, and proclaimed to the world in June, 1883. This treaty expressly provided among other things that—

If other powers deal unjustly or oppressively with either Government, the other will exercise their good offices on being informed of the case to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their friendly feeling.

It is not my purpose to discuss at this time the relation between Japan and Korea or the conduct of the United States in the matter, though the subject is full of pathos and tragedy. But I do want to make it clear that the pending four-power treaty gives distinct encouragement to the people of Korea and to that vast number in the world who are deeply interested in their welfare. The very purpose of the four-power treaty, as indicated by its preamble, is not alone the preservation of the general peace, but is as well the maintenance of the rights of the parties to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield for a question?

Mr. SPENCER. I will yield in a moment. And in any controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their rights, if not diplomatically settled, there is to be a conference between the nations and there is likewise to be, under the provisions of the treaty, a full and frank communication between the nations in case any of the rights of either party are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power.

It is not difficult to understand how naturally the Korean question might become involved in any such conference or communication, and the essential and encouraging fact is that whenever any matter in which Korea is directly or indirectly concerned comes before such a conference or is connected with such communication between the four powers it follows that Korea and its interests are brought before a company in which the United States, Great Britain, and France are parties equally with Japan, and Korea will have the tremendous advantage of having the questions in which she is interested considered upon such circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SPENCER. In a moment. The friends of Korea have reason to congratulate themselves when the four-power treaty becomes operative.

I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Missouri has said that one of the chief benefits of the four-power treaty is the encouragement that it gives to Korea that she may hope for relief from the oppression of Japan. The Senator, of course, knows that under this treaty Korea can have no representation except through Japan in any conference that may result from the treaty. Is not that true?

Mr. SPENCER. Undoubtedly, as the matter now stands.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the Senator takes the position that it is a great advantage to Korea to be represented in a conference concerning questions which vitally affect her interests, her liberty, and her rights by the very nation that has subverted those rights, overcome and oppressed her. Mr. President, this is one argument that has not heretofore been advanced in favor of the four-power treaty and I do not believe it will again be advanced.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I merely want to correct the Senator from Arkansas, who started out with a statement putting into my mouth words which I did not use. The Senator said I opened my statement by remarking that one of the chief advantages of the four-power treaty was the benefit that it gave to Korea. I made no such statement. The Senator manufactured a man of straw which, with his usual vigor, he violently hit and knocked down.

All that I said is true, and that is that Korea to-day is in the grasp of Japan, and has, as the Senator from Arkansas truly remarks, no political integrity of its own among the nations of the world. While that is true, when anything which concerns Korea comes before that conference in the future, though it comes through the door of Japan, it comes before a conference where the United States, Great Britain, and France are equal parties to the conference with Japan, and I repeat it is a distinct advantage to Korea, more advantage than those helpless people have had for the last ten years.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senate has just heard the statement of the Senator from Missouri in criticism of my construction of the remarks he was reading from a carefully prepared manuscript. It is singular that during the course of this debate the proponents of the treaty find it necessary to prepare their remarks with great deliberation, commit them to writing, and read them to the Senate.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield in just a moment. Every Senator who has discussed the treaty from the standpoint of those who advocate its ratification without amendment or reservation has written just exactly what he wanted to say, has come into the Senate and read it, and when a Senator has asked to interrupt him touching a particular point he has said, "Just wait a moment," and he has read on to the end of his manuscript and then declared, "Now I am ready to yield to the Senator."

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. I wanted to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he did not think it would be rather advantageous if the opponents of the treaty gave a little more deliberation to the subject before they spoke?

Mr. ROBINSON. If they had no more success than the Senators who have read manuscripts in furnishing to the Senate information with respect to the treaty, the most careful attention to the preparation of their remarks would not have compensated for deficiency in argument. The Senator from Missouri unquestionably read from his manuscript the declaration that the four-power treaty was of great advantage to Korea. Now, did he not? Did not you hear that? I saw every man in the press gallery take out his pencil and make a note when the Senator from Missouri made that remarkable statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the Senator also saw them laugh.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; everyone laughed. The Senator from Missouri, if I understand him, now takes the position that because France and Great Britain and the United States are parties to this compact it will be a great encouragement to Korea to have her rights and her interests considered in the conference when they may be presented to the conference by the representatives of the Empire of Japan. Mr. President, when Japan was fighting Russia, Korea made common cause with her. Korea not only had the guaranty of her ally Japan, and of Great Britain, but the assurance by solemn treaty of the United States that her territory and her Government would be respected and preserved. With those relationships and those treaty obligations in existence, Great Britain and the United States stood silently by while the countless emissaries of the Japanese Empire, in pursuit of the policy of economic penetration, which has marked the aggression of that Empire throughout the last 25 years, advanced to the destruction of the sovereignty of Korea and to the oppression of her citizens. How, then, can anyone assert in vindication of this treaty that Korea may hope for liberty and rescue from the oppressions of the Japanese Empire through a conference under this treaty when she can only be heard through the representatives of the Japanese Empire? Do Senators believe that this treaty will prove instrumental in restoring independence to Korea?

Mr. President, if the declaration of the Senator from Missouri is illustrative of the desperate straits to which the advocates of unqualified ratification have been driven, those of us who want to Americanize this treaty and read into it a provision that secret engagements shall not be entered into among or between the powers constituting the pact; those of us who believe that Russia and China ought to be given a hearing in any conference affecting their rights and their destiny may, indeed, take courage and hope that sound judgment and prudent counsel will prevail to safeguard the reputation of our Government for sympathy and justice in dealing with weaker powers.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I listened a moment ago with very great interest to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], to the editorial from the Atlanta Constitution, and also the one from the Nebraska Commoner, which he had read at the desk. I have been interested, of course, in the controversy which raged here yesterday and again to-day concerning what some distinguished gentleman in New York had said in regard to the pending treaty. I have been interested, too, in the propaganda with which all Senators have become familiar, not only in this particular matter but in all matters that come before the Senate and the Congress. I have been interested, however, merely from the standpoint of observing the infinite variety of the human mind and not from the standpoint of being in the slightest degree influenced by any of the writings or any of the telegrams or any of the editorials or any of the propaganda that have come to us. There is too much of that sort of thing today, Mr. President, and too much of the endeavor to bring organized pressure to bear upon this body. The question with which we are now dealing is of such transcendent importance that I assume every Senator in the Chamber, as I endeavor to do, gives to it the best that is in him and that he may exercise his independent judgment. I take it, further, that that is not only the duty that is ours in the position which we occupy but it is the obligation that rests upon us because of the very delicacy and the very great importance of the subject involved.

I wish to say, sir, for myself, in regard to the organized paid propaganda, that I do not care the snap of my finger whether every editorial reference in the United States is of a certain character; I care not, sir, whether every association, civic or otherwise, directs, commands, begs, or protests in reference to the question before us. I do not care whether the Atlanta Constitution indulges in a persuasive endeavor or if Mr. Bryan's Commoner would chide us into a particular attitude. I feel that after all upon us, the individual independent Members of this body, rests the solemn duty to determine, in accordance each with his own judgment and as God gives him to see the light, what should be done.

I have no interest in Mr. Cravath's utterances. So far as I can see, the net result which has followed two days' discussion of him is that he leaves this Chamber, metaphorically, with a veracity shattered in many directions. I think we may dismiss him from all further consideration.

I am not concerned that Mr. Bryan says the Republican side of the Chamber has adopted a Democratic policy. I have said that myself, and that it is obvious I think there is little doubt. But if it were a correct policy in which our side of the Chamber believed, it ought to be adopted, and the fact that it had been two years ago a Democratic policy ought not in the slightest degree to militate against it. It is the policy, not the partisan label, that concerns me. I do become a bit restive, sir, and a bit irritated at the kind of propaganda which shows that it is organized and paid for and comes in exactly the same words from different sources.

There is one thing, sir, that I desire to express an opinion upon, an opinion perhaps at variance with that of my colleagues on both sides, but one concerning which somebody should speak, for it relates to a policy in which we are all very much interested. I speak not at all in criticism of the distinguished gentlemen who have served upon the American delegation to the Washington conference; but I do say, sir, that the circumstances which confront us in this debate and the situation which has come out of this debate show conclusively that upon commissions or conferences of the character of that recently held in Washington, upon the results of which ultimately they must pass in this Chamber, Senators ought not to be appointed; and I hope, sir, that this is the last time that upon any such commission or conference Senators will be appointed.

One further word, Mr. President, with reference to what has been said by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] to the effect that Korea will derive encouragement from this treaty. Just think of it! I heard some of my brethren say that in the argument different Senators have been driven to extreme lengths in the discussion of this treaty. That seems to be so now. The Senator from Missouri, as I understand him, assigns Korea's terrible present fate as one of the reasons why this treaty should be ratified, so that relief may come from it and that there may be a palliation of conditions there existing. I understand that to be the substance of the argument of the Senator from Missouri, but the Senator from Missouri could not have meant that. If that be an argument that is advanced seriously upon this floor for this treaty, it ought, upon reflection among those who are familiar with the situation, to react upon the proponents of the treaty.

How did Japan acquire Korea? Mr. President, the very treaty which we are superseding with the four-power alliance, the Anglo-Japanese alliance of 1902, provided in set and fixed terms for preservation of the territorial integrity and the political independence of Korea, substantially, if not literally, in those words. It provided originally for the preservation of the territorial integrity and the political independence of Korea, and under the beneficent phrases of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which is to be superseded by this four-power alliance, Japan swallowed Korea, and ever since has been in absolute dominion and control of Korea. So it is suggested by my friend from Missouri that that which takes the place of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which guaranteed Korea and then destroyed her, is going to protect Korea because, forsooth, Korea may speak through her ravisher, Japan. I leave that argument with the Senate and with those who heard it.

In conclusion, I reiterate that the facts that have been developed here, the situation that has occurred, the events that have transpired—and this I say without criticism of either the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Alabama—demonstrate that upon conferences of this sort Senators should not be appointed, and, if appointed, ought not to serve.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I feel, as everyone must who is at all familiar with the subject, great sympathy for the Koreans, but I am sorry to say that I am obliged to differ with my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] in his interpretation of the treaty, and I take the floor simply because I fear my silence might be misunderstood.

All continental questions were carefully excluded from the four-power treaty by the language adopted. The words "insular possessions and insular dominions" were selected with great care in order to exclude from the treaty any question touching either the Continent of Asia or the Continent of America. I am not undertaking to be final; after the rebuke that we have had from the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] I should hesitate to do that; but I am only stating the fact of the interpretation of all those who made the treaty, that the phrase was carefully selected in order to exclude all continental questions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to submit some observations upon this treaty. I desire to speak rather fully upon the treaty. I am a little loath to divide my argument. If an arrangement might be effected which would meet the approval of the Senator from Massachusetts that we should take a recess until, say, 11 o'clock to-morrow, so as to extend the time for discussion to-morrow by one hour, at least, or, if it be thought desirable, to meet even at an earlier hour—I do not want to get in the way of any other Senator who wants to speak on the pact—I should like to discuss the terms of the treaty and submit to the Senate an analysis which is, I think, in a way somewhat different from that which has been presented.

Would the Senator from Massachusetts be willing to move a recess at this time until, say, 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall be glad to move a recess to 11 o'clock to-morrow. It was my intention to move a short executive session, which, of course, will not interfere with that in any way.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. LODGE. I think I ought to say that the only Senator who has spoken to me about speaking to-morrow is the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], who says he desires to speak to-morrow before the limitation is put on. I know of no others.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If there are other Senators who desire to speak to-morrow before the limitation goes into effect, and they will indicate the fact at this time, we might make an arrangement which would accommodate everybody. I certainly do not want to get in the way of any Senator who desires to address himself with some thoroughness to the four-power treaty. I think I should like to take about a couple of hours of the Senate's time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I think I know of two Senators on this side who desire to speak to-morrow, but I do not think they will consume more than an hour each.

Mr. LODGE. After 3 o'clock, under the unanimous-consent agreement, speeches on the treaty are limited to one hour and speeches on reservations to half an hour. Any Senator speaking after the limitation goes into effect is entitled to an hour.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He is entitled to at least an hour, under the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement, at any time between now and 12 o'clock, I think, on Friday.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. President, I understand, then, that the Senator from Wisconsin has taken the floor; and if he will yield the floor to me now I will make a motion to go into closed executive session.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts for that purpose.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon to make a request.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a conference report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for that purpose, Mr. President.

CHARGES DUE ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MCNARY. I ask unanimous consent, as in legislative session, for the present consideration of the conference report on House bill 9606.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9606) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment to the said bill.

CHAS. L. MCNARY,
W. L. JONES,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
M. P. KINKAID,
N. J. SINNOTT,
CARL HAYDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, just a word.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I joined in the conference report receding from the amendment of the Senate. That carried with it recession from the amendment that was put on in the Senate the other day relating to the extension of time on water rights on the Yakima Indian Reservation. I joined in this because in another body there was very strong opposition to this proposition, though not on the merits of it. I realized the force of the opposition, and I joined in the report also upon the assurance of the other body that the bill embodied in this amendment would be acted upon by the committee in another body. That action has been taken and a favorable report has been ordered upon that legislation. So I am very hopeful that we shall be able to get the measure through in the proper and regular way, and for that reason I joined in the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

FLYING FIELD AT DAYTON, OHIO.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, there has developed in the country a discussion of very great interest to the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and that is with reference to the attitude of the Government toward the relocation of the great flying field now located at Dayton, Ohio. The State of Ohio feels that it made a contribution to the country when it gave the country the airplane and the Wright brothers, and when the matter of abandoning this field at Dayton comes up here there will be a very vigorous contest if there is a disposition to remove that plant from the State of Ohio. It would be an inexcusable blunder on the part of the Government to scatter the wonderful force that has there been collected of the most expert airplane mechanics in the world. To break up and scatter to the four winds those airplane experts would set back airplane production in the United States for decades, and in addition would be a discredit to the city and State that gave the world the Wright brothers and the airplane.

On this subject I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD without reading a brief editorial of two paragraphs from the Cincinnati Enquirer of March 18.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HALT THIS DESECRATION.

Completely inconceivable in sentiment and justice is the thought of abandoning the national aviation headquarters now at Dayton and removing them to a point on Long Island, N. Y., to be made an auxiliary to the Navy.

It was at Dayton that the transcendent genius of the Wrights gave to the world the first practical flying machine and clothed man with dominion over the air, the coequal of the fowls. There, too, Lord Northcliffe, envoy for the scientific societies of Great Britain, presented the gold medal to the surviving inventor, which, as a symbol, acknowledged priority of discovery and forever fixed the brothers' fame.

From his lips fell the words that should have been uttered by an American, the declaration that in Dayton should be established the world home of aeronautical research, a shrine of the brilliant intellects that made human flight a possibility. To him it was the natural thing to do. Aught else would be a grief to understand.

Those responsible for these matters should sedulously see to it that the whims and crank ideas of institutionalized officials are not permitted to override these glorious ideals. Dayton and the airplane have come to be synonyms. To dismantle the governmental plant there would be very much like bombarding a beautiful cathedral in order to test a new explosive shell. It would, without exaggeration, constitute a national reproach.

MONONGAHELA RIVER CONSOLIDATED COAL & COKE CO. (S. DOC. NO. 170).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the case of the Monongahela River Consolidated Coal & Coke Co. v. The United States, referred to the court by a Senate resolution under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 21, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God, wilt Thou come unto us in kindness and rebuke, in chastisement and in blessing, and stoop to our needs. Show Thyself strong and good, for Thy mercy's sake. Interpret unto us our own necessities, and make us to see great things out of Thy law. Grant newness of zeal, of opportunity and hopefulness to all. Teach us how the good may prevail, and help up to hold on to its achievements. Descend upon our fellow citizens with many blessings; and may they know the riches of life, its vast outlooks, and its wondrous joys. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for a minute and a half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for 90 seconds. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there is pending before the Senate of the United States a very important treaty, vitally affecting the future of mankind, but upon which one-half of the California delegation there has taken an attitude which I feel to be in direct opposition to the will of the vast majority of the people of California, and particularly to those of the ninth congressional district, which I happen to represent, I desire to have read in the remainder of my time a telegram from my constituency, which is typical of many expressions which I have received, and which I believe to be the almost unanimous sentiment of the people of California on this very important matter. I refer to the so-called four-power treaty now pending before that great body, the United States Senate. Although I realize that this House has no voice in the making of treaties, I desire to add to the sentiments expressed therein my heartiest approval.

The Clerk read as follows:

LONG BEACH, CALIF., March 19, 1922.

Maj. WALTER F. LINEBERGER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Board of directors adopted following resolution:

"Realizing the tremendous burdens borne by our own people and those of other world nations because of national ambitions to excel in naval and military strength, and believing that world problems never will be satisfactorily settled by force of arms but rather by an agreement between nations and national leaders, therefore we deeply appreciate the spirit and vision of President Harding in calling the world nations together in the disarmament conference, and we congratulate our own and other interested peoples on the spirit, the wisdom, and the actual accomplishment of the conference; and we hereby call on our United States Senators and Representatives in Congress to cooperate in every way with President Harding and the disarmament delegates, Secretary of State Charles Evans Hughes, Hon. Elihu Root, Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, and Senator Oscar W. Underwood, in securing the approval of the United States Senate to the splendid agreement reached at the disarmament conference, which is a far greater accomplishment than most of our people considered possible, to the end that the United States as well as other nations may limit military and naval expenditures, and thus have available huge sums for constructive development, as well as to enable all the nations to develop good will and the policy of settlement of problems and disputed questions in friendly conference rather than by armed force with all attendant evils."

LONG BEACH CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
CHAS. S. HENDERSON, President.

[Applause.]

CHARGES ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill H. R. 9606 for printing under the rule.

Mr. KINKAID. Extending the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 10871, making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill, parts of which were passed over.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the understanding was that we would start where we first left off.

The Clerk read as follows:

FINANCE DEPARTMENT.

PAY, ETC., OF THE ARMY.

Pay of officers: For pay of officers of the line and staff, $26,896,200: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated for the pay of officers shall not be used for the pay of more than 11,000 commissioned officers on the active list, of which number there shall be not to exceed 1 general, 21 major generals, and 46 brigadier generals of the line; the general officers authorized by law for chiefs and assistant chiefs of branches; the number of officers of the Medical Corps now authorized by law of six and one-half for every thousand enlisted men, the number of officers of the Medical Administrative Corps now authorized by law of one for every 2,000 enlisted men, the number of officers of the Dental Corps now authorized by law of one for every thousand officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army; not to exceed 109 commissioned officers of the Veterinary Corps; one chaplain as now authorized by law for every 1,200 officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts; professors at the United States Military Academy; the military storekeeper; and those belonging to branches whose names are carried on the promotion list to be distributed in grades as follows: Not to exceed 4 per cent in the grade of colonel, or 389; not to exceed 4.5 per cent in the grade of lieutenant colonel, or 437; not to exceed 15 per cent in the grade of major, or 1,458; not to exceed 30 per cent in the grade of captain, or 2,915; not to exceed 28.5 per cent in the grade of first lieutenant, or 2,769; and the remainder in the grade of second lieutenant: Provided further, That officers found surplus may be recommissioned in the next lower grade in accordance with their standing on the promotion list, or on the relative list if their names are not on the promotion list, or those of less than 10 years' commissioned service in the Regular Army may be discharged with one year's pay, or those of more than 10 years' commissioned service and less than 20 years' service may be placed on the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 2½ per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of such commissioned service, or those of more than 20 years' commissioned service in the Regular Army may be placed upon the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 3 per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of such commissioned service, not exceeding 75 per cent; all under such regulations as the President may prescribe.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a point of order also on the whole paragraph and each proviso of the paragraph.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. KAHN. The number of officers of the Medical Corps is now authorized by law 6½ for every 1,000 enlisted men. The number of officers of the Medical Administrative Corps is now authorized by law, 1 for every 2,000 men of the Regular Army; not to exceed 109 commissioned officers of the Veterinary Corps, and so on. One chaplain is now authorized by law for every 1,200 officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts.

Section 10 of the act of June 4, 1920, the present law, provides 6½ for every 1,000 of the total enlisted strength of the Regular Army authorized by law, and this section is a change of that provision. The comparison is the same as to the Medical Corps, except that the number is 1 for every 2,000, and in the Dental Corps the provision in the bill is for 1 for every 1,000 officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army; but section 10 of the act of June 4, 1920, says 1 for every 1,000 men of the total enlisted strength of the Regular Army authorized from time to time. That is a different proposition from what this bill calls for. In other words, the law fixes the number of men in the Medical Corps and in the Dental Corps at so many for every thousand men in the Army, and that number changes from time to time; but this provision in this bill fixes a definite number, which can not be changed under the provisions of this bill. I submit that it is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add something. The number of officers in the Army is prescribed by law. This changes the number. It does not merely change the appropriation. It determines the number of officers that there shall be in the Army. It says the appropriation shall not be used for the pay of more than 11,000 commissioned officers on the active list, of which number there shall be not to exceed so many; and when you get down to line 22 it says:

And those belonging to branches whose names are carried on the promotion list to be distributed in grades as follows: Not to exceed 4 per cent in the grade of colonel—

And so forth. If there are more of various grades, it orders them reassigned, and then it says how many officers there shall be.

Now, I take this proviso also to be absolutely connected with the second proviso, which is necessary for its existence; and that second proviso provides what is obviously out of order on an appropriation bill, a means for turning out of the Army and for demoting to lower grades various officers who are in the Army.

Let me read the proviso and see whether there is anything about appropriation. I read, beginning at line 8, page 16:

Provided further, That officers found surplus may be recommissioned in the next lower grade in accordance with their standing on the promotion list, or on the relative list if their names are not on the promotion list, or those of less than 10 years' commissioned service in the Regular Army may be discharged with one year's pay, or those of more than 10 years' commissioned service and less than 20 years' service, may be placed on the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 2½ per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of such commissioned service, or those of more than 20 years' commissioned service in the Regular Army may be placed upon the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 3 per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of such commissioned service, not exceeding 75 per cent; all under such regulations as the President may prescribe.

Now, I respectfully submit that that proviso is not only a proviso as to the management of the Army and not for appropriation, but it is likewise absolutely connected as a part of the first proviso, reducing the number of officers in the Army to a certain number, and not merely reducing the number that should be paid. My point is, first, that the whole of the two provisos should be taken together; and, second, that the first proviso is a proviso for the number of officers that there shall be; and, third, that the second proviso is certainly a proviso which reduces the number of officers in the standing line of the Army, and therefore is entirely out of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas if it is the contention of the committee that in lines 11 and 12, where it says "the number of officers in the Medical Corps now authorized by law of six and one-half for every thousand enlisted men," is the number now authorized by law?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is exactly the number authorized by law, and the committee intends to make no change whatever in the nmber authorized by law in the Medical, Dental, Veterinary, or the Chaplain's Corps, to which the gentleman from California has made the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. This is a limitation on the expenditure of the money. If this is the number authorized by law, which I am advised it is not, what is the necessity of using any language in stating the number? Why not say the number of officers in the Medical Corps now authorized by law?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because the War Department has appointed a number far in excess of the number authorized by law. For instance, it has appointed 1,148 officers in the Medical Corps, and the law authorizes 793.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman the language of the legislation which fixes the number of officers in the Medical Corps?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. The legislation or law fixes the number of officers in the Medical Corps at six and one-half officers for every thousand enlisted men.

Mr. WALSH. But there is something that follows after that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will read the entire paragraph:

The number of officers of the Medical Corps shall be six and one-half for every thousand, and of the Medical Administrative Corps, 1 for every 2,000 of the total enlisted strength of the Regular Army authorized from time to time and within the peace strength permitted by this act. The number of officers of the Dental Corps shall be one for every thousand of the total strength of the Regular Army authorized from time to time and within the peace strength permitted by this act.

The War Department took the position that the total authorized strength of the Regular Army was 280,000 men, and that therefore they could appoint the full authorization of officers. They seem to have willfully ignored the provision "as authorized by Congress from time to time." Last year Congress put a limit on the size of the Regular Army of 150,000. The committee contends that the War Department has no right to exceed the limit fixed last year.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that the Appropriations Committee is fixing the size of the Army in this legislation?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Appropriations Committee is limiting the amount of money which may be expended for the pay of officers and enlisted men.

Mr. WALSH. That is within the jurisdiction of the committee, but the committee has no jurisdiction to insert in an appropriation bill a change in the authorization of the law by which the number of officers is fixed. They can reduce the appropriation, but I submit that they can not by legislation change the law fixing the ratio of the officers and enlisted men, and that is what this change of language is attempting to do, because the authorization of the size of the Army is fixed by legislation and not by an appropriation bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this statement. As I understand it, the point of order is made by the gentleman from California against the language which repeats the present law as to the Medical Corps, the Administrative Corps, the Dental Corps, and the Corps of Chaplains. The language inserted by the committee in the bill is exactly existing law, not one word changed as far as I can see. The general idea of the committee in limiting the appropriation for the pay of the officers of the Army is that we contend it is in order under the Holman rule, because it is plain on the face of the measure that the proposition is to reduce the total number of officers in the Army. The average pay is $3,300 per annum at the present rate of pay, which is a saving of over $6,000,000 which would be effected by the adoption of the committee's limitation.

As I understand it, no point of order has been made against the reduction from the present number of 13,000 to 11,000, but, Mr. Chairman, the point is made entirely on the language in reference to the Medical Corps, the Dental Corps, the Medical Administrative Corps, the veterinaries, and the chaplains. I contend that the number fixed by the committee is exactly that now authorized by existing law and does not change it one particle.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. I call the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee to the fact that the point of order lies against the entire paragraph as it was read, and under the admission of the chairman of the subcommittee that it does reduce the number of officers now authorized by law, I claim that the entire paragraph is clearly subject to the point of order, and it is not within the provisions of the Holman rule. I shall read briefly the summary of the opinion of the Chair in a case of a similar nature on an appropriation bill, where it was attempted to compel the Army to transport troops over certain railroads where they were getting a lower rate than over other railroads, and it was a clear saving to the Government in a way. It is a mere matter of argument as to whether it is a saving of money to reduce the amount appropriated for the Army officers and thus compel a reduction in the number of officers authorized by law. Seriously speaking, I say that it is a waste of money; it is a loss of money to this country to do away with what we have already built up at so great an expense.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman says that it is a loss of money. On the face of the fact what is it, a loss or a saving?

Mr. CRAGO. On the face of the fact, as it appears to me, it is a loss.

Mr. MADDEN. What is it on the face of the bill?

Mr. CRAGO. Not in the total figures, no. On that very point I contend that this legislation, if it should come before this House at all, must, under the rulings of the Chair in all such cases, come from the committee which has jurisdiction of the subject matter of the legislation, and the decision to which I wish to cite the Chair reads as follows:

The Chair is of opinion that a motion of that kind should come from a committee having jurisdiction, and can not be brought before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as an integral part of an appropriation bill reported by the regular Committee on Appropriations.

Anything which has to do with legislation in this bill must of necessity come from a committee which has jurisdiction of the subject matter on which we are legislating, and under the decision in this case which I have cited, it takes the attempt out from under the provisions of the Holman rule, and I contend that the entire paragraph is subject to the point of order because it is argumentative as to whether it reduces the final expenditure of the Government. It does not come within the Holman rule because it does not come from a committee which has jurisdiction of the subject matter, and, therefore, it has no place on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What did the gentleman say of paragraph 2 of Rule XXI, which reads as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment, which amendment being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

What does the gentleman say to that?

Mr. CRAGO. I say to the gentleman that that is a limitation which was properly placed on a committee when a committee had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the bill bringing in a bill in accordance with that provision.

Mr. MADDEN. Under that section of Rule XXI this committee has complete jurisdiction, and it has not invaded the jurisdiction of any other committee of the House. It is within the power of the committee to report the legislation proposed under that section of the rule, because on the face we prove beyond a doubt that we are reducing the number of officers, and we are reducing the amount of the appropriation, and we prove the case by the very facts on the face of the bill.

Mr. CRAGO. But you are only doing that in this bill by legislating on a subject matter which belongs to another committee, and the decision which I have read, the decision of the Chair in that case, where obviously on the face of it there was a saving to the Government in the matter of transportation, clearly holds that since it is legislation reported by a general appropriation committee it is not in order, because it does not come from a committee which has jurisdiction of the subject matter.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, on page 6, line 9, I find that whatever may be the pretext of authority under the Holman rule for making a legislative policy regarding the Military Establishment in an appropriation bill, the Committee on Appropriations certainly has gone outside of its province when it adopts language such as the following:

That officers found surplus may be recommissioned in the next lowest grade in accordance with their standing on the promotion list—

And so forth.

On the face of it, clearly this is a concrete legislative proposition directing the War Department how it shall reestablish the grades of the officers in the military service, and as to what shall be done with them, and under what conditions and circumstances. For instance, under existing law there is no authority to demote people in the military service after the manner contemplated in the lines which I have read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In just a moment. There is involved in that very language a question of military policy, which is exclusively a matter of jurisdiction on the part of the legislative committee, as to whether men, having once been established in certain grades of military rank and authority, shall under any form of policy be demoted so that they are put into a different grade or rank and authority over their subordinates. There is, as everybody who has made any study of the administration of military affairs knows, a very serious moral factor involved there.

But it is, I say, a suggestion in a provision that establishes a military policy, a legislative policy, and not a question of economy at all. And yet in just this same fashion this old Bluebeard of an Appropriations Committee will take the other committees of the House one by one and ravish them and lock them up in its room and itself report matters in their jurisdiction.

Mr. STAFFORD. And there are eight——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And some day somebody will get the key to the door—look out for it. I have nothing to say except in the utmost good nature about this old Bluebeard. They are taking the Holman rule as a clever subtle provision for establishing a legislative policy for the Regular Military Establishment. You may be able to justify the figures you put in here somewhere through this bill on the strength of the Holman rule, but there is not any question at all in my judgment that in this language, beginning on page 16, line 8, you have assumed jurisdiction over matters that are entirely outside the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee dealing with the policy of military legislation and——

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. In making the statement the gentleman has made, the language to which he refers was included because it contains the necessary authority to carry out the economies which are to be made.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, well, if we mean that and are held to the doctrine of sequences, you can analyze anything down to a protoplasmic globule and claim authority over it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman knows there are only two ways for officers to get out of the Army, and that is by a court-martial and discharge or by resignation, unless you provide for a method of getting them out.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly. The gentleman admits that the bill carries a provision of legislation for some machinery and he adds to the machinery——

Mr. ANTHONY. In order to achieve the saving.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And the gentleman is inventing machinery to get men out of the Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. Absolutely.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is not part of the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee; it belongs to the legislative committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph consists, first, of an appropriation and, second, of two provisos. Of course, the regular law provides for the Army of a considerable size, but that does not obligate the Congress to appropriate for an Army of that size. Everybody will admit that. We appropriate for a lesser number of officers than are authorized by law to be appointed. Then follows the first proviso, which is part of the limitation that the sum herein appropriated for the pay of officers shall not be used for the pay of more than 11,000 commissioned officers on the active list, apportioning them among the various branches of the service. It is not within the power of the House as a limitation to prescribe the exact number of officers who might be paid out of appropriations in each branch of the service. It is not within the power of the House or the committee reporting it to provide a method of ascertaining the number of officers who shall be paid out of the appropriation. The first paragraph does not change in any way the number of officers who may be appointed in the Army. It only provides the number who may be paid under the appropriations made by Congress. That is a pure limitation. The law would still stand. The second proviso, I think, comes within the Holman rule. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] insisted that this should come from the legislative committee—the Committee on Military Affairs. Under the proviso in the Holman rule the Committee on Military Affairs could offer as an amendment a proposition entirely revising the law as to payment of officers in the Army. This does not attempt to do that. This does not go to the question that the Committee on Military Affairs might report an amendment. But the Holman rule provides that the amendment is in order which proposes a reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States. That is what the second proviso proposes to do, and that is all it does. It would be in order under the Holman rule to provide that hereafter there should be only 11,000 officers in the Army, although that is not what the bill does. It would be in order under the Holman rule to do that, and it is also in order under the Holman rule to provide by law for a reduction, as it would be in order to provide that the salary of a Cabinet officer should be reduced from $12,000 a year to $10,000 or the salary of any other official whose salary is fixed by law shall be reduced.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I follow that clearly; but this second proviso, the one to which the gentleman refers, does something more than change the salaries. It changes the scope of authority and jurisdiction of these officers by placing them in different grades from those which we have legislated upon and their military authority and responsibility have been changed.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the number of officers in the Army is fixed in the first paragraph of the bill. The second paragraph of the bill reduces the number of these officers who are supernumerary, and without the second proviso they might be officers in the Army without pay, and the second proviso only provides a method of reducing the pay of officers of the Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not the gentleman concede, beginning on page 15, line 8, that officers found surplus may be recommissioned in the next lower grade, and so forth; that, for instance, that takes a man away from, say, major, and puts him where he is no longer a field officer, no longer subject to the certain responsibility which attaches to the office of a field officer?

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, we appropriate for clerks of the first, second, third, and fourth grades. We do not have to appropriate for the number that are in the service. We can appropriate for a less number and provide for their demotion by an appropriation bill reducing their pay.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. These clerks do not have an original status and responsibility in law which the Army officer has.

Mr. MANN. It is not the same, but a similar responsibility.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Would the gentleman contend that the clerks in a department have that original and initial authority?

Mr. MANN. The departments run the Government. Does not the gentleman know that?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; and the organizations outside run Congress.

Mr. MANN. They may run Congress, but the clerks run the Government and have just as much responsibility as officers of the Army who attempt to run Congress.

Mr. CRAGO. I think the point the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] wants to make is that the law recognizes a distinction between a field officer and a commanding officer. You may change the status of that man where the law gives him certain duties as a field officer.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This man has a distinct constitutional status which is recognized by the fact that his appointment goes to the Senate and is confirmed there. He is established in a certain grade of authority.

Mr. MANN. I know a whole lot of people who believe—and I do not wonder at it—that a man who is appointed as an officer in the Army is fixed for life, so that nobody can change his status.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not believe that.

Mr. MANN. I think Congress still has power over them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Nobody is contending that in connection with this point of order. The contention is, that while it may be done by Congress it ought not to be done and can not be done through the Committee on Appropriations, but a committee that has legislative authority.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Appropriations has legislative authority under the Holman rule to make a reduction in compensation, not merely an appropriation. It has the legislative authority under the Holman rule when it makes a reduction in the compensation and number of persons employed. So the gentleman confuses the idea that we may appropriate only for smaller amounts with that we may legislate under an appropriation bill in reducing compensation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You legislate in the reduction of the compensation, but can you change the status in law of the office to be filled according to existing law? Can you change that law?

Mr. MANN. I think we can. Certainly we can. We have done it frequently.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then I think the gentleman will at least agree with me on this——

Mr. MANN. You say it would be a mere matter of appropriation. The Holman rule gives authority to legislate on an appropriation bill when the purpose, as evidenced, is to change compensation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman, then, give me any reason why the legislative committees in this House should be maintained now that "Bluebeard" is at work?

Mr. MANN. Some of the legislative committees, if they would go to work, would be of great value to the House. Some of them that are always standing aside and saying they have not the power are not of much use to the House. They have power enough if they work. I am not seeking to cast any reflections upon the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Not seeking to do so, but you are kind of aiming straight.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman has said that we have frequently in the House done this very thing of demoting officers from one grade to a lower grade. Can the gentleman give a single instance in this House where we have reduced men from the grade of major to the grade of captain?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether we have had such a case or not.

Mr. KAHN. That is the point that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] was making.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to keep the floor very much longer, but——

Mr. KAHN. This changes absolutely the status.

Mr. MANN. Of course; I understand that.

Mr. HUSTED. Has the Committee on Appropriations, under the Holman rule, any authority to introduce a new provision of law which is not necessarily involved in the process of reduction?

Mr. KAHN. That is the point.

Mr. MANN. Whether or not it is necessary is not for the Chair to determine.

Mr. HUSTED. Unless on its face it is involved in the process of reduction.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me to supplement that, the language on page 16 that was read and to which I have referred, goes into a variety of detail by which a certain legislative policy may be accomplished which does not relate to economy at all. It does not bear upon the principle involved of cutting down the increase for the pay of the officers. This is a supplementary thing which tells how you can get rid of officers.

Mr. MANN. Everybody knows, including my distinguished friend from Vermont, that this is the very basis of the reduction proposed in the Army.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman permit? If Congress can discharge an officer, why can it not demote an officer? Certainly that goes to a less extent, and they could discharge him and turn around and recommission him the next moment.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Congress can. The question is whether the Committee on Appropriations can.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is the point. The question is whether the Appropriations Committee is Congress. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the point of order against the entire paragraph, including the appropriation itself and both provisos.

The Chair thinks we should construe the entire paragraph as one concrete whole, especially as it is quite evident that the second proviso is necessary to carry out the first. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] raises the question of the jurisdiction of the committee. The Chair does not think there is any question about that. The Committee on Appropriations certainly has jurisdiction to bring in an appropriation bill for the pay of the Army, and it may also bring in a paragraph containing legislation, provided that that legislation is in accordance with the rules of the House in considering an appropriation bill. Of course, there is legislation, in the Chair's view, in both provisos, though he thinks he might hold the first proviso in order as a limitation. But there is legislation in both provisos, and the only question is whether this provision of the Holman rule is applicable to the paragraph under consideration:

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

The present occupant of the chair has been called to rule quite a number of times on the Holman rule, and he is one of those who believes that it should be construed strictly. In other words, the present occupant of the chair must see to his satisfaction that the provisions in the bill actually and evidently on their face do reduce expenditures in either of the three ways provided under the Holman rule. It seems to the Chair entirely evident that this provision does reduce expenditures of the Government by a reduction of the number of officers and by the amount of money carried. The Chair thinks that this provision is in order, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment. But before I do it I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if he does not think it would be more logical that we first offer an amendment as to the size of the Army rather than at this time to offer an amendment as to the number of officers? I think the most logical thing to do would be, first, to let the House determine the number of men that they will have in the Army. These other things follow. Of course, I know it is not absolutely an et sequitur that the number of officers would be absolutely determined by the size of the Army, but to a certain extent that is true, and therefore, unless the chairman of the subcommittee has some objection, I would be very glad if, by unanimous consent, we might first go to the size of the Army, determine that, and then return to the number of officers and determine that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as I am personally concerned, and as I think the members of the subcommittee are, the number of officers would be fixed independently of the size of the enlisted strength, and I would rather proceed in the regular way.

Mr. SISSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, in line 4, page 15, strike out the figures "$26,896,200" and insert "$21,863,800," and in line 6, strike out "eleven" and insert "nine." There will be another amendment offered in the event this is adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: Page 15, line 4, strike out the figures "$26,896,200" and insert "$21,863,600," and in line 6, page 15, strike out the word "eleven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "nine."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. SISSON. I have no objection to the gentleman asking a question.

Mr. KAHN. If one desires to offer an amendment to increase the amount carried in the paragraph and also the number of officers, must it be offered as a substitute for the existing provision or can it be offered after a vote has been taken on the existing amendment?

Mr. MANN. May I suggest to the gentleman from California that if the amendment offered to reduce the number is agreed to there could be then no amendment offered to increase it, but if the amendment to reduce the number is not agreed to, then any amendment could be offered to increase or reduce it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Why not offer a substitute?

Mr. MANN. The shortest way would be to vote on an amendment to reduce the number first.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I call to the attention of the committee that in discussing this question we should take into consideration not only the number of officers but the number of men we desire in the Army. It is very difficult to discuss this question without discussing the two together. This amendment which I offer provides for 9,000 officers instead of 11,000. That makes more officers than we had at any time before the World War. If this amendment prevails, or whether it prevails or not, I shall offer an amendment to reduce the number of men, which occurs in the following paragraph, from 115,000 down to 100,000.

Now, I want to discuss briefly that amendment as to the number of men. This will save in the neighborhood of $10,000,000 on this item of the bill alone, and there are a number of other items in the bill that will follow and be reduced as a matter of course if you should adopt the amendment reducing the number down to 100,000 or reduce the number of officers to 9,000.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, I do not believe that this country can afford to ignore what is going on in the world. I do not believe you can afford to say to the balance of the world that we are unwilling to disarm to a considerable extent on land after calling the first world conference. Prior to that time we called the nations together in Europe and they there agreed upon the League of Nations, the purpose of which, as understood by the people of America, was to reduce armaments, and the manifest and declared purpose of America, and the stated and declared purpose of the President in calling the nations of the world together in this conference which has just adjourned, was that we might remove from the people the burdens of taxation brought about by the large military establishments of the nations of the world. If you Republicans and your President are sincere in what you say, you will agree to my amendment. Do not fool the people; make good your promises.

Now, let us look at what our neighbors are doing. I invite your careful attention to this. I do not think a more important vote will be taken in this House during this session of Congress than the vote you are going to take on the size of the Army and number of officers. I think it means not only millions of dollars to the taxpayers, but it means a great deal toward defining the policy of this Government and the future policy of the world with reference to military matters; and if you are conscientious and if you feel about this matter as I do, then certainly you will give this your very careful attention.

Now, let us see what England is doing. The English Government has a budget now pending which calls for an army of 210,000 men. This does not include the troops in India. They have an army in India of 70,000 men, but all of that army is paid for out of the Indian treasury. Now, even the most ultramilitarist in control of affairs in England is calling for only 210,000 men, and the committee having that bill in charge are themselves willing to reduce that number by 33,000 men.

There was a committee appointed to look over the entire budget in England, that committee being known as the Geddes committee.

The committee consists of Sir Eric Geddes, M. P. (chairman); Lord Inchcape; Lord Faringdon; Sir Joseph Maclay; and Sir Guy Granet.

The following were the terms of reference:

To make recommendations to the chancellor of the exchequer for effecting forthwith all possible reductions in the national expenditures on supply services, having regard especially to the present and prospective position of the revenue. In so far as questions of policy are involved in the expenditure under discussion, these will remain for the exclusive consideration of the cabinet, but it will be open to the committee to review the expenditure and to indicate the economies which might be effected if particular policies were either adopted, abandoned, or modified.

The committee finds that in 1914–15 all ranks, British, native, and colonial troops, were 181,000, and the 1922–23 estimates 210,000. The committee complains that there is a material increase, both in cost and numbers, and this applies both to officers and men, and to British as well as native troops.

The units also from the point of view of fighting efficiency are far more powerful than they were in 1914–15. Owing to the production of machine guns, the fire power of an infantry battalion is given as six to eight times as much as it was before the war, and that of a cavalry regiment four times as much as it was before the war. The introduction of heavy artillery, gas, and tanks has increased the fighting power out of all comparison with the number of men engaged, and officers who are intended to increase the efficiency of the army have increased disproportionately to the men. Moreover, there has been added to the defense force of the empire the very costly and highly specialized arm of the air. There will, therefore, be a more powerful army than we had before the war.

This committee also recommend a reduction of the army by 50,000.

We are convinced from our survey of the war office estimates that there is great room for economy in men and money without in any way endangering the defense of the empire.

CONCLUSIONS.

As a result of our consideration we are of the opinion—

(1) That man power has been estimated on a lavish scale for 1922–23, and that a reduction of 50,000 officers and men could be made without in any way reducing the forces employed by the war office on foreign service.

(2) That the introduction of new arms and corps and of the air force, which have been created with the object of increasing the fighting efficiency of the defense forces of the empire, is not reflected in corresponding reductions in other directions, and that savings could be made in that account.

(3) That there has been an increase in all the ancillary and auxiliary services of the army which the country can not afford and in which drastic economies should be made.

(4) That the abnormal reserve of mobilization equipment and arms now held is costly to store, guard, and maintain, and that the effect of holding it results in heavy additional indirect cost.

(5) That the army estimates for 1922–23 should be reduced from £75,197,800 to £55,000,000 for that year, and that in the subsequent year still lower estimates should suffice.

In this recommendation no account is taken of possible further reductions resulting from a review by the Government of our military requirements at home and abroad, normal and abnormal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this is the most important feature of this bill. There will be a good deal of discussion on it, and I trust I may have unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Now, gentlemen, I am going to talk as rapidly as I can, because this is a great big question and I have much that I want to say. If I had time I would read to you the whole recommendation made by the Geddes committee, which was a committee appointed to review the entire budget of England. It is admitted that those in charge of the English budget are willing to reduce the size of the army by 33,000, and it is a certainty that there will be that reduction from the 210,000 originally reported; but this Geddes committee, made up of five of the most distinguished statesmen in England, recommend and urge that the peace conference ought to mean something to the taxpayers of the world, and they recommend the size of the English Army be reduced 50,000 instead of reducing it 33,000—that is to say that the present budget provides for 160,000 instead of 210,000. Now, take into consideration what England has to guard. In the first place, she has to guard South Africa and her other African possessions. She has to guard her islands in the sea. She has to guard the Suez Canal, Egypt, and Gibraltar, and Canada. She is not yet quite through with the war in Ireland. She has to guard Scotland and England. It seems to me, therefore, that England's Army is 100 per cent more important to her than our Army can possibly be to us. She is exposed everywhere. We are exposed nowhere, except in the Philippines.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that Australia and New Zealand and South Africa, as well as India, have their own troops to guard their possessions?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and it is equally true that every State in this Union has its National Guard to control its possessions. [Applause.] It is equally true that the Philippine Islands have the Philippine Scouts. Oh, that is a dodge which I did not expect my friend from California to assume. On the contrary, the principal purpose of England's standing army would be to prevent revolt from her authority, and the fact that the colonies have these large armies would be a splendid excuse for the British Empire to have a strong army in addition to her colonial troops. But I know that my good friend from California [Mr. KAHN] is the avowed friend of militarism——

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. SISSON. I know that he speaks for the militarists of the country. I know that the militarists throughout the world listen to his words. I know that he models his views to meet the approval of all the Army officers. I know that his views meet approval wherever big Army men exist, not only here but everywhere. I know all that. But I want to say to my friend that I do not believe the country will follow him now in time of peace.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman from California was in favor of universal military training.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; my friend from California wanted universal compulsory military training. He believes wholly in the Prussian idea of an army.

Now, gentlemen, do you know that when you have 100,000 men in the Army now you have a military strength equal to 800,000 men as compared with the Army at the outbreak of the war? Did you know that? Did you know that the experts in England and our own military experts here estimate that under the modern method of arming soldiers with rapid-fire guns, with machine guns, with gas, and with tanks, one soldier is six times as efficient as he was before the World War? In other words, for police purposes within the Nation, the Army is easily worth eight times what it formerly was, man for man. The Geddes committee in England states that it is conservative to say that a soldier now is equal to eight soldiers before the war. If that be true, then with 100,000 men you have the equivalent of 800,000 men before the war. This certainly ought to satisfy even my friend from California [Mr. KAHN], if, indeed, an Army ever was big enough for him.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is true if you can put one man in eight different places in continental America at the same time. That is the proposition that is involved.

Mr. SISSON. I am glad my friend raised that question. This House has repeatedly passed a bill to reduce the number of military posts in the United States. We have now 169 places, in round numbers, which are supposed to be guarded by soldiers. During the Indian wars in the early days we had these posts out West. I believe the President and the Secretary of War have the authority to get rid of these posts. I do not agree with my friends that Congress can not have anything to say about the disposition of troops, but I have not time to discuss that. And I do believe that under his authority as Commander in Chief of the Army he may abandon these posts.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. When did we first provide in this country for an Army of 100,000 men?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman means as a limitation down?

Mr. MANN. Up.

Mr. SISSON. We never did have, unless it was just before we entered the war, as many as 100,000 men.

Mr. MANN. I was under the impression that the limit of the Army to 100,000 men was about 20 years ago.

Mr. SISSON. I think that is true.

Mr. MANN. There has been since then not only some increase of population but a considerable increase in the activities of the Army.

Mr. SISSON. I think that is true.

Mr. MANN. Assuming that the limit of 100,000 men was about right 15 or 20 years ago, would it not be perfectly right and proper to add 25 per cent to that number?

Mr. SISSON. I do not think so; I think 100,000 men are infinitely more efficient to-day than they were then; and let me say that we did not have 100,000 men in the Army; for a long time we had much less than 75,000; and while Mr. Hay was chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs the limit was raised to 90,000; but we never had that number in the Army.

Mr. MANN. We never have had anything like the number in the Army that was authorized.

Mr. SISSON. That is true.

Mr. MANN. We had a limit of 100,000 nearly 20 years ago, and since then we have added the Chemical Warfare Service, the Air Service, and a number of other services that I suppose required quite a large number of men.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. In 1903 Congress passed the reorganization bill. That was after the Spanish-American War, and the Congress authorized the maximum number of 100,000 enlisted men. Congress did not appropriate for that number, and for quite a number of years we went along with 50,000, 60,000, and even 70,000 men. We finally got up to 100,000 men just before we passed the national defense act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to suggest to the gentleman that there is a statute in full force and effect which provides that the Secretary of War may at any time abandon any post or arsenal of the Government.

Mr. SISSON. I am glad the gentleman has called my attention to that law; I had overlooked it.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. The fact that we have never had more than 60,000 men is one of the strongest arguments in support of the gentleman's contention.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and I want to say in answer to my friend from California that we never at any time had anything like the number of men authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may have 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Now, gentlemen, in view of the fact that after the Spanish-American War and when we were in a race with the other nations of the world in building up arms and armament, we never had as many enlisted men on the average as 60,000 men in the Army. Now, if we mean what we say by this conference, then we are going to reduce our Army. Have we attended a conference in which we agreed that there shall be a reduction of arms and armament here, and then immediately turn our backs upon that and proceed as if we had never done so? Because the contention was that the largest Army that England had prior to the war was 171,000 men, the budget was submitted for 210,000, and after the conference here the committee propose to reduce the 210,000 men for all England, including all of her colonies except India, down to 160,000. England did not propose to be placed in a false light by going before the world with that increase. That matter is now being considered in Parliament.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am at a loss to know what conference the gentleman has in mind. The gentleman spoke of a conference agreeing to a limitation of armament.

Mr. SISSON. Where has the gentleman been for the last few months?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have been right here, and I am present with the gentleman this morning.

Mr. SISSON. Is the gentleman serious in his inquiry?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes. What conference has there been agreeing to a limitation of land armament?

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman is going to be so highly technical—we agreed to reduce our Navy, and are you to say that we are not to reduce the Army, that there has been no agreement to reduce the Army? The British Government is acting in good faith and we want to act in good faith.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps the gentleman has alluded to the Geddes conference.

Mr. SISSON. No; I was speaking of the conference here in Washington.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Can the gentleman remember what the authorization for this country was at the time of the peace conference, or what the appropriation for last year was?

Mr. SISSON. The authorization last year, as I recall, by special act of Congress, was 175,000 men.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. And we appropriated for how many?

Mr. SISSON. One hundred and fifty thousand men.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Does not the gentleman think, in view of the fact that when the peace conference was in session we had an Army of 150,000 men, that a substantial reduction of 35,000 would create a very favorable impression in England?

Mr. SISSON. I do not think so. While 150,000 is authorized, the total enlisted strength at present of the Army is only about 130,000. If I had my way about it, I would go lower than 100,000, but I was hoping that we might reach 100,000 as a compromise and as a settlement of the matter.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. How low would the gentleman go?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know just how low I would go. I have not considered my minimum at all.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I want to correct a statement the gentleman made. He said that we had 175,000 men authorized, and that we reduced the number to 150,000. We have an authorization for 280,000.

Mr. SISSON. I know; but a resolution providing for only 175,000 men passed and was the thing that governed and controlled us in making that appropriation.

Mr. KAHN. That was only in the Committee on Appropriations that that was done.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Indiana asked me what we appropriated for, and I answered him correctly.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman has referred to proposed reductions in the British Army as if that program had been adopted by the British Government. Is it not a fact that the figures which the gentleman has used are merely contained in what is known as the Geddes report, and that the Geddes report has not been adopted by the British Government or by the House of Commons?

Mr. SISSON. I have said that several times, but the estimate which they can not now increase is 210,000 men, and the war committee is willing now to reduce it by 33,000, while the Geddes committee recommends that it be reduced by 50,000 men; that is, down to 160,000.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Speaking of the figures of the reduction proposed by the Geddes report and by the ministry, the gentleman has not said that in proportion as they reduce the enlisted men they propose to increase the commissioned officers.

Mr. SISSON. They do not do that, either.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then I do not know what I am talking about.

Mr. SISSON. The Geddes committee makes no such recommendation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I did not refer to the Geddes committee. I just made a reference to the policy of the ministry.

Mr. SISSON. The ministry is very much divided upon the question of the size of the Army, but the Geddes committee say, in so many words, that under the proposed army of 210,000, with men and the proposed officers, it is top-heavy in officers. That is the trouble with our Army here. It is top-heavy with officers.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It was not when the war broke out.

Mr. SISSON. No; and I do not intend, so far as my vote is concerned, to keep on the backs of the people the number of officers that you must have while we are conducting a war. What war are you going to fight now? Tell me. There is no cloud that I see on the horizon.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There was not any cloud to be seen just before that night we met here.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, you people who are enthusiastic with Prussian ideas, the last one of you, from Captain Hobson on down, were pointing for a long time at Japan, claiming that Japan was going to come over and fight us, and then the next thing when they found that Japan would not they adopted Germany, and they saw Germany crossing the Atlantic and fighting us to death.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Well, we got Germany, did we not?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; but we crossed the ocean to Germany. She did not come over after us. There is always a bugaboo every time you want to get money out of the Treasury. I am tired of our being frightened to death with the idea that we are going to have a war every few weeks. Oh, no, gentlemen, when you are looking for ghosts you usually find them. When the Army bill is up ghosts appear and will not down till the bill is passed.

Mr. VAILE. Was Germany a ghost? It seems to me, if so, she was a pretty lively one.

Mr. SISSON. I did not say that Germany was. I say that if you are looking for ghosts, you find one; and you are looking for ghosts now. We had to get Germany. She did not come to us. No nation has ever declared war on us first in our history.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman take into consideration in answering the militarists, that there are 64,000 trained reserve officers ready to take the field within 12 hours' notice today?

Mr. SISSON. Oh, you can not ever answer them. It is money they want. They never accept anything unless they see a uniform on every street corner, and I want to remind gentlemen that no nation was ever made strong and great and powerful, either in time of peace or time of war, by multiplying army officers and uniforms. You can not make a nation great in time of war by placing burdens upon the backs of the people so great that they are enervated and weak when the war does come. There is not a nation in this world to-day that is standing strong and foursquare to all the winds that relied on arms of a military character to make her great and preserve her. Where is the boasted German Empire with her supermen? These unprepared nations caused her to bite the dust, and why? Because her own people did not believe in her Government, and if you will continue your policy here of increasing the expenditure and increasing the number of uniforms all over this country, you are going to find that the people will lose confidence in you and in your Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 4, after the word "staff," strike out the figures "$26,896,200" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$32,631,500."

On page 15, line 6, after the word "than," strike out the word "eleven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirteen."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I like to listen to my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. He has a good voice, and he uses it [laughter] on the floor to good effect. I want to read to the gentleman from Mississippi from his own speech of April 28, 1913, before the World War broke out at all, before they had anything like war in Europe, and before, certainly, this country got into it. Now, I agreed with the gentleman from Mississippi at that time, because I believe any State has the right to govern certain things in certain ways. This is what the gentleman said:

I maintain as a principle of good government that a nonresident alien should not be permitted to own a foot of land in America. The situation in California is a very critical one, and I trust that I may not say anything that will in the least tend to prevent a friendly settlement or embarrass our State Department in its effort to retain the friendship of Japan; but before I would surrender the right to control a foot of American soil to Japan or any other nation on earth or to permit any other nation to dictate the land laws to one of these sovereign States I would fight——

Mr. SISSON. As the gentleman read it, I did not say "Southern"——

Mr. KAHN. "Sovereign States, I would fight." [Laughter.] I want to show——

Mr. SISSON. I stand by it now. It was good doctrine then, and it is good doctrine now.

Mr. KAHN. As far as I am concerned, I am a Representative from the sovereign State of California, and agree to all the gentleman said; but I respectfully submit that to listen to the gentleman nowadays there is not a particle of fight in his whole composition. [Laughter and applause.] But can the gentleman say positively that we will not have such a question to again confront us? There come times in the history of every country where you have got to defend the rights of the country or sink into abject——

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. No; I want to finish this; and if I have a little time later I will yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. Very well.

Mr. KAHN. I also want to read this statement from the gentleman's speech:

The coercion of the people of California in this right is a precedent for any coercion, however drastic, when in the future the demand shall be made by a powerful government. It will be a miserable piece of cringing cowardice for us to yield now, and I am with the good people of California in their fight, and I am willing to vote the last dollar in the Treasury for the defense of her right to control her sacred soil.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent to continue for about 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Now, I simply call attention to these excerpts from the speech of my friend from Mississippi to show that no government on earth can tell when a country is absolutely safe; and so I have always contended that it is the duty of the Congress, representing the people of the United States, to be so prepared that if anything should happen the country would not be quite helpless. [Applause.] But if we had gotten into war, as the gentleman suggested, how would he proceed to fight without officers or men to fight with? Now, before the World War, as I said the other day, we had only about $1,000,000,000 of indebtedness. By reason of our utter lack of preparedness we had to expend in 19 months $24,000,000,000. Of course, we won the war. We won it in 19 months, and yet that 19 months was not all spent in fighting the enemy. Thirteen months of that time our people were getting ready to fight. The other nations—England, France, Belgium, and Italy—were holding the lines while the American officers and enlisted men were being trained. If we had had no help of that kind, how long would we have been able to hold the lines against Germany or any other great militaristic country? That same kind of thing may happen again. We have not settled our differences across the border. Mexico has not been recognized as yet. The President of the United States, President Wilson, had to call out 100,000 men to defend our border in 1916 before we got into the World War at all. Our National Guard went down there, and the training they got down there helped materially when those very men got into the World War a little later. I do not know what country will ever want to fight us. I sincerely hope no country will ever want to fight us. I hope we will have no war at all. The gentleman says I am a militarist. I am not as much of a militarist as he is, because I never said "fight Japan." I never got into that controversy at all. I tried to avoid that very thing, and I think, thank the Lord, that we have avoided that, and that we will be able to settle our differences without the use of arms. I hope so very earnestly. [Applause.] But I still feel that it is an essential thing that my country should be ready for any possible emergencies. The figures I read here to the House a few days ago I think show conclusively that the United States has a smaller Army than any other nation in the world in comparison to population. The conference that was held here not long ago was a naval disarmament conference.

There was no attempt to cut down the Army. The armies were not referred to, and properly. No nation asked for army disarmament. France, as I recall, through her official representative, M. Briand, made a vigorous protest against army reduction. We took no action regarding the armies, and yet I feel that at this time we are taking a very serious step if we intend to cut down the Army below what is a fair base.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. As I say, our Army is lower than any other nation in the world in proportion to population. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANTHONY. Do I understand correctly that the gentleman's substitute would provide for 13,000 officers, the number we now have?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then why is it the gentleman has reported out from his committee and there is pending before the House here a bill which reduces the number to 12,000 officers? Why does he take one position here and another position at another time?

Mr. KAHN. No; I am not taking a different position at all. That bill was introduced at the request of General Pershing and General Harbord, our chief of staff and his able assistant. It would reduce the number to 12,000, but immediately it would build up again to 13,000. It would enable our Army to build up in the lower grades of first and second lieutenants. I do not know but that General Pershing was before the Committee on Appropriations of the House to explain the whole matter.

He certainly was before the Military Committee, and that committee after due deliberation considered that his proposition for the welfare of our country was one that we could well afford to adopt.

I am no more a militarist than is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. He does not look at these things in the same light that I do. Of course, I have never quarreled with him about his position. I know he was directly opposed to things that I advocated during the World War. He had the right to advocate those things, and I think none the less of him for having advocated them. But I see this thing purely from the standpoint of what is best for the United States. The people of this country do not want war, but the people of this country want a certain preparation that will prevent any nation on earth trying conclusions with us and costing us additional enormous sums of money, which the taxpayers of this country will be called upon to meet for many years. We have hard work to pay the taxes now on the $24,000,000,000. In addition, we are paying the taxes on the additional $11,000,000,000 that we loaned our cobelligerents. If we had gone to work in 1916 and courageously had passed laws to put this country into a reasonable state of preparedness, the chances are that that World War would never have come to us, and the people of the United States would have been spared the burden of carrying that enormous indebtedness.

Now, gentlemen, I appeal to you not to make the mistake of 1916 again. Be Americans! Stand for the rights of Americans! We ask you simply to support a provision for a reasonable number of officers and men; let us try to keep the peace of the world with the comparatively few that we have. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am not surprised at the argument made by my friend from California [Mr. KAHN]. When the Chief of Staff and his aids appeared before the Military Committee with a bill that called for 13,000 officers and a plucking board, by which all they took off would be put on retired pay and every man that had been in the service for 10 years would draw 75 per cent of his pay, and also the confession and admission from the Chief of Staff that now, having about 13,000 officers in the Army, there is not a single second lieutenant in all that number of thousands of officers, it shows you that they endeavor to promote and put the salary basis as high as possible on the taxpayers of this country.

My friend, the chairman of that committee, and his colleagues, over my protest, voted that sort of a bill out for this Congress to pass, and his amendment to this Army appropriation bill is the purported bill that the General Staff had passed through that committee.

Gentlemen, the amendment of my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] does not go far enough. I am going to vote with him for the 9,000 officers, because he thinks it as low as the House will adopt, but it really ought to be 7,000 instead of 9,000. You have in the United States now, four years after the close of the Great War in Europe, 64,000 well-trained officers of the Reserve Army of the United States. You have fully 4,000,000 well-trained soldiers in the United States. You had a disarmament conference in the city of Washington, called by the President of the United States, where the leading nations of the earth participated. You had as a result of that conference the leading nations of the world taking down the mastheads from the great battleships, reducing the naval armaments, and our great Government pursuing the sensible policy of agreeing to that and taking the lead.

Those other nations have great countries across their borders. The United States of America is off here by herself, with oceans separating us from any possible enemies. Surely the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] would not consider Mexico as a factor in wanting this country to be armed to the teeth and to the guards all the time. Certainly he would not consider that across the Isthmus of Panama the attitude of any Latin American countries as justifying this country maintaining a large army and large corps of officers? He says we should always be prepared. The American people have enjoyed peace in this country so long as our country has remained in pursuit of peaceful operations and not being armed to the guards. The best way to get into a war is to always have a big standing army and a great growth of Army officers. And the next best way is to have a great fleet, with great battleships and dreadnaughts and admirals, and all that go with it. But, thanks to the results of the disarmament conference, we now see daylight out from under the great Navy burden and the danger of war. It is the duty of the United States of America to lead the way and be the advance guard among the nations of the earth in disarmament.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. QUIN. This great Republic of ours, standing as the exponent of the republican form of government, should stand as the chief exponent of peace, and with us having our hearts right, with this Government showing and demonstrating by its conduct, after this disarmament conference, that it is ready to be a disarmed Government, it will cause the other nations of the earth to reduce their armaments in like proportion.

A senator in the Chamber in France the other day made the broad statement that since the war is over the debt of France has increased by half, so that all the wealth of France is staggering under a nominal bonded indebtedness up to 80 per cent of its value. Is it possible that the gentleman from California would want to set the example in the United States of having this Government pursue a similar insane policy? The other nations of the earth are looking to the United States of America to pursue a sensible and sane policy, if we mean what we have been preaching. Since the war was over this Government has endeavored, through public utterances and through party platform pledges, to maintain a position of peace toward the other nations of the earth, and that by a reduction of its arms, both on sea and on land. But if we carry out the insane policy of increasing the Army at this hour, when we have the 64,000 reserve officers, well trained, placing the Army of the United States under a Regular Army corps of officers of 13,000, what can the other nations of the earth expect of us? They know our condition as well as we know it ourselves. And with this country now staggering under all these billions of dollars of bonded indebtedness, with this country needing to call for the saving of every dollar to be put into some peaceful pursuit or enterprise, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] would propose to have 13,000 officers in the Army and the number of soldiers to justify that. What number of soldiers would 13,000 officers be capable of handling? At least 200,000 men. Perhaps the gentleman from California agrees with the Chief of Staff, that it makes no difference how small the Army might be, you still need 13,000 officers; you still need the full corps of general officers.

He asserts that you will need a full corps of general officers, brigadier generals and majors and all, including 67 generals, but at present the Army has not a single second lieutenant. Sixty-seven generals! This House is called upon to vote and set a standard as to whether this Republic means to keep faith with the arms conference. Does not the gentleman from California know what every sensible man in the world knows, that when this great reduction of naval forces was agreed by all the big governments of this earth that agreement naturally included with it tacit agreement as to a reduction of the Army? Circumstances were a little different with France, as every well-informed man in this country knows. But so far as this Government is concerned, they know and we know that we do not need any big Army.

The gentleman asks what number we will agree to. We ought not to have a man over 50,000 in our Army. What do we need them for? The gentleman from California said the other day before the committee that we need in case of an earthquake, as in the case of that calamity at San Francisco, to preserve order. Can we not use the National Guard in such an emergency? It will prove ample. In ordinary times we do not need them except to keep down riots and to preserve order.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. What do you need the 50,000 for?

Mr. QUIN. Just for the same purpose as you need the National Guard, simply to keep order. You do not need an Army to go out and fight somebody that we are not mad with, somebody that is not going to meddle with us. When the agreement was made to reduce the size of navies it was then proclaimed and understood that if any nation tried to transport soldiers to another part of the earth with hostile purpose they would be helpless because of the lack of naval facilities.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Where would the gentleman get the National Guard from if you had an accident like the San Francisco accident? The Army was already there. You could not get your National Guard.

Mr. QUIN. Why, the National Guard of your own State would certainly be able to prevent looting and be powerful in preserving order.

Oh, it is nonsense to want 13,000 officers in order to be ready for an earthquake. [Laughter and applause.] We never dreamed we would ever have any earthquakes in the United States except over there in San Francisco, and I hope we shall never have another one. The gentleman would have that great number of officers and not one single lieutenant. The second lieutenant is the man who gets close to the fighting front. It seems they do not want any of them in the Army, when they are very essential men in the Army.

The second lieutenant is much in demand, and yet the General Staff, which has asked for 13,000 officers, has not a single second lieutenant in the Army to-day, and the gentleman from California knows that, and he heard the Chief of Staff testify to it, and yet he puts in an amendment here asking for 13,000 officers.

Who is going to pay for it? The poor people of the United States, the men who make their living in the sweat of their brows. They would be the men who would have to pay the amount necessary to equip and keep up all these officers and the Army that would go with them. This Government of ours has gone far afield, but now it is time for us to come back to the old landmarks. Let us get close to the standard that the fathers intended. The old Jeffersonian standard is good enough for me, and I believe it is good enough for the great mass of the people throughout the Republic. Instead of following the doctrines and preachments of the distinguished gentleman from California, I believe that this House would do well to take into consideration some of the past history of this Republic, some of the teachings of the philosophers of government who really had some feeling for the hearthstones of this Nation and some sympathy with the sentiments of our people. The attitude of our Republic has never been one of hostility toward anyone. The United States Government, standing as the forerunner, bearing the torch of liberty, and demanding "equal justice and equal rights to all, and special privileges to none"—that sort of a government does not need a great standing Army and a large number of officers to be a burden upon the masses of the people. The humble citizens, and those who toil for their living, should be respected by this House on this vote. I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have never been a large-Army man. I have never been a large-Navy man. Yet my views were at least slightly modified by an experience in connection with the war. I came back from my home one fall while the war was in progress, before we had entered the war, and made a proposition to the House. I had believed for years that "coming events always cast their shadows before," and that no war came suddenly which was not foreseen by the far-sighted statesmen. I think that is true. I do not think war ever breaks out suddenly that has not been foreseen. I thought that if occasion arose, where the United States was likely to be involved in war, the statesmen of our country could easily see far enough ahead to commence to make provision for war, and when I came back here that fall I could see our country entering the war as plainly as I can see the faces before me in the House. It seemed to me inevitable that we would get into the war in Europe.

I urged this House with all the power I had to then provide for an army of half a million men. If we should get into war, we would need them; if we should not, we could thank God we kept out so cheaply.

If our Democratic friends in charge at that time—and I am not criticizing them for their point of view—had made that provision and we had had an army of half a million men, both regular and temporary, at the time we entered the war, we would have saved $15,000,000,000 and saved the entering into the Army of more than 2,000,000 American citizens. [Applause.] And I am convinced now that though you can see war in the immediate future a Republic like ours will not provide for it until after it is in it.

Now, that is the case. I am not in favor of a big army, and I am not in favor of the littlest army that is possible. I think we ought to vote down the proposed increase, and then more emphatically vote down the proposed decrease, and stand where the bill provides. [Applause.]

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I know full well that economy of administration is uppermost in the minds of the people of this country to-day. I know they want the War Department to curtail expenses; but I know that they do not agree with the ideas of the two gentlemen from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON and Mr. QUIN] who have just spoken. Over 20 years I lived in the State of Mississippi, and they were the happiest years of my life. I believe I know the point of view of Mississippians, and I do not think they would want to adopt a policy such as has been suggested which would wreck the Army of the United States.

I am against such radical reduction as is advocated by the two gentlemen from Mississippi. I am against the idea of framing practically the military policy of the Nation here on the floor without due consideration. [Applause.] The proposition for a radical reduction, coming as an amendment to an appropriation bill, makes it all the more harmful. In 1920 after coming through the greatest war in the history of the world we spent months in considering what should be the proper military policy of our Nation, and finally Congress passed a bill which became a law and which is now the accepted military policy, and it was the duty of the Secretary of War and of the General Staff to act in accordance with that policy. The provisions of this bill as to the procedure to be taken to reduce the officers is changing completely the present policy and scheme of organization. Army officers without warning are dismissed. A great deal has been said here about Army officers. I want to say that the officers of our Army are as fine men as live in this land. Hundreds of the officers now in the Army were emergency officers who had been attracted to the service by their experience in the war. They read the act of 1920 as determining the future policy of our Nation with reference to its Army, and in good faith they made applications, passed the examinations, and were accepted in the Army.

Now, without a hearing and without due consideration by the committee whose duty it is to study legislation affecting the Army, it is proposed to jam through a measure which cuts off their heads or retires them, after they have chosen the Army as the subject of their study and their work for life. This would not be fair treatment. I am opposed to thus destroying our military organization that has been built up under the policy adopted in 1920 in the reorganization law, simply because of the desire for economy. It seems to me we have already adopted an economical policy. In the bill which has been reported we have reduced the Army, both officers and enlisted men, far below the number recommended by our military advisers, General Pershing and the Secretary of War. When I came here a few years ago I heard day after day taunts at the then administration, the administration that I was interested in supporting, because they had not prepared the Nation for a great emergency. If we were not prepared then as we should have been, how much greater would be the folly of not listening to sound military advisers. Here we are emerging from the war, and we are cutting down and cutting down, and we have the spectacle of our Chief of Staff, General Pershing, appealing to the country against a committee which reports a bill which in his opinion would destroy the morale of the Army and greatly cripple our military organization. Secretary Weeks has likewise appealed to the country. I hope the Committee of the Whole will not accept any such reduction as proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi, but will accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I am in receipt of a telegram which calls me away from the city for a few days. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a telegram this morning advising me of the fact that my presence is required in the circuit court of my home city in a case growing out of my efforts to obtain justice for the four and one-half million brave and patriotic men who uncomplainingly, unflinchingly, yea, courageously, offered themselves upon the arena of war in defense of our national honor, our cherished liberty, and the civilization of the world. I welcome an opportunity to defend any assertion that I have made in their behalf, either in public or private, but I regret that this utterly unfounded, if not malicious, suit is to be the cause of my inability to be here and cast my vote for the adjusted compensation bill, which in all probability will be taken up in the House and voted upon before my return. I have this satisfaction, however, that at every opportunity, upon every occasion, and in every legitimate way at my command I have urged upon my colleagues the justness of this legislation, and I leave here under these conditions with an abiding faith that this Congress will exercise the proper judgment and give to our Nation's defenders that which in simple justice they are so richly deserving.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the proponents of this bill have met with the most insiduous propaganda that was ever offered in opposition to any legislation in the Halls of this Congress, nor am I unmindful of the fact that most of this campaign of misrepresentation emanates from sinister or political motives. With the few who have registered their opposition to the measure purely from the standpoint of national policy I have no quarrel, but with those who register their opposition from personal, political, or mercenary motives I do have a quarrel, yea, more, a contempt which I shall register here on the floor of this House that my children and my children's children may know that I possessed the moral courage to stand up and fight for common justice toward those brave and courageous men who saved the flag of my country and the civilization of the world in that, the darkest hour of all the ages past.

When war was declared and the trumpet sounded, I can well remember the sights of the brave and stalwart sons as they planted the parting kiss upon the furrowed brow of a loving mother, or caressed for the last time, perchance, a true and devoted wife, and donned the uniform to fight for the principles of eternal right. I can well remember the anxiety with which we waited their arrival on foreign soil, and how with bated breath we awaited the outcome of the first engagement of American troops with the ever-advancing hordes of German assassins. I can well remember the shouts of praise that followed the announcement of their deeds of valor on foreign fields, and I heard, as with one acclaim, "The Nation can never repay them for the sacrifice they have made." Then I can well remember the anxiety felt as we watched their progress for days and weeks and months in that gigantic struggle which meant defeat or victory, and at last, thank God, I remember the glad tidings of "American soldiers break the Hindenburg line and turn the tide to victory." Oh, yes; we said then, but I say now, this Nation owes them a debt which it can never pay. To the patriotic men of my district which furnished the first American blood to be spilled on foreign soil, and which furnished the soldier who was said to be the greatest hero of all the war, to the millions of ex-service men throughout America, I say your sacrifices shall not have been made in vain, and that this Nation will not, can not, and must not turn a deaf ear to your righteous demands.

Ah, we are told now that the sentiment of the people has turned against the adjusted compensation for ex-service men. I deny it with all the vehemence of my soul. The international bankers, the war-made millionaires, the profiteers of America are the ones that most bitterly oppose the payment of a bonus. They are the ones proclaiming the Nation too poor to assume so just a burden, yet they are the selfsame individuals that are willing to see and are urging the United States to cancel the $11,000,000,000 now due and owing us by foreign Governments. Why, can you imagine, do they cry with one breath a "Nation too poor to pay a soldier," and in the very next urge the United States to cancel a debt that will more than four times over pay the debt to the men that saved their fortunes and their liberty in the greatest war of all the world. Their opposition is based upon mercenary motives. They have loaned to foreigners millions, yes, billions of dollars, some of which they stand to lose if this Government does not give this huge sum to these nations. I want to say here and now that America will never cancel one cent of that claim with my vote, even though American money hoarders lose every "sou" they have loaned in these countries. There are others, some of whom oppose this bill under the pretext that the financial condition of the Treasury is not such as to warrant the withdrawal of a sum sufficient to meet the requirements of this bill, but conceding the Nation to be burdened—and it is—with a tremendous debt, much of which was incurred as a result of inefficiency, extravagance, and waste; yet this money when paid over to the ex-service men of America will remain in America to increase the taxable wealth of the Nation and in time restore to the Treasury of the United States all and more than the outlay. Some of those who oppose this bonus, and I speak now of my Democratic brethren, were willing to accept a mandate for Armenia after the World War at the expense of keeping as the least possible number 59,000 American boys on Armenian soil, with a possibility of increasing that number to 200,000 at any time and at a cost of $276,000,000 for the first year and $756,000,000 for the five years. You were not only willing to do this but you wanted America immediately following the war to loan to the bankrupt nations of Europe millions of dollars which you knew they could never nor would ever pay, and just why you wanted to do this I do not know, and just why you would do it now if you had control of the Government is beyond my conception. It is sufficient to say that after the signing of the armistice and after the war was over in Europe you did loan to European nations the stupendous sum of $2,515,853,946.98, and this is a part of that sum which we hear so much about it being our duty to cancel at this time. The dates when these loans were made, the country to whom loaned, and the amount to each is as follows:

Not only did you loan this stupendous sum to Europe after war was over, but certain of your leaders are to-day bemoaning the fact that a Republican Congress in 1920 prevented your administration from loaning, or giving, so to speak, to these same countries an additional $500,000,000. I quote an excerpt from an article appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 1, 1921, over the signature of the chairman of your national organization, Mr. Hull, in which he branded the defeat of the Versailles peace treaty as "the blackest of all the black crimes committed in the annals of the human race," and further commented upon the failure of the United States to continue a policy of giving, loaning and giving to Europe, while our heroic soldiers were dying at our very doors from disease and hunger. He said:

> In vain did Henry P. Davidson and other great financiers as late as the early spring of 1920 fairly shout that the crisis is so acute that the situation does not admit of delay except with the possibility of consequences one hardly dare contemplate. Mr. Davidson and many other economists and business men were then urging the creation of a revolving fund of $500,000,000 by this Government * * * to be placed in the hands of a strong commission of our ablest business men to be utilized as temporary credits to the helpless States of Europe. This plea was received with deaf ears by Republican leaders bent on every sort of pandemonium if it was necessary to enable them later to carry the national election of 1920.

If the defeat of the Versailles treaty was the blackest of all the black crimes committed in the annals of the human race, as he says, then his charges must necessarily be lodged against the fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, comrades and friends of our gallant troops who, by a majority of more than 7,000,000, approved the judgment of the Republican leaders who were responsible for the defeat of that unholy pact which not only committed the financial resources of this Nation but the blood of our citizenry to the maintenance and protection of the bloodthirsty militaristic nations of Europe.

The financiers of New York were the advocates of the League of Nations; they were the proponents of the $500,000,000 credits to which the gentleman, Mr. Hull, referred; they were the advocates of this country going to war months in advance of our real participation therein, because the possession of $5,000,000,000 of allied indebtedness by New York money interests led them to believe that their loans would be worthless if the Allies were defeated, and hence they cried aloud and the people were daily reminded of the insecurity of New York City; they were the strongest advocates of the draft law, and when the boys returned to native soil after achieving the greatest victory of all the world, these same financiers, in order to make sure that their enormous loans were not further impaired, oppose a bonus in any form and simply denounce as infamous any plan that looks to the payment of such a bonus based on the debts now owing us by these foreign Governments to which their loans are made.

Multimillionaires made great fortunes during a few years of war, which were saved from German indemnity by the sacrifices of American doughboys, yet they shout threats because Congress is giving these same doughboys only about what one month of war cost this country. Many months of war were saved to this country and to the world by the heroism of the American soldiers, yet the haughty and selfish financiers and profiteers of New York, who were parading with the throngs and shouting "Go on, boys," in 1918, have now stepped back into their countinghouses to gloat over their ill-gotten gains and their only cry now is "Go away, boys; the Nation is too poor." For myself, I wish that it were possible to make every cost-plus, profiteering millionaire pay every dollar of this adjusted compensation to the brave boys who fought in the trenches at $1 per day, three-fourths of which was taken from them in allotments and insurance for the benefit of their helpless and dependent families. This under the Constitution of our country can not be done, but we might well adopt a plan levying a tax on inheritance on all amounts in excess of $25,000, increasing the tax rate as the amount of inheritance increases. This tax would impose no burdens upon the average man, but would place the burden where it properly belongs. It would impose the burden on the men who through graft and other illegitimate processes gained fortunes while our boys were undergoing the hardships and privations of war. This tax might also be augmented by another form of taxation covering that of gifts where the amount of the gift exceeds $10,000. These two taxes would produce abundant revenue to meet all the obligations of the soldiers' bonus and would also contribute to the payment of the ordinary expenses of government, thereby making the burdens of the common people rest more lightly upon their shoulders.

Those who so bitterly oppose the granting of any bonus to the ex-service men of America, and who cry the Nation's poverty as an excuse for so doing, might find some consolation in the fact that this administration has through its program of economy lessened the expenses of government until we are able to assure a saving of some $800,000,000 in taxes for the fiscal year. Through the wise leadership of the matchless statesman, Warren G. Harding, we have restored the Nation to a sound business basis, and as a result of his remarkable diplomacy treaties have been negotiated with the four leading powers of the earth by which we will be enabled to save in the next 10 years in the reduction of armaments a sum estimated at some $10,000,000,000. This achievement was attained without the sacrifice of our national honor and without assuming the burdens of entangling alliances with foreign powers. Instead of increasing armaments and maintaining an Army of 500,000 soldiers, as was desired by the former administration, we have reduced the number of our standing Army to 150,000, and will, with the passage of the Army bill which is now under consideration in the House, still further reduce the size of the Army to a number not exceeding 115,000. We have reduced the bonded indebtedness of the Nation approximately $2,000,000,000 in the last 12 months, and have restored the confidence of the people until Liberty bonds, which were selling at an amount far below par during the last year of the former administration, are now bringing from 97 cents to slightly more than their face value. The increase in the market value of Liberty bonds alone, which are distributed among 15,000,000 American citizens, amounts to more than $2,000,000,000.

In the face of this showing we are led to believe that the propaganda that is being circulated through the press and in paid circulars has no ground upon which to stand other than that the profiteers of America are willing to sacrifice national and individual honor in order to save themselves from a loss on their ill-gotten gains.

I want to see every mother who gave her son to her country's cause and every mother who sent her son to war made happy by a Nation's acknowledgment of their heroic deeds. In the trenches, in the field, in the air their boys met the picked soldiery of the world and carried the Stars and Stripes again and again to triumphant victory. They recovered the lost fields of France; they revived the courage of the Allies; they won for our posterity and for civilization a fight that had been lost; and they saved for humanity the ideals of a liberty-loving people. They laid a surer foundation for the perpetuity of our Government. They deserve the thanks of a grateful Nation, the blessings of a rescued world, and recognition that means more than empty words. They deserve and shall receive a just compensation, and with every dollar thus received the prayers and hopes of the American people that out of their sacrifices shall have come an era of peace eternal and everlasting. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it is, of course, very obvious that the ground we are discussing and the question we are considering, as to what should be the commissioned personnel to be maintained in the Regular Military Establishment, has been gone over times without number here. I can hear the echoes of my own words as I have repeated at various times the arguments that come to my mind to-day. There really is nothing new about it.

The unfortunate part of it is that at just such a time as this we are suddenly confronted with the determination of a military policy for which there has been no general preparation, and I am sure the Members on the floor will frankly admit that fact. It is obvious, too, that most of us come here to this Chamber without much specialization in military affairs. We do not take time to inform ourselves, because in civil life we are not interested in it, although most of the other functions we are called upon to perform here as legislators relate to matters with which we are familiar in our everyday and commonplace experiences back in our private life. We are familiar with the terminology, we are familiar with the relations of things, we are familiar with the reasons for the existence of those various other institutions concerning which we are called upon to legislate, and when we come to act here we act upon that general commonplace knowledge obtained from our everyday experience. We supplement that general knowledge by more specific and direct inquiry into these affairs, and so we act intelligently. But our experience with armies has been limited to seeing a few troops go by in some military pageant on Memorial Day, or with navies to going down to the harbor sometimes to see a distant ship.

People do not pay much attention to the Army. It lives in an atmosphere peculiar to itself. It lives with a language and terminology that most folks do not take the trouble to understand, because they are not interested in it. It has certain traditions, certain customs, a certain philosophy born of the centuries through which men have fought and fought. There are certain lessons of the battle field, even from antiquity, that are part and parcel of the professional life and understanding of these men that are not easily to be made plain to others under the five-minute rule in the House of Representatives, even if one thought one knew something about it.

Now, the theory and philosophy of our present military law are so plain to those who spent months in the preparation of it, and its purposes are so practical, so apparently within the general policy of the United States through all these many years, that it does seem a pity to think that under the technicality of the Holman rule, that camouflage, that pretext may be set up here to juggle with some figures, and underneath it absolutely destroy the military policy established in the Army reorganization act of June 4, 1920.

That military policy was based upon many lessons of the war. The Committee on Military Affairs took 12 months to prepare and put through the House that bill. The preparation of that law included a trip, after the armistice, to our Army in Germany and in France, to the British Army, the Belgian Army, and the French Army. It was seriously done. It was no junketing experience, as any man who accompanied the committee will say. Then back home here, with long consultations and hearings with the representatives of the War Department, with the representatives of the Army of all shades of thought, with representatives of the National Guard, and with men in civil life generally interested in the national defense. Finally a bill was written, and it was hoped and believed that after such mature deliberation it was written with some sense of establishing what might be an enduring policy until a possible future war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And it was written with the idea that many lessons of this last war should be incorporated into its terms as nearly as might be practicable in any law.

Now, the basic lesson, if one may apply such an emphatic term to it, as far as the personnel was concerned, was one learned out of the World War, and that was the lamentable scarcity of trained and matured commissioned officers when we went into the war, and afterwards in our conduct of it.

War has come to be something besides mere men of the jungle coming to brutish grips. War has come to be something more than it was through so many centuries, pretty much limited to the mere physical struggle of great masses of men. It has come to be a combat between Titans, not only between their bodily natures but their moral forces and the subtle intricacies of modern mechanics and science as well. People do not realize the character and complexity of the education required of a commissioned officer in the Regular Army of the United States to-day. People do not realize that it is a learned and scientific profession. He starts at 21 years old, and he will tell you if he is honest—and that is a part of his code, to speak the truth "on his honor as an officer and a gentleman"—he will tell you that when he arrives at about the age to retire he has reached a stage when he has some mature knowledge of the art of war.

That is what experienced men say of other professions, and there is much foundation for believing that officers in the Army are quite as sincere and quite as practical about it in their own.

We undertook at the beginning of the last war to prepare young men as commissioned officers for troops in the field by a three months' intensive course at training camps. Everybody knows that that was a makeshift, but we were able to get much bright material and made considerable progress after we got some of the newness rubbed off. And most of those young men afterwards acquitted themselves gloriously in the service. Yet no man will seriously maintain but that that which constitutes a life profession, to be studied daily in long times of peace, would require a larger opportunity than that which was afforded by a hurly-burly scramble to get into the war in three months by men who never had experience in military affairs.

We need officers who are not only learned in the technique of military science but officers who are experienced in the art of command, in the operations of troops; officers who understand men and know how to handle them, how to preserve discipline in a humane way; officers who have become mature minded and seasoned in judgment.

In the new law, therefore, we laid emphasis on the fact that we needed experienced and matured commissioned officers, men who give their lifetime to study, practice, and training in all that pertains to military science and the maintenance of a military establishment. We laid down the foundation without any reference whatever, in a broad sense, to the mathematical ratio as to the number of enlisted men that would be maintained in the Regular Army. The commissioned officers are the only ones who make a permanent Army, the men who make it a lifetime profession. The enlisted man may come and go, but the commissioned officer stays through thick and thin, through peace and war.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; I am sorry I can not.

Our policy was never to maintain a fighting Army. There is no use to argue about it when men call upon us to reduce the Army just because we had a conference of foreign powers and an agreement to reduce the Navy. That conference had no reference to the military land forces whatever. We never have maintained a fighting Army. We did maintain a fighting Navy, ready to go to sea and fight, but we never have done it with the Army. Everybody understands, and has always understood who has taken the pains to look into the matter, that our Army has been simply a garrison and police and training Army, and that we keep and try to keep only those numbers of men that would suit those three functions in an economic way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has again expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Vermont be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Our theory is wisely to maintain as comparatively limited a professional force as we can to sustain those three functions. We have necessary garrisons. No matter how much we may whittle them down, there are some always that we must have, in order properly to police the country. When the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] said that one soldier to-day was equal to eight soldiers before the war because he had equipment and armament that make him eight times as powerful, he failed to mention the fact that, notwithstanding all of these inventions of man, the Almighty had not made the soldier eight times as ubiquitous, and that he never could do any better than to be in one place at one time; he can not possibly be in eight places at one time, and he can not be all over this continental America at the same time. That is the reason you can not compare our figures with European figures.

The gentleman from Mississippi cited figures of the British estimates. Britain is providing for an army in a small, circumscribed, insular area. We have to expand our Army over a great continental area, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. And yet Great Britain, recognizing the theory of what we are talking about to-day, is trying to maintain the upkeep of commissioned officers, because when Great Britain proposes through the ministry to cut down the number of enlisted men, she also proposes in proportion to raise the number of commissioned personnel, because they are her only trained and permanent army.

Outside of this garrison or this police purpose, we have wisely depended on raising a citizen army for purposes of war, and that is a sound policy. It is consistent with our national character. The minute we begin to have a permanent fighting force in peace time, the minute we begin to pay bands of mercenaries to fight for us, then we no longer have a country worth fighting for. Every man ought to bear his share in some way, somehow, in national defense. But these commissioned officers of the Regular Army are the only men in the United States who make a profession of the science of arms in time of peace. They are the only men who give their whole lifetime up to it, and they are the men upon whom we rely, distributed throughout the country, to impart the art of war to the National Guard, the schools and colleges, the reserves, and all of the other civilian agencies and institutions that are preparing the civilian youth of this land to come to the colors at any time when the country may need defense. They are the men upon whom we rely to preserve from generation to generation an active and growing knowledge of the art of war while the rest of their fellow countrymen are following the paths of peace. They are the men upon whom we must rely in time of emergency to prepare and put our war armies into the field to save the country.

If any one can say precisely how many officers we need for that purpose, then he can do better than the War Department can do, or than any committee of this Congress can do. It must admittedly be at best a compromise. No one can put his finger with exactitude on the number. That is obvious.

The American policy of training a civilian population to national defense is a growing thing, but it already is a fact that the tactical organizations of the Army to-day do not have their sufficient complement of officers, and are not getting the proper training in consequence, and the reason for it is that even with what officers we have now the demand is very great for their distribution to these various civilian agencies about which I have been talking, because the public is calling for them day after day, and they are called for in greater numbers than the War Department is able to furnish them.

It is now proposed to reduce the number even by 2,000 from what we have to-day. I say to you, and I say it with all earnestness—and you can cry "militarist" or whatever you may—it is a pity that we can not seem ever to learn any lesson following any war. Nobody is worrying about a foreign war, nobody is frantic about the possibility of our getting into clinches with any foreign Government at this time. The world is tired out and does not want to fight. But we are making a most stupid, a most egregious blunder, a folly of follies, if we permit through our sense of false security the art of war to languish throughout our country, and bring up a generation of young men whose idea is that they have nothing to do but to go their full threescore years and ten, skipping through a fool's paradise, and that in time of war we can call immediately into being a great, forceful, and efficient Army that will spring like Minerva, armed cap-a-pie, from the brain of Jove himself. It is all humbug. [Applause.]

We have been through the results of this same folly war after war, and we have needlessly lost hundreds of thousands of brave young boys because of it. We have sacrificed thousands of men in every war because of untrained officer leadership.

Nobody pretends that we can be absolutely prepared to the last nail, right down to the possibility of never losing anything. We know that it is difficult for Republics to go to war in any event, because they go clumsily into war. They are never so well prepared as are nations under different forms of Government. But at least Republics, if they are more sensible than the other nations about their Government, ought to be equally sensible in remembering some of the lessons those wars teach. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and I am against the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. I am for the bill. I believe the time has come when we ought to understand what the situation is. The gentleman from California wants 13,000 officers, the gentleman from Mississippi wants 9,000, the Chief of Staff of the Army wants 12,000, and the Committee on Appropriations recommends 11,000.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not just now.

Mr. KEARNS. I understand he wants 13,000.

Mr. MADDEN. He wants 12,000, with the understanding that he will put back a thousand a year from now. I do not believe the gentleman from California speaks for the sentiment of his country exactly. At any rate, if the following telegram has any significance, I would judge that he does not:

OAKLAND, CALIF., March 19.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS:

Sentiment here strongly opposed to retaining top-heavy, swollen commissioned personnel in the Army. Taxpayers and producers on reduced pay see no justice in their continuing to support on inflated pay this absurdly large body of consumers.

ROTARIAN CONVENTION.

That is not from an individual; that telegram is from men from every walk of life. [Applause.] The gentleman from California, when we reach another stage of this bill, will offer an amendment to increase the Army to 150,000 men.

The gentleman from Mississippi will offer an amendment to reduce the Army to 100,000 men. I am opposed to both of those amendments when they come before the House. The Committee on Appropriations come to you with the recommendation of 115,000 men and 7,000 Philippine Scouts, making an Army of 122,000 men, and we propose to reduce the cost of the Army as proposed by the Army from $350,000,000 a year to $224,000,000 a year. [Applause.] We are trying to speak for the men and women of the Nation who pay the taxes. We have no fear that any harm is going to befall any interest in America because we have not a very large Army. We believe the Army we propose will meet every emergency that may arise. I congratulate the Secretary of War for the order he has issued under the direction of the President to bring back the Army from the Rhine. [Applause.] The Committee on Appropriations recommended that. I do not say that action was taken on our recommendation, but I do say that we did that without any thought of what was in the mind of the President or the Secretary of War.

We believed the time had come to bring back the Army [applause] on American soil and confine the Army to the conduct of American activities. [Applause.] We propose to reduce the cost of the Army by $67,000,000 a year. Do you want that reduction, or do you want the taxpayers to be overloaded with these excessive burdens? There is no taxpayer in the Union to-day who is not pleading for relief. Are you willing to grant that relief, or are you insistent upon having a large Army to please the military men of the United States? Who says there is danger to America; who claims with any degree of certainty we are in trouble or likely to be? There is no opportunity to-day, as there has been in the past, to plead that we are liable to be at war with Japan. That bugaboo has been dissipated. The Conference on the Limitation of Armaments set that aside. Now, what is the trouble? What is it that impels these people to demand untold expenditures for the maintenance of the Military Establishment? Have the people of the Nation no rights that even the Military Establishment is bound to respect? Are we to be forever confronted with the argument that we are unprepared. What is there to-day to be prepared for? If there is anything, is it not peace? Peace is the thing that is uppermost in the mind of every man, every woman, and every child in America. War is to be abhorred. We can only reflect the thought of the people of the Nation by translating this bill into a reduction of the cost of Government. [Applause.] Your Committee on Appropriations proposes that, and we come to you in all sincerity hoping you will agree that we have been reasonable in our reductions. Let me make a comparison. The strength of the Army in 1915 was 101,195. It had 4,798 officers. The expenditures for the Military Establishment then amounted to $115,000,000. We are to-day proposing $224,000,000, and yet the Army says that is not enough. The strength of the Army to-day is 139,000. The number of officers is 13,000. We propose to reduce the strength of the Army to 122,000 and the number of officers to 11,000. The appropriation for the maintenance of the Military Establishment we propose to reduce to $224,000,000. The National Guard in 1915 had 129,000 men. The appropriations for the National Guard in 1915 were $7,500,000. The National Guard enlisted strength at the present time is 142,000 men, and we propose by this bill to appropriate for them $21,000,000, and still the Army says we are unprepared and not giving them proper consideration. The student officers' reserve training corps last year were 97,000. That corps did not exist in 1915, so in addition to the Army we have a student officers' training corps to-day of 97,000. The civilian training camps last year were 11,000. We train them at the cost of the Treasury and the estimates for the training camps for the coming year under this bill will be 30,000 men. The commissioned Officers' Reserve Corps to-day are 65,000 men. In 1915 there was not a man. Who says we are not prepared; who says we are not doing justice to the Army? We are making appropriations for all these activities. The strength of the Army, persons in civil life, in 1915, were provided training outside of the Regular Army, and the National Guard and Spanish-American War veterans practically none.

At the present time there are over 2,000,000 men with training received during the recent war and nearly 200,000 officers who saw service and received training during the war. The number of military posts in 1915 throughout the country and ordnance establishments was 230. Now there are 290, and the Army, because we, forsooth, have 60 more military posts and ordnance establishments, want more men to man the posts. Why, we had better burn up the posts if we have to employ a larger number of men to maintain them when they are not needed. [Applause.] The time has come when we must make the Army to meet the situation and not to man posts simply because the posts are there. We had no Air Service in 1915, and now we have 19 flying fields, which include 4 fields which are parts of other military posts and 15 separate flying fields, and we are providing for them, and the value of flying equipment to-day is $361,000,000, and there was not a dollar of this in 1915; and yet they say we are not prepared, and that this bill proposes to disintegrate that Army. This bill proposes to make an Army that can function for the American people and at the same time it recognizes the right of the American people to some relief from the burdens of taxation for the Military Establishment. Now, we had no Chemical Warfare Service in 1915. The present Chemical Warfare Service has one splendidly equipped plant at the Edgewood Arsenal. The ordnance plants in 1915 numbered 13, and the land value was $28,000,000.

The present ordnance plants number 37, with a cost value of $411,000,000, and they have ordnance stores to-day of $1,355,313,000, as against $60,000,000 in 1915. Who says this bill is not in the interest of preparedness? Who says that we are destroying the Army? Who says that we are not giving proper consideration to the defense of the land? Who says there is going to be a war? Where is it to be? What are we to do? Are we to keep millions of men in uniform in anticipation of a war never likely to occur, at any rate, during our day? The time has come when the American Congress must declare to the American people for a system of peace, and that is what this bill does. This bill declares for a system of peace, and at the same time declares for a system of security. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to put myself on record as opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and as being generally opposed to the proposition of cutting down the size of our present Army. I realize that it would take more time than is available to me under the five-minute rule to discuss this proposition. We all know that the Army appropriation bill that is before this committee for consideration involves one great, outstanding issue, and that is the question of the reduction of our Army. I regret very much that under the rules and under the practice that prevails in this House it is possible for the gentlemen having control of the time for debate to be lavish in the granting of time to gentlemen who discuss matters extraneous to the bill and limit and practically prevent debate on the real issue involved. Nine hours of general debate was agreed to on this bill—four and one-half hours under control of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and four and one-half hours under control of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], both of whom are strongly in favor of the reduction of the Army. Of the 9 hours, only 36 minutes were allowed to those opposed to the reduction, 30 minutes to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, and 6 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE]. Other Members requested time, without success. Gentlemen were given liberal time to discuss matters not connected in any way with the proposed legislation, and others were recognized to discuss parts of the bill about which there was no controversy and no issue. I have the highest respect and regard for the committee in charge of this bill, but I submit that the important part of this bill was not permitted to be presented as fully and fairly as it ought to have been.

I am not militaristic. I am in favor of having a strong defensive but not an offensive Army. I can not understand why such great deference should be paid the judgment of a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee and so little respect paid to the judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs, the legislative committee, and especially why so little respect is paid to the experts who are qualified to pass upon this question—I mean the trained and experienced officers of our Army—and I include herein the President of the United States, who is the Commander in Chief of our armies.

I have noticed since I have been a Member of this House that some Members delight to reflect upon the good faith and sincerity of the officers of the Regular Army of the United States. I hope that that sentiment does not prevail generally among the Members. I hope that this issue of whether or not we will cut the Army or whether we will keep it at its present size will be decided by the real facts and not by prejudice. Why should a Member of this House, why should any American citizen whose memory goes back the short space of three or four years, look down with disdain and disrespect upon the officers of the Army of the United States? We know that the Regular Army was the foundation upon which the entire fighting force of America was built. I am willing to ascribe to those men equal sincerity, equal honesty, equal patriotism, to that of any Member of this House. They were tried, and not found wanting, in the grim test of fire and blood in the greatest war of all times. We trusted them then, why not now?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending motion be limited to a reasonable time.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that debate on the pending motions be closed in 45 mintues. Will that be agreeable? I also request that the debate be limited to five minutes for each Member. The committee would like to have 15 minutes on this side of the House.

Mr. SISSON. For myself and members of the committee on this side I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that would be fair. Forty-five minutes on the debate on the pending amendments, 15 minutes to go to the Committee on Appropriations, and half an hour to go to the other gentlemen.

Mr. TEMPLE. Reserving the right to object, does not that include the request also that no person speaking shall have more than five minutes?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendments now pending be limited to 45 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know if the five minutes granted to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH] is included in that?

Mr. HULL. Reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that he asked for objections, but heard no objection.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, if we were willing a few years ago to entrust the well-being, the health, and the lives of 4,000,000 American boys to the officers of the Army of the United States that we ought to be willing, at least, to pay some attention, some heed to their advice in this matter, to which they have given a lifetime's study. This does not in any sense imply a surrender of congressional authority or an evasion of congressional responsibility.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WURZBACH. I will.

Mr. McSWAIN. What is the advice of the officers as to how many officers should be in the Army? I have not heard the advice. Has the gentleman heard it?

Mr. WURZBACH. I have only a short time to discuss this question, but I want to say to the gentleman that the President of the United States—that may not mean much to your side of the House, but I want to call it to the attention of the Members on this side of the House—that the President of the United States; the Commander in Chief of the American Armies; the Secretary of War; General Pershing—and I would rather refer to him as the leader of the American forces across the sea than as Chief of Staff—and, in fact, every military expert that has expressed himself upon this question, is opposed to the reduction of the Army as suggested by the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, made up of five men who have had very little experience, if any, in matters of this kind, men selected, I suppose, by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who has had no military experience at all. I commend the Appropriations Committee in its purpose to reduce the expenses of Government, but I believe the American people are more interested in the way public money is spent than in the amount that is spent.

If we concede then, as we must, equal sincerity of purpose, equal devotion to the Nation's service, and if we further recognize—as we surely must—that a life's study of a problem makes one better qualified on any subject than does the casual consideration given by the average Congressman, it follows as a natural and logical conclusion that the burden of proof rests upon the committee and upon the Congress to show that the recommendations of the officers of the Army are unwise, unreasonable, or unwarranted. I submit that the Appropriations Committee has not successfully borne that burden. But, on the contrary, every witness who testified before the committee, according to the printed hearings, takes issue direct with the conclusions of the committee. The judgment of the committee is not only not supported by the testimony, but is in direct conflict therewith. Therefore, having the same confidence in our Army now that I had in 1917 and 1918, and having heard or read no word of testimony controverting the testimony of the officers of the Army, I shall vote to sustain their conclusions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Which Army does the gentleman refer to—the Army of 150,000 or the existing Army of 120,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, in the limited time allotted me it is impossible even to make a clear statement of my own views regarding this bill. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] and I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]; and in connection with his proposition to appropriate for 13,000 officers I want to say that this is only asking for an appropriation as recommended in the bill prepared by General Pershing himself. That bill does reduce the number of officers temporarily to 12,000, but it also provides that the number of officers shall be increased from the bottom up from the lower ranks and decreased from the top down, until it shall have reached the 13,000; and that number is what we should appropriate for, and there is no inconsistency between the fact that the bill introduced by the gentleman from California and reported to this House calls for 12,000 officers and the amendment offered by the gentleman from California asking for pay for 13,000 officers, because that is what it will be before the fiscal year ends.

Now, I would like to refer if I had the time to the fact that the officer personnel has cost us the most, and is one of the most precious inheritances we have as a result of the military system built up during the war. And I ask you, gentlemen, as good business men, is it good judgment to destroy an organization of that kind unnecessarily? Would any business man think of doing that with his business organization, or would any educational institution think of doing it with its faculty or its working force? I think you would say no.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. I would rather not be interrupted. I have a personal view that I wish to present. I hope the gentleman will excuse me. I am trying to follow the policy of the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army, and of the Secretary of War, whom many of us know as a level-headed, patriotic American who is not going unnecessarily to burden the taxpayers of this country with an excessive number of Army officers. Will you pardon me when I state in a rather personal way my own view of this question?

I am not disposed to condemn the framers of this bill merely because I differ from them in their ideas as to what constitutes a proper Army and proper national defense. I have served for years with two members of this subcommittee, and know that they honestly desire to do what, in their opinion, is best not only for the Army but for the entire country. I do not doubt but that this is the attitude of all the members of the subcommittee. However, the other day when this bill was under consideration the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], in what I suppose he intended as a facetious remark, referred to certain persons as "militarists." We have heard the term used often to-day. I do not, of course, know just what he means by this term, but I do know that my interest in doing what little I can to help my country adopt a safe, sane, sensible policy of national defense comes from anything else than a "militarist" spirit on my part.

It comes, I can say to the gentleman, from the fact that I hate war and all the name implies; and yet when I say I hate war I mean I hate it because of what I have actually experienced, and not as a mere theorist who is afraid of it. [Applause.] In 1898 and 1899 I saw our boys from Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Kansas, Minnesota, Colorado, Iowa, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Washington, California, Nevada, Wyoming, Oregon, Montana, and Utah make the supreme sacrifice under fire between the point where the enemy guns were effective and the point from which our old antiquated guns, with which our troops were armed, could effectively return the enemy fire. I saw these men in hospitals without proper care and attention because our Medical Corps was not properly organized, and because our medical officers—good men as they were—were compelled to use methods, remedies, and surgical instruments bequeathed to these organizations from the days of the Civil War.

When I saw these things I knew there was something wrong, and I was disposed, like many others, to blame the War Department for these conditions. I made up my mind then, if I could do so, I would try to remedy conditions which made it possible to send our young men to certain death because of a lack of proper arms and equipment. Since those days I have given the subject much consideration. I have read our military histories, and was at first disposed to resent the charges that Congress, and not the War Department, was at fault; but my experience in this House and what we have witnessed during the years of the World War, when the War Department was for the first time in our history given unlimited power and thus unhampered achieved such wonderful results, has convinced me that Congress has been largely at fault; and while I now repeat I hate war, I also add that I hate, despise, and pity the false arguments for economy heard on the floor of this House after every war, arguments which have resulted in destroying the national defense which we had builded during the wars, and thus paralyzing the forces which stood between us and war and made necessary so great a sacrifice when war did come. I will gladly and reverently pray with you that war may never come to us again, but in the meantime I want to work with all real Americans to build up such safeguards as will make war impossible or would put us as a Nation, if war did come, in such a situation that we would not be compelled to send our young men forth to needless slaughter, while behind their dead bodies we frantically and feverishly attempted to do that which should have been done during the days of peace. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the form in which these amendments are presented to the House gives a great advantage in favor of the committee. We have the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who wants an Army of 100,000; we have the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who wants the Army in about its present form; and we have the committee standing in between. I think it is important for the Members of the House who really believe in having an Army such as is necessary for our security to see to it that this advantage does not give the vote of this House in favor of the proposal of the Committee on Appropriations.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MADDEN], who is entitled to credit not only at the hands of the House but at the hands of the country for the work he has done in behalf of economy, says that this House owes a duty to the country to bring about economy. That is true. But this House owes a paramount duty to this country, paramount to every other duty, to see that the security of this country, with her teeming millions of people, is assured. [Applause.]

They say we have had a disarmament conference. We had a conference with reference to the limitation of naval armaments, and, just so far as we can get our competitors to go, I believe is bringing about limitation of armaments.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations asks, with what country is there danger of war? I do not know.

So, gentlemen, you have got the question before you, whether you are to obey the imaginary duty of practicing economy to the point where we shall not be properly defended, or whether you are going to obey the paramount and real duty to see that we are adequately defended, and I ask you to support the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other amendment that he is going to offer subsequently, so that we can maintain an Army at the standard that all our military advisers say it ought to be maintained at, and give us an adequate military defense of our country. [Applause.]

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY BELOW 150,000 IS A MENACE TO OUR SECURITY.

The Army of the United States under the existing law is now reduced to 150,000. It is proposed by this Army appropriation bill to reduce the Army to 115,000, and it has been proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] by amendment to further reduce it to 100,000. I do not believe the Republic will be secure if we reduce the Army below 150,000. The Secretary of War and all military advice is opposed to further reduction. We have a very great duty to our people to pursue the course of economy and not to expend a single dollar not needed. We have a paramount duty above every duty to preserve this Republic with her millions of citizens secure from attack from without and from insurrection from within.

Our greatest security from dangers within is in the conduct of government so that ills and grievances of our people will be cured and redressed by a Government just to all. But we ought to have a force great enough to quell any internal disturbances by those who might not be satisfied with such government.

Our greatest security from dangers without lies in establishing and maintaining such friendly relations with other nations as shall encourage peace. We should accord to them just treatment even to the point of tolerance. But we ought to have a nucleus for an Army great enough to build up a combat Army to defend against any nation which might attack us notwithstanding such just treatment. The former administration urged a peace time Army of over 500,000; that, in my opinion, was too high. The present administration is opposed to a reduction below 150,000. Consideration for our security and safety should warn us not to disregard this recommendation. Disarm! We are already disarmed. It has never been our policy to maintain a combat Army in peace time, and we do not now have a combat Army, but we must maintain an Army large enough to quell internal disturbances and to furnish a skeleton organization upon which to build a combat Army if necessary.

I believe in limitation of armament. I am happy to know that as a result of the arms conference we are to reduce our naval armaments and save the country two or three hundred millions annually.

Just as far as we can get our competitors to disarm, just so far we ought to go. But this is international disarmament to cut our own Army below the safety zone without any international agreement is national disarmament and national folly. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not a militarist, and I certainly could not be called a pacifist. I do not know much about military matters, but I believe I do know a little something about the history of this war. I have heard considerable comment here about our unprepared condition when we entered the last war. We were unprepared, my friends. I think nobody in the House knows that more thoroughly than I after having groped through the intricacies of these matters for two years. We were unprepared, but we were not unprepared in the way of men to go to the fighting line. We were unprepared in the things that men needed to fight with.

We had nothing to fight with. We had armies in the field, trained men ready to fight, long before we had anything to fight with. Now, there was one other thing in which we were lacking——

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I can not yield. I have not the time just now. Perhaps I will yield in a moment. There was one other thing in which we were lacking, and that was trained officers. When we went into the war we found suddenly, after our declaration of war in 1917, that we were thrown into that great conflict without an adequate number of officers to guide us, so that untrained officers had to do the work; and if there is anything that this war has taught us it ought to be this, that never again should we be found without a sufficient corps of adequately trained officers. [Applause.] You can get the men to fight in the ranks. You can take an American boy and in six weeks' time you can make as good a soldier out of him as there is in the world, but it takes years to train an officer. Do you know the one thing that caused most of the losses and the most of the extravagance in the construction of our camps? That work was done by what was called the construction division. How many officers did we have in it? We had four commissioned officers in the construction division when the war broke out. What did we find it necessary to do, therefore? We called in contractors, the men who were in the building business, and turned the job over to them, and they wasted our money by the hundreds of millions of dollars. What did we do in the quartermaster's and ordnance departments? We had a very small corps of trained officers and we called in the contractors, the men who had shoes to sell, the men who had clothing to sell, and all that sort of thing, and we said, "Here, take charge of this, because there is nobody here who can do it." Gentlemen of the House, there was not an officer in the quartermaster's department of our Army when the war broke out who knew how to buy a yard of cloth or a pair of shoes intelligently. Yet when this war has given us some officers, when we have a corps of trained men who know something about that business, are we going to discharge them now and cut down our force, and throw away what it cost us, $30,000,000,000, to learn in this war? My friends, I am going to vote for the Kahn amendment. [Applause.] It is the right thing to do. Let us keep our trained officers. They are mighty hard to get. So far as the men in the ranks are concerned, I shall not go along on that proposition, because I do not think it is necessary to have now a large enlisted personnel, but I do think we ought to keep these officers, every one of them, in the Army, because there may come a time when we will need them as we have in the last few years. I think I have learned these things from this war, and I am saying them now because I think it is my duty to say to you what I believe our experience has taught us as an American people. [Applause.]

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, perhaps the things that I will have occasion to say have been said a number of times in one way or another this afternoon, but I want to impress upon your minds the importance of this amendment. I will say that every expert who appeared before the Appropriations Committee counseled against the limitation of 11,000 officers that this committee have provided for in this bill. The Secretary of War asked for 13,000 officers in the Army. He certainly can not be classed as a militarist. The head of the General Staff, General Pershing—I do not have him in mind so much now as the head of the General Staff as the man who led the American forces successfully in France—told this committee that it would be absolutely impossible for the Army to get along with less than an officer personnel of 13,000. Then, why do gentlemen conclude that the Committee on Appropriations ought to be followed in the face of all this technical evidence of men who have made a study of this matter? They have warned the members of this committee that the Army will suffer if the number is cut down below 13,000. Yet this committee comes into this House and arbitrarily asks for 2,000 less officers, and some men in this House indicate that they are about to follow the committee who have no information upon this subject except information that would teach them to the contrary.

Gentlemen, I want to appeal to each one of you who has in mind the good of the American Army, to listen to these men who know about these matters, and not to follow the advice of those who do not know and have not heeded the warning which they have received. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the committee in recommending the reduction in the number of officers and in the number of enlisted men have in no instance sought to do violence to the existing establishment. In a few words I think I will be able to show to you that so far as the commissioned personnel is concerned the number recommended by the committee is warranted.

When we had an Army of 101,000 men at the close of June, 1915, we had but 4,798 officers. At that time we had no officers in training at the various schools and colleges throughout the country, in the reserve officers' training corps, or any of the other activities that the Army reorganization act provides for. At the present time we have 12,936. Where are they? In the Medical Corps, for instance, there are more than 250 than are authorized under existing law. When we questioned the officer of that corps who came before us as to the justification for that number he could not give any reason for it except that they were in the service. Now, we have taken those 250 into consideration, and many more who are surplus to that provided by law, as in the Dental Corps, the Veterinary Corps, and lopped them off from the present force. At the close of June, 1915, there were but 185 commissioned officers in the Quartermaster Corps, subsistence and finance divisions. To-day there are 993, or over 800 more officers.

Now, take the Coast Artillery Corps. Everybody in this House, even those who have no special information on this subject, knows that there is not to-day need for the same number of officers in our Coast Artillery, because we are curtailing activities in our fortifications. In 1915 we had 728 in that corps. To-day, with not many more fortifications than then, we have 1,099, or 350 more. In the Infantry we had 1,604. To-day we have 4,111, or 2,500 more than we had then. General Pershing came before our committee and said he was in favor of reducing the existing officer personnel to 12,000, getting rid of the deadwood.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I can not yield. I have not the time. We take the conservative position and only put it at 11,000. We do not seek to reduce the number of cadets at the Military Academy. That goes on and will replenish the Army with its younger officers. We do not seek to cut down the activities of the service connected with the colleges where we are preparing officers in reserve in case of future emergency. We expect that there will be no war in the next 10 years, but if there were war here are thousands upon thousands of officers who served in the World War—65,000 all told in the Officers' Reserve Corps—6,000 of them who have been brought into the service, increasing the number of officers to more than 12,000. Would the 65,000 officers in the Officers' Reserve Corps refuse to do their duty if an emergency arose?

Every one of the subcommittee will challenge the assertion made by the gentleman who preceded me that the committee has not given a thorough consideration to the matter. Eight weeks of continuous service was given to acquiring information from officers of the War Department. The amazing fact is that notwithstanding the Limitation of Arms Conference, not a recommendation from any officer or official of the War Department was made to reduce the estimates prepared many months before that conference met. Great Britain, notwithstanding its many dominion disorders, recognized the call for reduction of military expenses and cut the Army appropriation for next year more than $100,000,000. True, our committee received no help from the Military Establishment to meet the demand for less military burdens. We did it regardless of whether we came from districts that had forts or fortifications or posts or arsenals; our duty was to do what we believed was right to the taxpayers, what was right to the country in general, and not to create any havoc or ravage to the officer personnel, but to carry out General Pershing's own recommendations to reduce the officers to 12,000 and then reduce the Medical Corps and other noncombatant services where no harm would be done to the existing personnel. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, nothing could better illustrate the wisdom of the decision arrived at by the committee than the fact that the two motions that have been made representing the extreme views on this subject leave the decision of the committee squarely midway between them. The path of wisdom can generally be found somewhere in the middle ground between the extremes of opinion and sentiment, and while there may be some little ground for difference of opinion as to the size of the commissioned personnel of our Regular Army, the fact that the decision arrived at by the committee is squarely midway between the extreme views of the little-army men and the big-army men is, in my opinion, well-nigh conclusive proof that the committee is right. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, there is little time left, and I do not want to take much. Every man who has studied the last war knows that it is brains and tools that conduct business in war as in peace. Educated brains in a corps of officers are the first requisite, and for that reason the amendment to the national defense act in 1920 established a corps of officers of 17,679. Why? Because they were not merely to take care of the troops but they were to run the various parts of the Army, which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations referred to as Chemical Warfare, Aviation, National Guard, and the Reserves. You can go through it all, and brains are needed; and if you do not have them, we will be, as at the beginning of the war, without any trained officers. Last year, in 1921, we wanted to reduce expenses; but it is worth notice that the bill then prepared and passed by this same committee, while it reduced the Army from 280,000, including Philippine Scouts, to 150,000, besides Philippine Scouts, but did not reduce the officers by one man. That committee then recognized that officers were needed. We appropriated $46,000,000 for officers' pay, and now it is proposed to cut this sum in half and more, though it is proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to appropriate three-quarters of that sum for 13,000 officers instead of 17,000. Is not that enough of a cut? It is proposed by this bill to cut the number to 11,000 officers and $26,000,000, and it is proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi to cut to 9,000 officers and $21,000,000.

My friends, we have now nearly 13,000 officers, and they propose to rub out 2,000 of them. They propose in the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi to rub out 4,000 of these officers, the men upon whom we rely, men who have all had their war experience or regular training in military affairs. Where shall we get their substitutes in case of need? What will the young men say who thought that they were making the Army their life profession when they find that men who have done their duty, after 20 years of service as is provided for in this bill, are turned out because Congress says we do not want you? [Applause.]

If you want to have an enthusiastic corps of trained men to take care of your Army in time of war, stand by the Kahn amendment and do not turn people out. [Applause.]

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, it sounds very peculiar, indeed, during the discussion of this bill, to hear men spoken of as "big-army men" and "little-army men." The difference between 150,000 and 115,000 men is not enough to make the difference between a little Army and a big Army. Have we forgotten the recommendations that came from the Secretary of War and the President of the United States one year ago, have we forgotten the estimates that came in the annual Budget—we did not call it a Budget then, we spoke of it as the Book of Estimates—one year ago, estimates that we were considering in the House less than a year ago? The President and the Secretary of War had asked for a standing Army of 519,000 men and appropriations necessary to maintain that Army, amounting to somewhat more than $699,000,000. Compared with these demands there are no big-army men in the House now.

What has changed the minds of so many of the Members? Perhaps the minds of the Members have not changed so much. This appropriation bill does not come from the same committee that the appropriation bill came from last year. This bill comes not from the Committee on Military Affairs, most of whom are familiar, through years of study, with military problems, but it comes from a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, disregarding the advice of the military authorities of the Nation. I believe in the new Budget plan, but I do not believe that the Committee on Appropriations should undertake to perform the functions of the legislative committees of the House. [Applause.] It was my good fortune to be on the committee that prepared the Budget legislation. I know that the House never intended the Committee on Appropriations to exercise legislative functions and fix the policies of the United States. [Applause.]

The policy of the United States concerning military matters ought to be fixed in legislation reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. As a matter of fact, the Congress did two years ago pass a bill which was intended to adopt a permanent policy with regard to national defense. That bill had been under consideration for more than a year; the committee had advised with the most competent students of military matters and the most experienced officers of the Army and administrators in the War Department. The size of the Army was cut far below what many of these advisors asked for, but the War Department, accepting the permanent policy adopted by Congress, has organized the Army in accordance with it. We have now less than 140,000 enlisted men in the Army and somewhat less than 13,000 commissioned officers. This bill proposes to appropriate only money enough to pay 115,000 enlisted men and 11,000 officers and to discharge the others unceremoniously. This can not have any other than a demoralizing effect on the remaining officers, who will not know what further cut in their numbers may be made next year. If we are to have no continuity of policy, we can have no Army. [Applause.]

We were told a few minutes ago that there is never going to be another war. If we were sure of that, if we could only be certain that we have arrived at the time when the nations shall learn war no more, we would not need even 115,000 men. We could beat our swords into plowshares and our spears into pruning hooks.

Even without that assurance it is not the policy of the United States to maintain a big Army which would be the real fighting force of the Nation if war should come. We do need, however, a nucleus, a training force for officers and men, around which we may develop a fighting force in case necessity should require it. We declared war in April, 1917, and then began our preparation for it. It was about 15 months before any considerable number of our troops were in actual contact with the enemy. It took us all this time to get ready. It was possible for us to take this time because the armies and navies of our friends were between us and our enemy. If necessity ever calls us again to fight, it is not at all likely that we shall have a year or more to get ready at our convenience.

In maintaining our present Army, untouched by the cut proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, we are no more than banking the fire that it may be ready promptly in case of need; but we do want red coals enough under the ashes to keep the fire from going out completely. We want the Army to be maintained in such condition and numbers that it would be able, if required, to kindle enthusiasm and communicate knowledge and efficiency to the much larger number which would be the real strength of the Nation. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2440. An act extending the period for homestead entries on the south half of the Diminished Colville Indian Reservation.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following Senate concurrent resolution:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 20.

Whereas the United States transport Cambrai is expected to arrive in New York on or about March 30, bearing the last of the bodies of American soldiers from the battle fields of the World War: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee of five Senators, to be designated by the President of the Senate, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be designated by the Speaker, is authorized to represent the Congress at such services and ceremonies as may be determined upon as proper and appropriate. One-half of the expenses of such committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], who just took his seat, that in one sense of the word there are no big-army people left, except two. There are two big-army men in this House, and you can not make it too big for them. One is the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. FISHER]. When they speak, the Army and Navy Club and the General Staff speak to you. There is another thing about this debate that has occurred to me. Every time you find a man who has ever worn the uniform of an officer as high as colonel, you find a militarist and a man who imagines that he has a peculiar knowledge of affairs that does not obtain in any other man. Another peculiar thing about the debate is that you will find a few men who will say that the only men who have a right to a belief about this matter are the men who sit a few days on the Military Affairs Committee, and that no one else has any judgment and sense about the matter at all. The Committee on Appropriations, in the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, has had the benefit of men who have been on the Committee on Military Affairs and the benefit of their knowledge. They were on the Committee on Military Affairs during the entire war, and appropriated billions of dollars during that time and changed the policy whenever they deemed it necessary. The chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the military bill served for years on the Military Affairs Committee, and the ranking Democrats who served for many years on the Military Committee are now on the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. So, make the most of it if you want to. There are two members of the Committee on Military Affairs on this subcommittee that made up this bill. You have the opportunity to carry out in good faith a pledge which you and the Democratic Party made last campaign, and that is to reduce expenses.

You can not reduce expenditures very much except in the Army and the Navy. We have done the best we could in the other provisions of the bill, and there has been but little difference of opinion. I believed in making up the bill, and I believe now, that 9,000 officers are ample and if you adopt that amendment you save in the neighborhood of $6,000,000. If you adopt the Kahn amendment you add to the amount of money over what you would expend, if my amendment were adopted, between eleven and twelve million dollars.

Men should bear in mind that when they create a great corps of officers they create that many more life tenures in office. If I had time I would like to discuss that most horrible bill ever introduced and passed through this Congress, the last reorganization bill. Under that bill the Army as now constituted does not have a single second lieutenant in it, and they contend that they are organizing their officers under the terms of that bill. Not only that, but under the terms of that law those men have life tenures in office like unto the United States Supreme Court judges, and men are already beginning to look upon it as a sacred thing when you make an Army officer out of a man. When did that come to be a sacred thing? That law is so bad that it actually smells to heaven. It is nothing more or less than the work of the General Staff of this Army copied from the Prussian military force. Talk to me about the Military Affairs Committee having made up that bill! They did not do it, they simply viséed it. That bill was prepared by the General Staff of the Army, and for their benefit and not for the benefit of the taxpayer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, when the committee came to the question of making the appropriation to provide for the proper number of officers for our Army we were faced, first, with a condition that in certain of the noncombatant corps—the Medical Corps, the Veterinary Corps, the Dental Corps, the Chaplain Corps, and others—there was an excess of officers over the number authorized by law and for which to-day there is not the least basic law upon which we can appropriate a dollar to pay them. The committee determined that it would not provide the money to pay their salaries and that it would provide the means to get them out of the Army. Next, we found that the Chief of Staff of the Army, General Pershing, a man in whom the committee has every confidence and in whom you have confidence, stated that there are in the Army to-day 13,000 officers, and that there were 1,000 of the least efficient of these whom he thinks should not be in the service. He has asked Congress for authority to get rid of them. In consequence the committee has provided for 11,000 officers, nearly a thousand of those we propose to get rid of belonging to these corps where there is a surplus above the number Congress says they can have and for which there is no authority of law to pay a dollar of salary, and the others, by which the commissioned strength is reduced, are the officers whom General Pershing says he should be allowed to take out of the service. The charge is made that this will cripple the Military Establishment. I deny that.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Some apprehension exists lest the training of students suffer by reason of the lack of reserve officers. Will the gentleman state whether or not this bill curtails that service?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am glad to say to the gentleman that the 11,000 officers will provide a sufficiently large number, so that the detail of every officer necessary for National Guard training, every officer necessary for schools, colleges, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps work, every officer necessary for the Staff Corps of the Army, and still leave nearly double the number available to duty for the line of the Army than we had in 1915. In 1915 we had 4,798 officers, all told, in the Army. To-day there are some in excess of 6,000 with the line of the Army, leaving 5,000 under the 11,000 maximum under this bill for all other kinds of service, a reservoir from which we can draw a sufficient number of officers to take care of all training and use for all other really necessary purposes.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman remember that since 1915 we have added a Tank Corps and a Chemical Warfare Service in the Army which require a great many more officers?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is quite true, but we still have 5,000 in excess of the number required for the line.

Mr. STAFFORD. Only 87 for the Chemical Warfare Service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. General Pershing, it is true, said he wanted to get rid of, I think, 1,000, but he also stated that he wanted to have authority to replace them with other men.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is, within a year or two years, but I am sure Congress will be able to consider at that time whether it is advisable or not to grant General Pershing's request and add 1,000 more officers to the Army.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do I understand the gentleman to mention the Army of 1915? Does the gentleman claim we had enough officers then?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think for the size of the Army we had we had enough, I will say to the gentleman. Now, in closing I want to say this word, that the United States has to-day as many of the best-trained and most capable officers as any Army in the world, and the committee was thoroughly imbued with the idea of retaining all of the best of those men in the service, and in the provisions of this bill there is not a single one of those of the class I mention who will be compelled to leave the service. We wanted to get rid of those not authorized by law and get rid of the 1,000 of the least efficient whom General Pershing says can be dropped with benefit to the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. KAHN) there were—ayes 68, noes 142.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SISSON) there were—ayes 40, noes 180.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 4, after the word "staff," strike out "$26,896,200" and insert in lieu thereof "$29,330,954." Line 6, after the word "than," strike out "11,000" and insert in lieu thereof "12,000."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not concerned about the reduction of the enlisted personnel of the Army. A year ago I introduced an amendment by which the Army was reduced to 150,000 men. I am concerned about the arbitrary reduction of the commissioned personnel of the Army. This amendment is not the plan of the General Staff. It is a compromise between the General Staff plan and the committee's plan. It will make the commissioned personnel 12,000 instead of 11,000, and would not permit an increase after it had been reduced. The committee plan will reduce the commissioned personnel of this Army about 2,000. This bill will be made into law something near the 15th or 20th day of June. It will give the General Staff orders, as it is constructed to-day, to reduce the personnel of the commissioned officers practically 2,000 men, and give them less than 15 days to do it in. You can not do that without creating chaos in the Army. You have to-day over 3,000 commissioned officers in the different schools. A large number of those men will have to be discharged. You only have 4,329 officers in your Army to-day. The rest of them are scattered all over this country in separate services. Where are you going to cut the Army 2,000 men in 10 days without creating chaos? You can not do it, and you know you can not do it, and the gentlemen, I think, who drew this bill knew we could not do it. It takes but three things to make an Army—enlisted men, supply system, and commissioned personnel—and of the three the important element is your commissioned personnel, and if you want and desire to economize on your Army, for Heaven's sake cut your enlisted men, but leave your commissioned personnel alone. Gentlemen, I will not take up your time; you understand the situation. I appeal to you to support that amendment. It will save the Army, and to reduce it to 11,000 will destroy the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HULL) there were—ayes 65, noes 115.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out on page 16 all after the word "under," in line 23, and all of line 24, and insert the following: "A board of general officers convened by the President, consisting of one retired major general of the line who commanded an army in active operations against the enemy at some time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918; one retired major general of the line who did not command troops in active operations against the enemy at any time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and who has been retired on account of age since November 11, 1918; the Surgeon General of the Army; and two general officers of the line to be designated by the Secretary of War."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not care to take up the time of the House, but I want to call your attention to this fact: That if you are going to take out of the commissioned personnel of the Army about 2,000 officers there will have to be some system provided whereby it can be done. Under the bill that is all left to the Secretary of War. In the interest of the officer who will have to come up for trial and who will have his case passed upon and perhaps be discharged from the Army, I feel that it is but fair that he should appear before a board of the most responsible officers, and officers of the very highest character that we have in our Army. And I have undertaken in this amendment—it is immaterial to me whether you adopt it or not—that this board shall be composed of three major generals, two of whom are retired, who stand in high esteem with all the officers of the Army, and the Surgeon General, who, I think, is looked upon by every officer in the Army as a man who is absolutely fair. That would leave, then, for the Secretary of War to select two other general officers to serve on this board. And in the interest of fairness and justice to the men who are going to be put out of the service, I plead with you to adopt some such an amendment as this in order that they may have a chance for a hearing.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is your amendment so drawn as to really designate the individuals who shall compose this board?

Mr. McKENZIE. I have no objection to saying to the gentleman very frankly that I would like to see on that board Major General Liggett and Major General Morrison, two officers, I think, that every officer in the Army will say they are willing to have pass on their cases, and the Surgeon General as the third one, and I am not so particular as to the other two. I do feel that this ought to be done.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman only calls attention to the iniquity of legislation of this character. Here is the Appropriations Committee cutting down the number of the commissioned personnel, but without power under the rules of the House to go to work to take care of the men who must be put out of the service.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will yield.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to assure the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] that his statement is hardly correct, inasmuch as we have provided that these reductions shall be made under regulations approved by the President of the United States, in whom we have great confidence.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But it takes the matter clearly out of the hands of Congress; and two years ago, when the Army reorganization bill was passed, there was considerable debate over the putting of officers in classes A and B. And it has been brought to my attention that on several occasions it has been attempted to put men out of the service on the worst kind of hearsay evidence, dating back 20 years.

Mr. ANTHONY. Permit me to further add, as one individual, I would have the highest confidence in the officers named by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I understood from what I could hear of the amendment that it is the gentleman's purpose to create a body to pass upon the qualifications of those officers whom it would be desired to retire. I take it that body would necessarily have to pass upon the qualifications of all officers if the retirement of these officers from the Army was to be passed upon efficiently and justly and the most inefficient retired. Inasmuch as this bill can not possibly become a law until along near the end of the fiscal year, it seems to me it is going to be a physical impossibility for this body or any other like body to pass upon the qualifications of all the officers of the Army. The pending bill does not provide the funds to pay the salary of the officers to be retired beyond June 30 of this year, when this question must be settled if this bill becomes a law, and clearly this board can not ascertain the facts upon which to base intelligent action during the time intervening.

Mr. McKENZIE. That may be true. I am not prepared to say as to that. But I do say this, gentlemen, that if this Congress is to adopt the legislation which we have this afternoon, which would eliminate 2,000 officers from the Army, then, in God's name, let us provide the machinery that will give those men an opportunity to get a square deal. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I still reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not entirely proper to offer an amendment to the amendment with a point of order reserved.

Mr. MANN. I suggest the Chair can very easily overrule the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee make the point of order?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama to the amendment offered by Mr. McKENZIE.

At the end of the amendment add:

"Provided, That in carrying out the provisions of this act no officer shall be separated from the service until he shall have been furnished with a full copy of the official records upon which the proposed separation is based. Such officer shall be given opportunity to appeal his case to a court of inquiry, which court of inquiry shall hear his case and such officer shall be given opportunity to present testimony and evidence in his own behalf, which evidence shall be considered by such court of inquiry."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment proposed is not in order. I will reserve it, however, if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up the time of the committee with this unduly, but I do think that before a man, an officer in the Army, is arbitrarily separated from the service by any rules promulgated by people of whom we know not under this bill he should be given the record upon which such separation is proposed. That is only a fair and a square deal to the man whose separation from the service is contemplated. It is absolutely against American principles, as I see it, to propose to separate an officer from the service without his being able to have an official record of the case furnished him and a chance to be heard in his own behalf and to present his own evidence and testimony.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. How long would it take to make this change—months or years?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. I do not know, sir. I am not able to tell you. But I do know that if I were an officer in the Army to-day I would want a chance to see the record upon which it was contemplated that I was to be separated from the service arbitrarily.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Is not the gentleman's amendment a copy of the present law?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes. It provides a B board, and it says that no officer shall be classified in Class B until he shall have been given an opportunity to appear before a board of inquiry and see a copy of the record on which their action is based and offer testimony in his own behalf.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. As I understand it, after an officer has served at a certain station there is sent on to headquarters a memorandum by his superior as to the character and class of his service, and that record is not available to the officer at the time, but later can be hauled up against him. All that the gentleman seeks to do is to carry out existing law so that before a man can be dropped from the service he can find out the nature of the complaint made against him?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes; to see the record and be able to present testimony in his own behalf.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has asked how long it will take to do it.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is it proper to refuse justice because it takes too long?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Certainly not. This man should be given an opportunity; otherwise, my friends, you are going to find that officers now in the Army of certain classes are going to be discriminated against.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not manifest on the face of it that to reduce the personnel of the Army by 2,000 will mean that after a comparatively small number have been canceled we are going to take the rest out of the men against whose record there is nothing?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. You propose to take the least efficient, do you not?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; that might be based on the present record.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes. You should take out the inefficient men and leave the efficient.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment. The developments show that we are going down into deeps where the merits of men will not be considered at all.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. They prophesy now that after you have reduced the number of officers now, you will then in 12 months' time, or such a matter, have a lot more officers put in to fill up. A number of those men who will be cut off will be retired on three-quarters pay, and you will not cut down your expense, although you may think you will, because more officers will be put in to fill up. The only way to deal fairly with this question is to take this whole list of officers and push it back, and if a man is not satisfied to go down a grade, wherever by the method of pushing the whole list down a man must go to the next lower grade, then let him step out. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Is it not the opinion of the gentleman that unless this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] is adopted, together with the amendment you have proposed, these Pooh-Bah lord high executioners that still control the Army will arbitrarily take out of the service everyone that they do not agree with, and that they will promote their friends?

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Yes. The point is that a man should have an opportunity for a fair hearing on his case before he is arbitrarily kicked out. That is the only fair deal. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I question whether this is not legislation. I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS] is not germane to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] or to any provision in the bill. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama is in no wise necessary to bring about the reduction of the Army, which is the purpose of the paragraph under consideration. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois proposes a board of general officers instead of merely providing regulations that may be promulgated by the President. But here we go further, and we legislate as to the methods by which they may dismiss or discharge officers from the service. It is not directly connected with the reduction of the officer personnel.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama provide certain details as to the procedure which should be followed by this board which is established by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and would not the gentleman from Wisconsin, if we established a separate board, think it would be germane to provide certain rules of procedure which should be followed and to set forth certain rights which officers who are to be brought before this board might have under the procedure set forth?

Mr. STAFFORD. I grant that the question is not free from doubt, but it is my opinion that it is legislation, and it is not of a character that is necessary in perfecting the reduction of the personnel of the Army.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did the gentleman understand that the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is germane to the bill and free from the vice that he mentions?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is germane to that last paragraph—"or under such regulations as he shall prescribe."

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is not subject to the objection of violating the rules, then it seems to me the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] should be answered in the affirmative.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I rather think, glancing for a moment at the question, that the Committee on Appropriations rebuking legislation is a good deal like Bluebeard rebuking bigamy or Satan rebuking sin. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has already shown that Bluebeard had eight wives, so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned. Perhaps the gentleman did not wish to apply that to the Committee on Military Affairs. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois provides for a board and establishes the personnel of that board. The bill itself provides that this reduction shall all be under such regulations as the President shall prescribe. I suppose if a point of order were made on that it might be well contended that that is legislation. But the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS] goes to questions of procedure before the board and lays down certain rights which officers to be affected by this reduction shall have.

Now, it would seem to me that if we can establish a board as the amendment proposes, we can go further and provide as to certain details of the procedure before that tribunal and certain requirements that may be followed in dealing with officers who are to be affected by the action of this board; and it seems to me that this is a germane amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], and that the contention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is not well taken.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard a moment on the point of order. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois was to the clause which provides that certain things shall be done "under such regulations as the President may prescribe." Now, it seems to me that the whole proviso is legislation and ought to have been held to be subject to a point of order; but having been once admitted——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman misunderstands.

Mr. TEMPLE. I think not; and if the gentleman will allow me to finish my statement he will see that I do not misunderstand.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has already made a statement based on a misunderstanding. This proviso is held in order as legislation under the Holman rule.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; and I say having been admitted it is improper to hold out of order an amendment to it which is of like character; that is, when we admit legislation is held to be in order under the Holman rule, then an amendment of the same character can not be excluded. The legislation which has been decided to be in order provides that certain things shall be done "under such regulation as the President may prescribe." The amendment now offered proposes that certain of those regulations shall be provided in the bill itself. If legislation is in order which confers this power on the President, then an amendment fixing certain of these regulations is obviously not out of order. If we have the right to authorize the President to do certain things we have the right to do them by our own action.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] makes the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] that it is not germane to the amendment. The Chair admits that he thinks the question is open to some doubt, but he is inclined to agree with the contention of the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is a mere method of procedure to be followed by the board in carrying out the purposes of the paragraph. Under that theory the Chair will hold the amendment to be in order and therefore overrule the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not blame the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS] for offering this amendment. I do not blame the gentleman from Alabama for not expressing confidence in the President of the United States; but the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army, and I heard a gentleman on that side of the House question the right of Congress to put a provision in the bill recalling the troops from one country where they now are. He questioned the right of Congress to do that. Now, this is nothing more or less than one of the regulations within the Army, and if you gentlemen on that side want to go on record as saying that you have no confidence in the President of the United States, that is absolutely satisfactory to me, because even under this amendment some Army officer has got to do it, as the bill is drawn. The President will simply select such machinery as he sees fit and proper to be just and fair with the Army officers that he gets rid of. I realize fully that after President Roosevelt promoted certain Army officers over two or three thousand other officers the Army officers who had been writing this military legislation for the last few years and preparing these bills for the last few years have made every effort to get away from the power of the President to control the Army and to circumvent his constitutional prerogatives; but if you gentlemen want to circumvent that now as much as possible, I do not care. I do not blame my friend from Alabama for doing it, but I do not see just what attitude gentlemen are going to be in on the Republican side in saying they are not willing that the President of the United States shall make any sort of regulation as to how to get rid of these Army officers.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not my friend from Mississippi think it is perfectly proper for the body which decides for the execution of certain officers at least to take steps that it shall be done in the way that they prescribe?

Mr. SISSON. I think that is a very appropriate term that the gentleman has used—"execution"—because I do not know of anything on earth that in the mind of a militarist on the floor of this House is quite as great a crime as to remove an officer from the Army. Great God! Has it come to the point that because a man is an officer of the Army you commit a crime when in the interest of the taxpayer or in the interest of economy or in the interest of good service you remove him from the service? What divinity doth hedge the Army officer about that he has grown so great of late that he doth bestride this Republic like a mighty colossus and bids all of us walk between his mighty legs like petty men? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. If I understand this amendment presented by my distinguished colleague, it practically directs at least a majority of the board. I have great confidence in my colleague, and probably would agree to his selection; but I wondered whether my friend from Mississippi thinks my colleague would be any more likely to hit the right parties than the President of the United States would after careful consideration.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think so, I will say to my friend from Illinois, nor do I think that when the American people elected Mr. Harding President they intended to substitute either the gentleman from Illinois or the author of this amendment or any other Member of Congress to hold the position which he now occupies. Of course, no one could blame me if I wanted to substitute some one else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to change the word "bill" in the amendment to the word "act."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will modify the amendment as indicated. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. ANTHONY) there were—ayes 84, noes 60.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were 87 ayes and 54 noes.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were 70 ayes and 78 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of the officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps, $250,000: Provided, That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended for the pay of a reserve officer on active duty for a longer period than 15 days, except such as may be detailed for duty with the War Department General Staff under section 3a and section 5 (b) of the Army reorganization act approved June 4, 1920, or who may be detailed for courses of instruction at the general or special service schools of the Army, or who may be detailed for duty as instructors at civilian military training camps appropriated for in this act, or who may be detailed for duty with tactical units of the Air Service, as provided in section 37a of the Army reorganization act approved June 4, 1920, or not to exceed three reserve officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department, or except one officer of the Medical Reserve Corps: Provided further, That pay and allowances of such additional officers and nurses of the Medical Reserve Corps as are required to supplement the like officers and nurses of the Regular Army in the care of beneficiaries of the United States Veterans' Bureau treated in Army hospitals may be paid from the funds allotted to the War Department by that bureau under existing law.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 3, strike out the figures "$250,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$981,975."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I will ask that you look at the top of page 17, because the appropriation provided by this bill practically wipes out the summer training of the Reserve Corps of the Army. This House has voted to reduce the officer personnel of the Regular Army, and judging from the expressions of opinion by various Members during the debate, this House will probably vote to reduce the present enlisted strength of the Regular Army. There remains therefore as reserve the National Guard and the Reserve Corps. I ask the committee's very careful attention to the figures I shall give you, because I do not believe that it is the desire of this committee to absolutely cripple and ultimately wipe out the Reserve Corps of the United States Army.

This bill provides an appropriation of $250,000 for pay for the Officers' Reserve Corps. The amendment which I have offered provides that one-quarter of the amount which the War Department asks for, $987,975, will be given by this House instead of the above $250,000. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] in a moment will offer another substitute amendment which will provide that $1,963,951, one-half of what the War Department asked for the Reserve Corps, be granted. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] will offer a third amendment as a substitute suggesting to the House that they give to the Officers' Reserve Corps $3,927,902, the exact amount the War Department asked for. In other words, the War Department recommended that there be appropriated $3,927,902 for the Reserve Corps' pay. The committee has cut that down to $250,000. By the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] as a substitute and the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] the House will have a chance to say whether they will give to the Reserve Corps what the War Department asked, one-half of what the War Department asked, one-quarter of what the War Department asked, or if they want to follow the recommendations of the committee and practically wipe out the training of the Reserve Corps in the coming summer.

I have some figures which I have compiled from the statements before the committee, and I think this matter is so serious to the defense of this Nation that I will ask the committee to listen to these figures.

I wish to make two preliminary remarks. The defect of the American system before the war was the lack of trained emergency officers. Second, a lack of properly organized skeleton units, properly officered units into which you could pour your enlisted men for use in an emergency. I say to the committee that you must remember that not only in times of actual combat but in all times of warfare when your sons and brothers are in the military service their life and health depend on the training of their officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. In this past war enlisted men were put into trained divisions and inside of six weeks they were in the front-line trenches, but you can not train officers in the sanitation of camps or in troop leading in that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says, and I am curious to know if General Sawyer would be in any danger unless this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HILL. In my argument I am standing for national defense and not for any particular officer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I thought the "rider of the white horse" ought to know.

Mr. HILL. That touches a subject very dear to me, but if the gentleman had read the bill he would know that I am talking of national defense and not of a return to national common sense on the question the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I was asking the gentleman to discuss the common sense of it.

Mr. HILL. On this depends the continued organization of the Reserve Corps in the United States.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I regret that I can not yield.

Let me go over some figures about this. There are four items necessary for the maintenance of the organized reserve. This bill provides, first, $250,000 for the pay of the officers of the reserve corps. It provides a nominal $100 for the pay of enlisted men of the reserve corps. It provides for nothing for transportation of the officers of the reserve corps, and nothing for transportation, subsistence, and so forth, for the enlisted men in the reserve corps. The total appropriation under this bill for the reserve corps for those items is $250,100.

At the present time we have 65,000 reserve officers. The War Department planned to train less than one-half of these next summer—that is, 27,722 officers. It is also planned at the same time to train 20,000 enlisted men of the reserve corps, together with some special training. For this the War Department asks $7,441,858 in other items which I shall show in a moment in addition to the pay, because this item of pay is only one item of expense. The estimated cost per man and officer on this basis for pay, transportation, and so forth, for the 15 days' training is an average of $151.80. The War Department proposed to train out of the whole reserve corps only 27,722 officers and 20,000 men, or, with 1,300 other officers, a total of 49,022. This bill provides pay which will train 1,556 officers only in the whole United States. It will train 184 in each of the nine Army corps areas, and it will train only 34 officers on an average from each of the 48 States of the Union. That wipes out your reserve corps, as far as training goes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. The War Department requested pay for reserve officers for three months at school—400 officers, half of that is 200, and one-quarter of that, which is my amendment, is 100; officers for 45 days as instructors at military training camps, 900. Half of that is 450, and my amendment is 225. Officers for 15 days, field training, 27,722. Half of that is 13,861, and one-quarter of what they ask for is 6,980, which my amendment will pay. Enlisted men for 15 days, field training, 20,000, asked for by the War Department. There is no pay for them, except $100, provided in this bill. One-half of that is 10,000, one-quarter is 5,000. If my amendment to the officers' pay is adopted, we shall ask for pay for the men in proportion. The total officers proposed to be trained and total men in the nine corps areas is 49,022 under the War Department recommendation. One-half of that is 24,511, and the amendment that I offer furnishes pay for officers based on a total of 12,255. The average for each corps area under the War Department's full recommendation is 5,446. One-half of that is 2,723, and one-quarter of it is 1,361. For each State on that average, War Department recommendation of trained officers and men in the reserve corps this summer, 1,021; one-half of that is 510 and one-quarter 255.

The cost of that is as follows, and I shall read these figures and then conclude:

Under the estimate of the War Department, pay of officers, $3,927,902. One-half of that is $1,963,951 and one-quarter $981,975. For pay of men, War Department recommendation, $517,648; one-half of that is $258,824, and one-quarter of it is $129,412. Total pay, under the War Department recommendation, $4,445,550. One-half of that is $2,222,775 and one-quarter is $1,111,387. In addition to that there is the cost of transportation, which was developed by the questions asked by the subcommittee.

The figures on that transportation are as follows: Transportation, and so forth, of officers, $1,621,600; one-half of that, $810,800; one-quarter of that, $405,400. Transportation, subsistence, and so forth, for men, $1,374,708; one-half, $687,354; one-quarter, $343,677. Total transportation, under War Department recommendations, $2,996,308. One-half of that is $1,508,154 and one-quarter is $749,077. The total cost of pay, transportation, and all these other items would be, under the War Department recommendations, $7,441,818. One-half of that is $3,730,929, and one-quarter of it is $1,860,464.

In the amendment which I have offered I have sought to increase the amount carried in the bill, $250,000, up to $981,975 for officers' pay on the basis of one-fourth of what the War Department asks. If that amendment be passed, there will be necessary other increases to make a total appropriation for training of the Reserve Corps amounting to $1,860,464. The question is whether you want a reserve corps. If you do, then the recommendation in this bill practically wipes it out. If you want a reserve corps, you must decide whether you want what the War Department asks for, whether you want half of that, or whether you want one-quarter of it. The amendment that I have offered provides that you give one-quarter of what the War Department asks for. The amendment which Mr. CRAGO will offer is one-half and the amendment which Mr. ROGERS will offer is for the full amount asked for by the War Department.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to find out what the gentleman's own attitude is. He speaks of a three-decker proposition. We have a quarter, we have a half, and we have a whole. Is the gentleman in favor of what he offered or is he in favor of the whole or of one-half?

Mr. HILL. I am in favor of the amount that the President and the War Department asked for—the whole amount as will be provided by Mr. ROGERS's amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Has the gentleman offered an amendment to that effect?

Mr. HILL. That amendment will be offered by Mr. ROGERS and will be before the committee to be voted on. They will all three be offered, in order that the committee may have a chance to take what it wants.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman expect to toll the House along to vote for a quarter and then to raise it to a half and then to raise it to the whole amount?

Mr. HILL. No; but I expect to allow the House, if it wishes to do so, to give what the President wants, or a half of what the President wants or a quarter of what the President wants, and not absolutely strangle the reserve corps. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the transportation alone of these reserve officers to go to military training for 15 days would aggregate the enormous amount of $1,500,000?

Mr. HILL. I just read into the RECORD that it would cost, with other expenses, $1,621,600.

Mr. STAFFORD. That would not even provide for the entire number; but for 30,000 alone at $50 a man for transportation it would take a million and a half dollars.

Mr. HILL. I invite the gentleman's attention to the table on page 253 of the committee hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. And I invite the gentleman's attention to the statement of the officer having this matter in charge, at the top of page 25.

Mr. HILL. Well, I am reading from the report the War Department put in in answer to a question by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], where he declares that the total is $1,621,600.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is the direct question propounded by the gentleman from Kansas: For transportation of 30,000 men for 10 days' training, $50 each, $1,500,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, in addition to the training of the Regular Army there are four other branches of training for which this bill provides: First, the training of the National Guard, and we authorize $6,500,000 for the summer training of the National Guard. Next is the civilian military training camps. We had $900,000 for that purpose this year and trained 10,000 men. In this bill we are appropriating $1,500,000 for the training of 30,000 civilians at this summer's camps. Next, for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, training at schools and colleges, we are appropriating nearly $3,000,000 for that purpose, and there will be 110,000 under that form of training this year. Next is the reserve officers in the reserve corps of the Army. There are 65,000 of them. Probably all of them are veterans of the late war. Nearly all of them are trained as well as it is possible to train an officer in the military art, and to say that it is necessary to take every one of those 65,000 men out and put them through a course of training this summer is preposterous. They are already trained officers, a finished product. It is true the War Department wanted to take about one-third of these men, who have already had the best military training possible only a few years ago, to train them again, but the committee did not see its way clear to do it. In the first place they asked $3,900,000 for the purpose of training reserve officers, who are already trained to command, trained in the best school of all, the school of war, and when the committee attempted to analyze the item we found nearly all of the entire amount of $3,900,000 would be absorbed in the payment of salaries to those men for 15 days. In answer to questions propounded by the committee, we found the War Department had failed in the figure they gave to the Budget to make any estimate at all for transportation and no estimate for the subsistence and cost of maintenance of the men after getting them into the camp, and in answer to queries as to the amount of money requisite they stated that it would require about $3,000,000 in additional appropriations for these purposes, so if you are going through with the proposition to again train these already trained reserve officers, as advocated by the gentleman from Maryland, you want to be prepared to appropriate at least $6,000,000 for that purpose.

Now, if the necessity existed for the training of these reserve officers at this time we would be willing to provide for it, but the committee does not believe that the necessity exists. The War Department did do what the committee thought was a practical thing last summer. They did not have sufficient money available under the appropriation of $250,000, so they tried out an experiment at Camp Meade, and they invited the reserve officers in the States contiguous to that camp to report at a certain time for voluntary training. The result was very satisfactory, and several hundred of the reserve officers answered the call, appeared, and underwent a voluntary period of instruction in a very satisfactory manner.

I believe if the War Department would adopt a similar policy and open such voluntary camps of instruction for reserve officers at different points in the country, asking that they report voluntarily, without provision for pay, that large numbers of them would come, and I would gladly support an appropriation to provide for subsistence and maintenance while they were at such camps, but I do not believe we are warranted in appropriating several million dollars for the salaries of these men under the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What provision was made in the present fiscal year for this particular item?

Mr. ANTHONY. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars was appropriated, and we propose to reappropriate the same amount. And now, for the information of the House, I will say this provides for an average of nine officers of the Reserve Corps on duty with the General Staff. It provides for the pay of 77 who were sent to Army service schools. We provide for 77 this year. It provides for officers to serve as instructors to assist Regular Army officers at civilian training camps, and provision for the payment of 630 reserve officers for the 16 days of training.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There has been no change in the existing law which would prevent the War Department from carrying on voluntary officers training this summer?

Mr. ANTHONY. Nothing except the lack of appropriations for maintenance.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Where did they get it?

Mr. ANTHONY. They took it from the appropriation for the general maintenance of the Army.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers of the country are to be congratulated upon having in the White House a President with vision enough to sense the craving of the entire world for a return to normalcy, a President with such an abiding faith in those who are associated with him in authority, who have been chosen by the people, that he has summoned to his aid and counsel the best minds of both parties and has launched a program of peace and tranquillity for the world that meets with the approbation of all right-thinking people.

War has left its trail of sorrow and suffering, thousands of homes throughout the land have either been saddened by the placing of a gold star in the service flag on the family altar or have seen their loved ones come back to them broken in body and spirit; financial distress has throttled the Nation; the people are groaning under a burden of taxation, and yet there are those who, obsessed with their personal vanity, seek with their puny hands to muddy the waters and to hold back the irresistible tide of peace which is now running with overwhelming force.

In the face of pressure exerted by those interests which seek to wring from the taxpayers of the country enormous sums with which to build ships to rot and decay and to maintain useless armies in times of peace, Congress has used the knife upon the estimates submitted and has figuratively cut to the bone with the further assurance to the taxpayers that as soon as the recently proposed treaties are ratified, further cutting will be done, to the end that this source of wastefulness in Government expenditures may be curbed.

It is extremely gratifying to know that this Congress has hearkened to the oft-repeated desire of the people for a substantial reduction in the hitherto enormous expenditures for the maintenance of the Army and Navy.

The farmers of our country are aroused as never before against the injustice of spending many hundreds of millions of dollars for the support of useless armies and navies, the cost of which must ultimately be borne by those engaged in agriculture and stock raising, and they will voice their hearty approval of the action of this Congress in eliminating this source of wastefulness.

It is to be regretted that there are those interests which seem to think the farmer is asking too much legislation in his behalf, and who, when legislation is being considered for the advancement and relief of agriculture, plant their feet stubbornly and refuse to be moved; but, fortunately, the time has come when the friends of the farmer are in the saddle in this Congress and his desires and needs are being considered as never before.

To those of us who have been associated with the farmer for many years, who have been his confidant and counselor, who know of the hardships and privations which have been his lot, it is inconceivable that anyone should oppose his efforts to throw off his shackles and enjoy at least a modicum of the advantages and financial returns that accrue in other lines of endeavor.

Surely the man who toils ceaselessly in the heat of summer and the cold of winter to produce the food upon which our existence depends, together with his faithful wife, who must deny herself the many social advantages of the town and city, who is forced by circumstances to work in loneliness, and who must be content to see their children receive an education under great disadvantages, are entitled to better returns for their labor than they have been receiving.

The many measures for the benefit and relief of agriculture which have been enacted into law by the present Congress bear evidence of the fact that those Members who have been sent here from the great Middle West to represent the agricultural interests of that great part of the Nation are functioning.

Extravagance has been checked, appropriations and taxes have been reduced by billions, injurious immigration has been stopped, a budget system inaugurated, a farmers' emergency tariff bill passed, the packers' regulation act has been enacted into law, grain gambling has been restricted, loans to farmers through the War Finance Corporation authorized, and ample funds appropriated for the marketing of farm-loan bonds.

While the war finance act has proven itself a vital factor in rehabilitating agriculture, it must be recognized that it is of a temporary nature and must be followed by a permanent measure which will insure a sound and efficient system of rural credits.

When this has been accomplished and a further substantial reduction in railroad rates has been made effective, coupled with the retrenchment in useless Government expenditures which is now being so successfully accomplished, when the present plans to stabilize the credits of the world bear fruition to enable foreign markets to purchase our grain and manufactured products, surely the taxpayer will have cause for gratification.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. CRAGO to the amendment offered by Mr. HILL: Page 17, line 3, strike out "$250,000" and insert "$1,963,951."

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to burden the House with remarks on the reason for this increase. From the data furnished me I am satisfied this increase, in the main appropriated for the pay of officers, would entail a total expenditure to train this number of officers of something over $3,000,000. I will say I am not in favor of appropriating a sufficient sum to pay the cost and the salaries and the expenses of training all the officers in the Reserve Corps, but I believe if we would appropriate such sum as would provide for pay, subsistence, transportation, and the extra cost of the camps for, say, 10,000 of these officers, that we would have taken a step in the right direction. It is a mighty easy thing to ask men to interest themselves in this work and take their commissions in the Reserve Corps, but these men are going to get away from their training. Training is constantly changing, and many of these men are not financially able, as some of them did last year, to voluntarily respond at their own expense and take this training. That leads to a discrimination. It is only the fellow who has plenty of money and plenty of time to spend who can take advantage of that, whereas the great body of the officers of the Reserve Corps are men who can not afford to take this training unless they are for this short period paid the regular pay commensurate with their rank.

If we are going to cut down our armed force and cut down our officer personnel, I feel like insisting very strongly on annually providing sufficient funds to let these men who are enthusiastic in this work and who already have some degree of training to continue their training, and thus keep in touch with the new ideas developed in Army training. I know very well—at least, I think I know—that a man will soon lose his training and lose what he has gained before unless he year after year has a chance to go over some course of instruction. And I think it is a very, very valuable asset of our country, and it is one of the cheapest forms of national defense which we can adopt.

I do not know whether the House is disposed to increase this appropriation or not. I do hope, however, that the men who have this legislation in charge, when the time comes, will agree with the minds on the other side of the Capitol and work out some well-developed plan; not one that will take a great amount of money but one which will enable the men who really desire this training during the next year to take it. I believe it will be money well spent, and an expenditure which will be approved by the great body of the citizens of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ROGERS. This is in the nature of an amendment to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the substitute, offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 17, line 3, strike out "$250,000" and insert "$3,927,902."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It lacks 15 minutes to 5. It is evident that you can not get through this afternoon.

Mr. ROGERS. I am perfectly willing to withdraw from the floor if there is going to be a discussion of the program.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will if it will not be taken out of my time. I want only five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would it suit the gentleman's purpose if the gentleman from Massachusetts should use his five minutes and then that I should make the motion to rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the largest sum that Congress will devote to the training of officer material in the United States. I was in favor of it this noon. I am more in favor of it now, since the House by a fairly decisive vote has just refused to accept the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] increasing the number of officers from 11,000 to 13,000. I still hope that by the time this bill is enacted we shall have the 13,000 officers that the President and the Secretary of War and every other competent authority have testified the country will need.

In the amendment I have offered I propose a moderate sum of money to train men in peace who shall be prepared in the event of war. I do not know of any way of getting men who shall be ready to command troops if war comes except by training them before war comes. That is precisely the purpose of this amendment.

I find great difficulty, frankly, gentlemen, in following the recommendations of the committee in many respects throughout this bill. I have a high regard personally for the Members who have made up the bill, but I served on the Committee on Appropriations and I know how these things are done. There is a subcommittee of five. They sit by themselves, and then they report to the full Committee on Appropriations. There is an hour's hearing or so before the Committee on Appropriations given to the chairman of the subcommittee. Then, as in this particular case, the bill is ordered reported out by the committee of 35 without the change of a word, or an item, or a line. That is what happens, and the result of that kind of legislation is that three men, three Members of this House, have decided every controverted point involving the military policy of the United States.

In what I say I have no criticism of the patriotism or of the high purpose of the gentlemen who constitute that subcommittee on Military Affairs of the Committee on Appropriations. But I do not forget, gentlemen, the days in 1916 and 1917, when war was in prospect, and even after war had come. What was the record of those gentlemen of the subcommittee on the great questions that confronted the Congress in those days? One of the five voted against the war altogether. Three of them, a majority, voted against the Kahn amendment, which made vital the draft law; and four of the five, all but one, voted for the well-known McLemore resolution by voting against tabling it indefinitely; that is, in effect, they voted for it by voting against tabling it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Since the gentleman is making a rather gratuitous reference to the votes of those gentlemen, will he tell what he means when he says we were delinquent in certain things? When he said we voted against the Kahn amendment, what does the gentleman imply?

Mr. ROGERS. I mean to suggest this, that during the war time there were things that I regarded as vital. The gentleman took another view of them, but I had no criticism of him for that. But now on questions involving the military policy of this Nation I prefer to take the views of President Harding, Secretary Weeks, General Pershing, and General Harbord rather than the views of the members of the Military Affairs subcommittee.

THE MILITARY POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE PENDING ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL—A STORY OF SCUTTLE.

The Committee on Appropriations proposes to reduce our officers to 11,000 and our enlisted men to 115,000. It proposes that, except in emergency and after June 30 next, our troops in Hawaii and in the Panama Canal Zone shall be limited to 5,000 enlisted men each, our troops in Europe to 500, and that all our forces now in China shall be withdrawn altogether. For reasons which I have already discussed—see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Saturday, March 18, 1922, page 4109—I believe these limitations upon our overseas forces are unconstitutional. Whether or not they are constitutional, I am convinced that they are extremely unwise and shortsighted. I am equally convinced that the drastic cut in the size of the Army, while, of course, constitutional, is also extremely unwise and shortsighted.

Leaving out of account some 7,000 Philippine Scouts, the appropriation act for the present fiscal year appropriates for 14,000 officers and 150,000 enlisted men. The estimates of the War Department for 1923, upon which this bill is based, call for an Army of 13,000 officers and approximately 151,000 enlisted men. Our present Army comprises approximately 13,000 officers and 132,000 enlisted men. The pending bill, as I have said, proposes 11,000 officers and 115,000 enlisted men. The bill thus contemplates a reduction in the Army beginning the 1st of July next of approximately 25 per cent, both as compared with the current appropriation act for the present year and with the estimates of the War Department for the ensuing year.

Clearly, such a drastic cut as this is unwarranted unless the recent arms conference has materially changed the situation. But everyone knows that no agreement whatever was reached at that conference leading to the reduction of the land forces of any of the nations. Similarly, probably everyone knows that several of the nations of the world are maintaining land military forces several times as large as our own. We do not expect trouble from any power in the near future. Still less do we want it. But we certainly do not wish to scuttle our Army and reduce it to a point below the effective minimum both for training purposes and in case it were needed for the national defense.

Secretary of War Weeks, General Pershing, General Harbord, and many other responsible military officers solemnly warn the Nation that a reduction below 150,000 men is a reduction below the minimum of safety. We need the extra 35,000 men, over and above the committee recommendation, not probably for actual use but for insurance purposes—to form the first line of defense in case of need and to form a trained nucleus in case expansion should become necessary. There is not a line of testimony in the hearings which shows either a reason or a basis for the committee action. On the contrary, every witness who dealt with the subject solemnly warned against any considerable reduction.

To my mind, still worse than the cut itself is the manner proposed by the committee for making possible the cut. To-day we have in Hawaii some 12,000 officers and men. The committee proposal would require this to be reduced by 60 per cent, to 5,000 men. To-day we have in Panama some 7,000 men. The committee proposes to lop 2,000 from this force.

Hawaii is the key to the Pacific Ocean and the key to the defense of our Pacific coast. In the islands are 115,000 Japanese and 161,000 of all other races. Forty-two per cent of the population of the islands to-day is Japanese. Secretary Weeks told the committee that there were materially fewer troops even to-day in Hawaii than the requirements of the situation demanded. He pointed out that the Hawaiian Islands are the point from which the defense of the Pacific coast should be made; that any expenditure in the protection of the islands saves a vast amount of preparation on the Pacific coast. He stated that every dollar spent there would mean the expenditure of several dollars on the coast if we did not control the islands. He stated frankly to the committee that there is no reason to control the islands unless we have enough men to protect the situation, and that it would be the height of imprudence not to have a material military force there. Yet, in the face of the testimony of the Secretary of War and of the even stronger testimony, if possible, of General Harbord, the Assistant Chief of Staff, the committee deliberately proposes to reduce the Hawaiian garrison by 60 per cent, from 12,000 to 5,000. I ask every Member of this House to read General Harbord's testimony, on pages 1454 to 1456 of the hearings, and Secretary Weeks's testimony, on pages 1466 and 1467.

This bill might be termed "A bill to withdraw the western frontier of the United States to a point east of the Rocky Mountains." Some one may say—though the committee report does not say—that the four-power treaty recently agreed to is a sufficient reason for cutting down our Pacific forces to a comparative handful. I have every confidence in the utility of the four-power treaty and earnestly hope that it will be ratified by the Senate. But, to paraphrase General Putnam, "Let us trust in God and in the four-power treaty, but let us also keep our powder dry."

No; I do not feel satisfied to depend wholly upon the good will of other nations. I apprehend no early trouble with any other power. But I know of no more effective insurance against trouble than to keep at least 15,000 American troops at the "crossroads of the Pacific." There they serve as an object lesson to all men. There they are on the spot, to be moved swiftly wherever the danger, wherever the emergency arises. There they are ever present to protect our great naval base, which, under the four-power treaty, is to be our western outpost for the navies of the country.

Suppose by July 1 we cut down our present 12,000 in Hawaii to 5,000 as the bill proposes. Suppose a year or two hence some emergency arises which leads the President and the Secretary of War to conclude that three times the force must be immediately dispatched to the Hawaiian Islands. The instant our troops set forth from the Pacific coast the expedition will be regarded as a grave menace, perhaps almost as an act of war, by the other party concerned in the incident. While, if we retain our present troops, as every military adviser urges, we should have that vastly greater protection in case of need and at the same time avoid the risk of seeming to threaten and of certainly offending another power.

Perhaps it will be said, as it has been said time out of mind on this floor, that no credence is to be placed upon the recommendations of the President, the Secretary of War, of General Pershing, or of the Assistant Chief of Staff, General Harbord. Personally I resent and despise the frequent allegation that an officer of the United States Army—even the Secretary of War—is so prejudiced as to make his recommendations of little value, but, nevertheless, the argument will be urged again, as it has been urged in the past, on this floor.

What is the alternative? To vote with the Subcommittee on Military Affairs.

Let us assume, if you like, that the President, Secretary Weeks, General Pershing, and General Harbord—able men all, to whom the country owes much—are not infallible. What, I repeat, is the alternative? To me the answer is plain. On a matter of military policy I prefer to be recorded with these men rather than with the Subcommittee on Military Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] has just made a statement here, which indicates that he himself does not know what he is talking about. It is a statement that has frequently been made in the years that have elapsed since we voted on what was known as the Kahn amendment. The statement is that Members of this House who voted against that amendment opposed some vital legislation which was necessary for the conduct of the war. I deny that, and I rather resent the action of the gentleman from Massachusetts in intruding it into this debate. The majority of the Committee on Military Affairs under the leadership of the chairman of the committee at that time, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], reported into this House a bill for raising the military forces of the United States to conduct the war. We provided in that legislation that the President should first call for 500,000 volunteers, giving him the power thereafter to use all the machinery of the draft and to raise all the men that were necessary to conduct that war. The bill so came upon the floor of the House. The gentleman from California merely offered an amendment to strike out the authority to raise 500,000 volunteers.

Mr. MADDEN. But we did raise several hundred thousand volunteers.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am coming to that. The House struck out the authority to raise the increment of volunteers and enacted the exact provisions of the draft act as our committee reported it, and for which I voted. Now, what did the War Department do? They found that if they acted alone upon the language of the Kahn resolution they would lose six months' valuable time in perfecting the machinery of the draft act, so they resorted exactly to the policy outlined by the Military Committee of the House under the leadership of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], and instead of raising 500,000 volunteers, they raised nearly a million and a half. [Applause.] And I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] that my vote on that measure was absolutely sound at that time from the standpoint of military policy, as was demonstrated by the action of the administration and the War Department in following exactly the policy outlined in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs to the House. [Applause.]

I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the War Department appropriation bill (H. R. 10871) had come to no resolution thereon.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 9859), disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Post Office appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Speaker appointed as conferees Mr. SLEMP, Mr. MADDEN, and Mr. SISSON.

Mr. BOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk Senate concurrent resolution 20 and consider the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 20.

One-half of the expenses of such committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Speaker appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. CRAGO, Mr. ARENTZ, Mr. FISH, Mr. MCSWAIN, and Mr. RANKIN.

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the post office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the post-office appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I present the following in reference to the pneumatic tube mail service in New York City.

Congress has always voted in favor of the use of these tubes, and on June 28, 1918, this House concurred with the Senate in directing the Postmaster General to continue the tubes in use, but this action was prevented by President Wilson's veto of the post office appropriation bill which contained this provision.

Later Congress authorized a joint commission to look into the subject, and Senator CHARLES E. TOWNSEND is chairman of this commission, which was created by section 6 of the post office appropriation act approved April 24, 1920, "To investigate all methods of carrying the mails, etc."

This commission submitted to Congress on July 26, 1921, the recommendation that the Postmaster General enter into negotiations with the company owning the New York system of tubes "looking into an agreement upon the terms under which service, if restored, may be maintained and such agreement be presented to the commission before final action is taken by the Postmaster General."

This action by the joint commission was based on the unanimous report of its investigating engineers and of a committee of postal experts who were assigned to the commission by the Post Office Department.

A summary of the report of these engineers and experts is as follows:

(a) That these tubes can handle 10,000,000 letters a day if called upon to do so.

(b) That instead of delaying a large number of letters they actually delayed 84,469 in the 12 months ending June 30, 1918, out of 3,158,000,000 carried, or 1 in 37,400, whereas motor vehicles delayed 74,216,000 letters in 3½ months.

(c) That instead of soiling and damaging "many thousand letters" they actually soiled in one year 588 letters, or but 1 in each 5,000,000 transmitted, and damaged 70 letters, or 1 in 45,000,000 transmitted.

(d) That the tube service was remarkably efficient and the criticisms against it unjustifiable and not based on facts.

(e) That the tubes performed in a manner reflecting great credit on the design of the apparatus and on the actual methods of operation.

(f) That 330,858,000 letters were delayed by motor-vehicle service in one year as compared to 84,000 letters by tube, or on the ratio of 3,915 to 1, and that in one severe snowstorm—February 21, 1921—4,963,500 letters were delayed by motor-vehicle service, or fifty times as much mail as the tubes delayed in 365 days.

(g) That when the pneumatic tubes were discontinued it was necessary to increase motor-vehicle service 51 per cent, or by 96 vehicles, thus increasing street congestion and danger of accidents.

(h) That loss and theft of mail is impossible from the pneumatic tubes, and that while in the last six years of tube operation there was but one loss of registered mail, in 1920 there were 113 robberies, with a loss of $234,000, and in 1921, in one instance, a $2,000,000 robbery.

(i) That instead of increasing motor-vehicle service but 15 per cent, as estimated by First Assistant Postmaster General Koons, in 1918, when the tubes were discontinued, it was necessary within six months to increase the service 51 per cent, during which period the postal receipts increased only 5.88 per cent.

(j) That this automobile service, and the necessary extra dispatching clerks, cost $437,844 instead of $193,019, as estimated by Mr. Koons, as compared with the tube contract cost of $472,245 which it displaced.

(k) That the number of pouches increased from 7,183 to 20,354, showing that the tubes carried more than 13,000 pouches daily.

(l) That the automobiles were dispatched half hourly, as compared with carriers' dispatch every 10 seconds, or almost continuously, by tube, and at a speed of 7 to 10 miles per hour, as compared to the tube speed of 30 miles per hour, by which system the mail is delivered directly to the working space of the post office.

The nine postal experts assigned to the commission by the Post Office Department were unanimous in their opinion—that the pneumatic-tube service expedites the transmission of first-class mail because of its constant availability, increased speed in transmission as compared with motor vehicles, and its freedom from interruption to which all street traffic is subject.

They recommended that the former pneumatic tubes be reestablished; that certain extensions be made; and set forth in detail the data upon which their recommendations are based.

The conclusions of the officials of the Post Office Department and of the Postmaster General after a thorough investigation were the same as those reached by the joint congressional commission, by the engineers and experts assigned to this commission, namely, the urgent necessity for the immediate reestablishment of this pneumatic-tube service. They pointed out in this connection that some 14,000,000 pieces of mail are handled in New York daily. Of this number 8,000,000 pieces, or 57 per cent, is letter mail, although measured by bulk letter mail is but 12 per cent of the total mail.

The postal receipts in New York are in excess of $53,000,000 a year, and the receipts from letter mail in excess of $36,000,000 a year. The letter mail alone pays a profit; all other mail is carried at a loss.

The pneumatic tubes were built to speed the letter mail only, and according to the official records they speeded 72 per cent of the letter mail in New York City, though they connect only 26 of the 46 postal stations under the jurisdiction of the postmaster of New York.

The Postmaster General therefore recommended to the joint congressional commission that an appropriation be made and authority given for the immediate restoration of pneumatic-tube service in New York and Brooklyn.

These tubes connect all but seven postal stations in the Borough of Manhattan, or New York City proper, and cross Brooklyn Bridge to two post offices in Brooklyn. They are 8 inches inside diameter, made of bored cast-iron pipe, through which cartridges, 24 inches long, carry the mail at a speed of 30 miles an hour. These tubes are laid in pairs, like a double-track railway. The capacity of each tube line between each postal station connected is 180,000 letters an hour. These tubes were constructed on the specifications of the Post Office Department and at the request of the Post Office Department.

These tubes will carry 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 letters in New York every day, and at a cost of less than 2 cents per 100 letters carried, or less than 1 per cent of the $2 paid by the public for forwarding these 100 letters. It is pertinent to note in this connection that the public pays approximately 90 cents a pound for the delivery of letter mail, since there are about 45 letters to the pound, as compared with 1½ cents per pound for forwarding second-class mail.

The reestablishment of the tubes in New York City will benefit not only the people in that city but also all people who write to or receive letters from that city, through the earlier, more regular, and safer delivery of the letter mail. The use of the tubes will help to modify street congestion and prevent accidents; will give equal and uniform postal facilities over the entire city, thus tending to prevent business establishments concentrating at one point; and because of their speed, the tubes, for practical purposes, will put all post offices under one roof.

The reestablishment of the tubes will benefit the Post Office Department in reducing the number of automobile trips, pouching clerks, trucking and platform labor, and auxiliary service required to meet late trains. By permitting decentralization and each post office doing its own work, the tubes will save the labor and rent at concentration and transfer points which are now required; will keep clerks busy during storm and traffic delays; will permit portions of the postal load to be shifted immediately, without additional cost to the Government, from busy to nonbusy postal stations; will reduce the number of registered mail guards; and will give to the public the best possible mail service.

The Joint Congressional Commission at a meeting held on January 9, 1922, approved the making of a contract in New York for the reestablishment of the tubes at an annual rental rate per mile of $18,500, or $513,911.50 per year, with the proviso that either the company or the Post Office Department, after the starting of the service, might appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a revision of this rate, which commission, however, shall not find a rate in excess of $19,500 per mile per annum. No minimum has been set. The commission also advised a provision in the contract permitting the Government to purchase the system if it so desired.

The immediate reestablishment of pneumatic tube service in New York City is recommended by the Joint Congressional Commission on Postal Service; by its engineers and postal experts; by the Postmaster General, the Budget officials, and the postmaster and officials of the New York post office; by an advisory committee of New York citizens appointed by the Postmaster General; by the mayor, the city government, the Merchants Association, and all civic organizations in Greater New York.

The statement of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, which is concurred in and forwarded to the Senate in a communication from the President of the United States transmitting supplemental estimates for appropriation for the Post Office Department, is as follows:

The estimate for pneumatic-tube service was not included in the Budget for 1923 for the reason that the Joint Postal Commission arrived at its conclusion to recommend the resumption of tube service in New York and Brooklyn only last week, at which time the Post Office appropriation bill was already before the House of Representatives.

* * * * * * *

The advantages to be obtained from the resumption of service by these pneumatic tubes can not be measured in dollars and cents, since they consist of, first, expediting the service; second, increasing the regularity and reliability of the delivery of first-class mail; third, increasing the safety with which mail is distributed; and, fourth, the relief of vehicular congestion in the streets.

If the resumption of this service is authorized and appropriation therefor made, it will be possible to reduce the estimates for clerk hire in first and second class post offices, under the First Assistant Postmaster General, by the amount of $150,000 from the amount originally estimated, and the appropriation for vehicle service in cities, under the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, by the amount of $200,000 from the amount originally estimated. While these reductions do not offset the cost of the operation of the tubes, they serve to reduce the cost of expedited and more reliable service of distribution, and it is anticipated that the saving in vehicular service in cities, under the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, can later be increased after the readjustment is completed.

The bill as amended by the Senate carried an appropriation for the reestablishment of the pneumatic-tube service in New York City, and I feel that the reasons that prompted that action may be of interest to Members of the House. I append herewith a report from the Merchants' Association of New York on the subject:

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK.

("To foster the trade and welfare of New York.")

IN THE MATTER OF SENATE AMENDMENT TO THE POSTAL APPROPRIATION BILL FOR THE RESUMPTION OF PNEUMATIC TUBE POSTAL SERVICE IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

To the Members of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

The Senate has added to the postal appropriation bill as adopted by the House an item to provide for the restoration of the pneumatic tube postal service in the city of New York.

The abandonment in 1918 of the postal tubes seriously impaired the postal service in this city and delayed the movement of important mail throughout the entire country. The direct effects of such abandonment were:

1. GREAT INCREASE IN THE TIME BETWEEN MAILING AND DELIVERY OF LOCAL LETTERS.

Formerly local letters mailed prior to 1 o'clock were regularly delivered the same day by means of the tubes. Since abandonment of the tubes, in a test of local mail movement made by this association, out of 118 letters mailed before noon of a given day 81 were not delivered until the following day. With the tubes in use the time between mailing and delivery averaged 2 to 3 hours. Without the tubes 18 to 20 hours elapsed between mailing and delivery in 69 per cent of the cases.

With the tubes local service in the business section is usually completely performed within the day of mailing; without the tubes it is usually not completed until the following day.

2. DELAY IN SPECIAL-DELIVERY LETTERS.

At the present time from 15,000 to 17,000 "special delivery" letters per day require from three to five or six hours for delivery. When the tubes were in operation delivery was made in from half an hour to two hours.

3. HEAVY ROBBERIES OF REGISTERED MAILS.

Registered mails of great value move through the tubes with absolute safety against robbery. Since abandonment of the tubes robberies of mail autos carrying registered mails have caused immense losses. To afford protection against robbery an armed guard now accompanies each principal dispatch of registered mail. For this sole purpose about 140 postal employees are required besides a number of United States marines. The annual cost of this protection is very considerable. Restoration of the tubes will fully protect registered mail and make the outlay needless.

4. FREQUENT AND OFTEN PROTRACTED DELAY TO THE ENTIRE BODY OF OUTGOING MAILS.

Winter storms prevent prompt and complete movement of mails by auto. Whenever there is heavy snow it is an almost daily occurrence for autos carrying large quantities of mail for a particular train to miss connection. Such mail is delayed many hours, often until the following day.

To minimize this risk the running time allowed for movement of autos is doubled or trebled, and mails are "closed" at the office of dispatch correspondingly earlier. It frequently happens that important mails are thus closed from two to three hours—and sometimes more—in advance of train time, and large quantities of mail are held over for later dispatch on slower trains with poorer connections. Every part of the country is harmfully affected by delays of this class.

The tube service completely avoids delays from this cause. It assures certain delivery to outgoing trains of all letter mail deposited prior to the normal closing time.

5. DELAY TO LATE OUTGOING LETTERS.

When autos are used the dispatch of letters to trains ceases 30 to 45 minutes or more before train time. The dispatch of letters by tube continues until about 10 minutes before train time. The tubes continue to forward letters for a particular train for 20 to 35 minutes or more after their forward movement by auto has ceased. About half a million letters were thus daily expedited when the tubes were in use. With auto service a similar number are delayed each day. That delay frequently makes a difference of 24 hours in delivery.

6. DELAY TO INCOMING MAILS.

The prompt movement of incoming mails was in similar manner impeded by the suspension of the rapid and certain tube service and the substitution of the slower and less reliable auto service. The difference in promptitude of service was especially noticeable in the winter season, when the auto service was impeded by weather conditions which did not affect the tube service. Late delivery of early morning mail was a condition of extreme frequency, and investigation demonstrated that it was mainly due to delays arising from auto service.

The great practical utility of the tube service has been shown beyond reasonable controversy by the searching study, covering two years, of postal methods made by the Joint Commission on Postal Service, of which Senator TOWNSEND is chairman.

In the conclusions of that commission Postmaster General Hays emphatically concurred.

Gen. Charles G. Dawes, Director of the Bureau of the Budget, whose especial business it is to cut out needless or undesirable appropriations, reviewed the recommendation of the commission and indorsed the desired appropriation; and, finally, President Harding approved the estimates and transmitted them to Congress.

We know by actual experience the deterioration of our mail service which followed the withdrawal of the tubes and which still continues. We formerly had a facility which was continuous, certain, and speedy in operation. We now have as a substitute an inferior facility, of relative slowness and subject to frequent delays which affect mail movement throughout the entire country.

We therefore urge the restoration of the pneumatic tubes as essential to the restoration of our postal service to its former excellence.

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
LEWIS E. PIERSON, Acting President.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on rural credits.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I introduced a bill seeking to make rural credits easier and more helpful to the farmers and am preparing for introduction within the next few days a bill seeking to establish a "producer to consumer" marketing system. I invite the attention of Congress and the country to these bills.

The farmers are entitled to a much better rural credit system than they have ever had. I believe I am offering such a system. The farmers are entitled to a much better marketing system than they have ever enjoyed. I believe I am proposing a way to establish such a system. In these efforts I am asking for friendly suggestions and criticisms. Let us do something helpful to the farmers along these lines.

The farmers need loans now. They would not need them if they could only get a fair price for their products. Help the fathers and mothers and boys and girls of the farm to sell all they can produce directly from the producer to the consumer, at a reasonable price, and they will make all the money they need and to spare. Justice is all they ask. Simple justice, if granted, will give them that which is justly theirs and will enable them instead of borrowers to become lenders of money.

Mr. Speaker, I shall discuss these bills more at length at a more convenient season when I can secure more time for a more detailed explanation of them.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 22, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 16, 1922.)

The Senate met in open executive session at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the four-power treaty.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate petitions of 14,000 ministers of religion, representing the leading denominations in America and members of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, praying for the prompt ratification, without reservation, of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted at a meeting of the officers of the executive council, United Synagogue of America, favoring ratification of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a statement of the administrative committee of the National Catholic Welfare Council, indorsing the general results of the Conference on Limitation of Armament as a contribution to world peace, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the Committee for Treaty Ratification, praying for the ratification of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD. (See petitions, when subsequently presented by Mr. LODGE.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of a possible false impression being had as to the attitude of the National Catholic Welfare Council toward the four-power treaty, I ask unanimous consent to have a letter, copies of which have been sent to all Senators from the general secretary of that organization, entered in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NATIONAL CATHOLIC WELFARE COUNCIL,
Washington, D. C., March 18, 1922.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: A few days ago exception was taken upon the floor of the Senate to what was called the action of the churches in an effort to influence the Members of the United States Senate to ratify at once and without reservation the four-power and other treaties now before it for consideration.

As general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Council, representing officially the Catholic Church of the United States, I wish to state emphatically that the Catholic Church has taken no part in such a movement. Dispatches appearing in the press that might have given this impression are entirely without warrant.

The National Catholic Welfare Council issued a general statement after the adjournment of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament. This pronouncement was used by the Church Peace Union, of New York, in a way that may have given a false impression. For your information I inclose a copy of a letter which I sent to every Catholic clergyman in the United States and which will show you that the wish of the Catholic body is simply to promote, in a general way, movements that on their face make for public welfare and for the peace of the world. Documents such as treaties that make such movements concrete are to be left entirely to the judgment of those who have the public responsibility of deciding upon their wording and their acceptance.

Very sincerely yours, JOHN J. BURKE, C. S. P.,
General Secretary.

NATIONAL CATHOLIC WELFARE COUNCIL,
Washington, D. C., March 11, 1922.

DEAR AND REVEREND FATHER: A false impression may have been given you by a number of notices with inclosed postal card sent out in the one envelope by the Church Peace Union. The postal asked the priests of the country to sign a statement to the effect that they were of the opinion that the United States Senate should ratify the four-power treaty and other treaties now pending before it without reservations.

The inclosure of the statement issued by the National Catholic Welfare Council, commending the Conference on Limitation of Armament and its general results, may have led you to the belief that the National Catholic Welfare Council joined in this movement to have influence brought upon the United States Senate to ratify without reservation. Such an impression is entirely unwarranted and erroneous. The National Catholic Welfare Council refused to join in such movement and is of the conviction that the liberty of conscientious action ought to be left to every Member of the United States Senate.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN J. BURKE, C. S. P.,
General Secretary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I also ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Lindsay Crawford, editor of the Montreal Statesman, a Canadian Liberal journal, in which he expresses the view of the Liberal thought of Canada upon the four-power pact.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[Extract from a statement of Lindsay Crawford, editor of the Montreal Statesman, a Canadian Liberal journal, presenting the viewpoint of an important group in Canada on the four-power treaty.]

Was it nothing to Americans that Canada had asked in vain to be invited to send a Canadian representative to the Conference on the Reduction of Armaments at Washington? Was it fair to Canadians who, having been assured by Mr. Lloyd-George that Canada and the other Dominions now were the coequals in status of Great Britain, and that this new status had been recognized by the whole world, found the door at the Washington conference bolted and barred against Canada? What was the reason? It might be urged that until Canada definitely and formally claimed international recognition that it was impossible for the Government at Washington to recognize Canada's place in the comity of nations. To Canadians it looked as if Washington had an understanding with England to interpret British official declarations touching Canada's status in terms wholly different from those accepted in Canada. All the official documents of the arms conference referred only to the British Empire, thus perpetuating the old and obsolete idea that in international law there was but one British sovereign State—the British Empire. Whatever the cause there was a deep-rooted suspicion in the minds of many Canadians that British imperial statesmen were deceiving the Dominions and lulling them to sleep with honeyed words about their improved status in the hope of completing imperial reconstruction on the old, discredited lines. It should be of some concern to Americans, who recalled their own struggle for international recognition of the birth of the American Republic, to find among Canadians a growing feeling of profound disappointment that a country so closely related to the United States by geographical and cultural ties was presumed not to exist, and that the freedom of the United States in her external relations was circumscribed in the case of Canada by some tacit understanding between London and Washington that gave rise to the suspicion that Downing Street exercised a secret and dominating influence at the Capital that was inimical to national freedom on the American Continent, and that enabled England, in defiance of the attitude of Canada and without her knowledge or consent, to reconstruct, reinforce, and complete an imperial sovereign statehood to which Canada in the last resort was resolutely opposed. In support of his contention that British diplomacy exercised an unwholesome and preponderating influence at Washington he (Mr. Crawford) would remind Americans of events at Washington that were fresh in the public memory. It had been denied in some quarters that the British delegation at the arms conference had been given facilities for publicity in the United States that were denied to the American people by their own administration. But when British propagandists left Washington they grew very communicative about the privileges that had been extended to them by America. One of these, Mr. Wickham Steed, editor of the London Times, who was in close and intimate touch with Mr. Hughes at Washington, spilled the beans in a speech delivered at Montreal to the Canadian Club, which was published in the Montreal Gazette of December 28, 1921. In this speech he declared:

"All these agreements are a long step toward the reestablishment of frankness and good faith as a chief medium of international intercourse. As a means to this end the world owes a great debt of gratitude to President Harding, and especially to Secretary Hughes, for the calling of this special conference and the honest and straightforward manner in which it has been conducted."

Continuing, Mr. Crawford said: Then follows the statement to which he specially desired to draw the attention of Americans. This part of Mr. Steed's address was headed by the Gazette report with the appropriate caption, "Did not use press." It was as follows:

"As an instance of the even excessive forbearance and good faith that had been shown by the American delegates at the Washington conference, Mr. Steed, an old newspaperman, cited the fact that no matter how touchy were the matters involving the United States which had been discussed, and despite the invitations to use the American press as a lever to create international disturbances, the American delegates had sealed their mouths. 'The American delegates refused to give out any news at all during the conference,' said Mr. Steed. 'They left this whole matter with the British publicity agent, Lord Riddell, and I am not giving away any state secrets when I say that when Lord Riddell left Washington there was general lamentation among the American and other correspondents, who wondered where they would proceed to get the real news. That may have been Quixotic on the part of the Americans, but rather than be under any suspicion of using their (American) press to turn public opinion against nations with whom they may have had differences, they did this, and the American delegates were absolutely and honorably silent."

The American public was more credulous than he (Mr. Crawford) believed it to be if it accepted without question this British tribute to the American delegates because they remained, in their relations with the American people, "absolutely and honorably silent." What he as a Canadian resented was the use that was made of American institutions and the machinery of American publicity to arrest the natural evolution of the Dominions and to aid the imperialists in London in carrying out their pet project of empire reconstruction that would centralize in London the control of all imperial foreign relations, making of Canada and the other Dominions integral parts of a single imperial sovereign State in international law, securing thereby, contrary to all accepted conceptions of democratic and responsible government, united diplomatic and military action by every part of the British Empire. It was true that in international law no British State existed save the British Empire represented by the Government of Great Britain. But the war had challenged anew the doctrine laid down by the imperialists of the diplomatic unity of the Empire, and the request of Canada to be independently represented at the arms conference represented an official gesture by the Government of Canada, which, presumably after conversations between Washington and London, was politely ignored by the Executive head of the American Republic. This cold-shouldering of a neighboring nation that was seeking its own is all the more inexplicable, seeing that it was primarily due to Canada that the Anglo-Japanese alliance was forced to the front on the agenda of the arms conference. Mr. Wickham Steed, in his speech at Montreal in December last on his way back to England, told of the talk he had with Secretary Hughes over the Anglo-Japanese alliance, based upon his (Mr. Steed's) personal observations in western Canada, that in any war between the United States and Japan "the position of British Columbia and the western Provinces, as part of the British Empire, would be very hard to maintain." Yet, despite the stand taken by Canada against the Anglo-Japanese treaty, and the part played by her in forcing the issue at the Washington conference, it was left to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) to complain in the house at Ottawa only the other day that the Canadian Government, represented by his predecessor, Mr. Arthur Meighen, had yielded to pressure in having Canada represented at Washington by Sir Robert Borden, who went, not as a Canadian delegation but as part of a British delegation. What was the result of this understanding between London and Washington? It had rendered of no effect the deliberate declarations of British statesmen that the Dominions no longer occupied the subordinate colonial status in international affairs that obtained before the late war. Speaking at the imperial conference of premiers, held in London last year, Mr. Lloyd-George in categorical terms defined the new status of the self-governing Dominions in these words:

"In recognition of their (soldiers') services and achievements in the war the British Dominions have now been accepted fully into the comity of nations by the whole world. They are signatories to the treaty of Versailles and of all other treaties of peace; they are members of the assembly of the League of Nations, and their representatives have already attended meetings of the league; in other words, they have achieved full national status, and they now stand beside the United Kingdom as equal partners in the dignities and responsibilities of the British Commonwealth. If there are any means by which that status can be rendered even clearer to their own communities and to the world at large, we shall be glad to have them put forward at this conference."

Imperial obscurantism has left Canada under the impression that she is not only entitled to be accepted fully into the comity of nations, but that she has been accepted fully into the comity of nations by the whole world. The distinction between what Mr. Lloyd-George terms full national status and what international law alone recognizes as independent States has been finely drawn in all the imperial pronouncements on the subject, but the doctrine of united diplomatic and military action through a single, centralized Empire State has little backing in Canada, and no Government to-day could obtain the support of a majority of the Canadian people behind any movement that would permanently condemn Canada to the acceptance of the imperial idea that the foreign relations of the self-governing Dominions must remain in the control of a central imperial sovereignty. When would Americans wake up from their lethargy and see in the efforts to reconstruct the British Empire on the old vicious lines of centralized control a menace to democratic government on this continent, and in the end a fruitful cause of international disturbance? It should cease to be a matter of supreme indifference to the great American Nation that the imperial idea of government which the fathers of the Republic so emphatically rejected for themselves and those who followed will in this new day, which has been dedicated to the establishment and maintenance of democracy as the only reliable safeguard of human freedom, receive from the Government and people of the United States the stamp of their approval.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I hope the Senator will not do that. I think the time before the unlimited debate will close, at 3 o'clock, is so short that we ought not to waste any time in securing a quorum. I therefore ask that the Senator from Oregon withdraw his call for a quorum.

Mr. McNARY. My only reason for making it, I will explain to the Senator from Wisconsin, is that I know a number of Senators wish to hear him speak, and I think they should be given an opportunity to come by a call for a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very much flattered by the observation of the Senator from Oregon, but I think under the circumstances I will ask him not to insist upon a roll call.

Mr. McNARY. Very well; I withdraw the demand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I had hoped that the absence of a quorum would not be insisted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is not required to yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With all deference to my friend from North Carolina, I shall decline to yield, simply because I understand that some other Senator or Senators desire to speak before 3 o'clock, and I am afraid that considerable time will be consumed in securing a quorum.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I can not let the observation of the Chair pass without question. A Senator has the right to make the point of no quorum as a point of order, whether the Senator having the floor consents or not.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no question about that. It has always been so held.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sometimes, not always.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will accept the ruling of the Chair, whatever it may be.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think I ought to say, in view of the remarks of other Senators, that when a Senator obtains the floor, under the procedure of the Senate heretofore he is under no obligation to yield to another Senator to suggest the absence of a quorum; and if he refuses to yield for that purpose, a Senator can not make the point as a point of order as other points of order are made. I think the ruling of the Chair is sustained by the weight of the precedents.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not desire to take any time to discuss it. I am satisfied that the precedents will show the other way, that a point of order of a lack of a quorum can be made at any time, regardless of whether the Senator occupying the floor yields for the purpose or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I quite agree with the Senator from Washington.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think as a matter of principle there has to be a quorum present when anything is done, and I do not think the ruling of the Chair could be otherwise. I insist on the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield for that purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not yield, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. How does the Chair rule?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think, in view of the fact——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it is going to take more time to discuss the parliamentary question than it is to get a quorum, I yield for a call of the roll to secure the presence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	Myers	Shortridge
Broussard	Harrison	Nelson	Simmons
Cameron	Heflin	Nicholson	Spencer
Capper	Hitchcock	Oddie	Stanfield

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to state that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] are absent at a committee meeting.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate by illness, being confined to his room at his hotel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do; certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to present petitions from the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the United Synagogue of America, and the Committee for Treaty Ratification, all praying for the ratification of the treaties. They are very brief, and I ask that they may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA,
Washington, March 21, 1922.

To the President of the United States and the Senate of the United States:

The Federal Council, with the cooperation of its constituent bodies, memorialized the President to call the Conference on Limitation of Armament. The churches rendered notable service in creating a spirit and atmosphere which were undoubtedly of real significance, and they are now called upon to consider, and, if they approve, to support the proposals of the conference. There is a confident feeling that this begins a new era with a new spirit and method in international relations. It therefore has far-reaching significance beyond the immediate results. The proposals of the conference, however, are the matters now before us.

While the churches are not concerned with questions of political procedure, it would seem that the proposals now before our Nation clearly embody the important moral principles on the basis of which the churches urged the President to bring these nations together. If this be true, the duty and opportunity of the churches seem clear in urging the Senate to ratify the treaties heartily and promptly.

The ultimate effect of the achievements of the conference does not rest solely upon their acceptance by our Congress, but, as with the conference itself, upon the force of public opinion, for which our churches have large responsibility. The administrative committee and the commission on international justice and good will believe that this may be the real beginning of a movement toward a warless world in which our Nation should find its place of moral leadership.

Faithfully yours,

JOHN M. MOORE,
Acting President and Chairman of the Administrative Committee.
JOHN FINLEY, Chairman.
CHARLES S. MACFARLAND,
General Secretary.
SIDNEY L. GULICK,
Secretary Commission on International Justice and Good Will.

CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN RABBIS,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Richmond, Va., February 15, 1922.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: The members of the Central Conference of American Rabbis rejoice in the results attained by the Conference on the Limitation of Armament held in Washington. The treaties and agreements that have been drawn up by the conference are of great value not merely because of the easing of the economic burden under which the world is staggering but more so because they make for peace and common understanding among the nations. They have solved, for a period of years at least, some vexatious and peril-fraught international problems, and they have given not unjustified hope that these solutions will be permanent.

Their even greater and finer value lies in the precedent which the conference has established that such international problems can be safely and satisfactorily solved by peaceful understanding, by mutual respect, by the good will, and by the self-restraint of nationalistic chauvinism. International relations have been by this conference lifted up to a higher plane, into a clearer moral atmosphere, where the vision is less clouded by the mists of selfish ambition and sordid passions. The spirit of God has been made more manifest. The conference was a work of righteousness, and "the work of righteousness shall be peace and the effect of righteousness shall be quiet and confidence forever."

The Central Conference of American Rabbis therefore earnestly urges that the Senate of the United States ratify without undue delay and without reservation the treaties and agreements drawn up by the Conference on the Limitation of Armament.

EDWARD N. CALISCH,
President Central Conference of American Rabbis.

THE UNITED SYNAGOGUE OF AMERICA,
New York, March 1, 1922.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: At a meeting of the officers of the executive council of the United Synagogue of America held in New York City February 20, 1922, the following resolution was passed:

"The officers of the executive council of the United Synagogue of America desire, on behalf of the congregations and auxiliary associations which they represent, to express their profound gratification at the favorable results of the recent conference called by the President of the United States to consider the limitation of armaments and other matters for promotion of peace and security in the Pacific Ocean and throughout the world. They rejoice that so great a forward step has been taken looking to the promotion of international good will and righteousness and pray that the Senate will see fit to give its consent to the treaties which have been negotiated at this conference and have been signed by the delegates to the United States."

Fraternally yours,

ELIAS L. SOLOMON, President.

COMMITTEE FOR TREATY RATIFICATION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
New York, March 22, 1922.

To the President and to the Senate of the United States.

DEAR SIRS: The Committee for Treaty Ratification (whose names appear on the third page of this document) has made an extensive, and what it believes to be a reliable canvass, to learn the sentiment of the people regarding the treaties now before the Senate, with the following results:

1. The church forces of the Nation appear to be practically a unit in support of the treaties as they stand, as expressing the moral judgment of the people. They include Protestants, as represented in the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America; the Roman Catholics, as represented in the National Catholic Welfare Council; and both Hebrew bodies.

2. The civic organizations, commercial, economic, social, and political, have expressed themselves with similar unity.

3. The educational institutions have been unhesitating in their support, and, as far as we know, without any dissenting voice.

4. The outstanding and representative bodies of women have rendered vigorous testimony to the same import.

5. The organizations of labor have expressed themselves in hearty accord with the favorable action of the American Federation of Labor.

These various organizations, composed of members of both political parties, and of all the elements of the body politic, express, we believe, the nonpartisan and comprehensive nature of this support.

The reports of opposition are so negligible as to make it clear to us that the people are more significantly united on the proposals of the Conference on Limitation of Armament than they have ever been on any similar issue.

In behalf of the committee.

GEO. W. WICKERSHAM, Chairman.
CHARLES S. MACFARLAND, Secretary.

Mr. LODGE. I also desire to present a petition of 14,000 ministers of religion, representing the leading denominations from all over the country, praying for the ratification without delay, change, or reservation of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I address myself first to a consideration of the terms of the four-power treaty. I propose to determine its meaning by applying to the language of that document the same principles of construction which are applied to contracts between individuals. It will be found after all, Mr. President, if this proposed agreement shall ever be executed by the United States, that the rights and obligations of this country under it will be fixed by the cold terms of the contract and that the poetical and oratorical imaginings conjured up by Senators in its support will have no part in deciding the grim questions of national policy which we must be prepared to meet at once if we approve this treaty.

Owing to a death in my family I have necessarily been absent during a large part of the time that this and the other proposed treaties have been under consideration by the Senate, and since my return the necessity of attending almost daily sessions of the Finance Committee has still further reduced the margin of time I have been able to spare from my other duties to a study of the several treaties which the President has transmitted to the Senate. I have, however, given to them all the consideration possible under the circumstances, and I have endeavored to acquaint myself fully with the views of my colleagues as expressed in the debates, and I state frankly that if this proposed treaty means no more than is claimed for it by its supporters in the Senate, then it is not worth a single hour's consideration. It has been stated repeatedly by Senators supporting this treaty in the course of debate that it does not obligate us to protect or assist in protecting the rights of any other country and that it affords us no protection in case our rights are assailed from any source whatsoever. All that is claimed for this treaty by its sponsors here in the Senate, as I gather from the discussion, is that in case certain controversies arise out of certain matters Great Britain, France, Japan, and the United States will hold some conversations about them, and for that purpose will either meet in conference, or if that seems to be too much trouble, they will merely exchange some notes on the subject. Even this does not represent the uselessness of this treaty as expounded by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who has borne the principal burden of explaining the treaty here, for he has made it clear that in the case of an actual attack made by or upon any party to this proposed agreement the others would not be called upon even to go through the form of writing notes about it. The matter would be settled simply by an immediate appeal to arms in the old-fashioned way. This is what I understand the remarks of that distinguished Senator to amount to as reported on page 3554 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 8, 1922.

But, Mr. President, when we turn from the language of the Senators to the language of the document itself we find an entirely different story, and that a wholly different problem is presented to our Government.

The proposed treaty at least has the merit of brevity. It contains only four short sections and a preamble which purports to express the purpose of the pact. The preamble declares that the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan have determined to enter into a treaty—

> With a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

One might well pause to inquire here, in view of the construction put upon this treaty by its advocates, how it is that the rights of any party are to be maintained by means of a treaty which does not even purport to maintain any rights. But passing for the moment the language of the preamble, I direct attention to the language of the first section, which is as follows:

> The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.
> If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

The high contracting parties are the British Empire, the Japanese Empire, France, and the United States. The proposed treaty is also signed by the representatives of the Dominion of Canada and the representatives of the Commonwealth of Australia, and by the representatives of the Dominion of New Zealand, as well as the representatives of India and the Union of South Africa.

I do not know whether the British Government would contend, if this proposed treaty went into effect, that these dominions should each have a separate vote under the treaty, as they have under the League of Nations. Perhaps this is not very material. At all events, we do know that the Anglo-Japanese policy of aggression and imperialism which made the British Empire and the Japanese Empire close allies in the past, and which makes them close allies to-day, will cause them to stand as a unit in opposition to the policies of any power in the Pacific Ocean which dares to insist that the rights of the weaker people there shall be recognized and protected. Whether they outvote us six to one or two to one is not material. They may take us into their corporation, but it will be as a minority stockholder, in which position we can be more easily controlled than we could be if we had kept out of their combination altogether.

Now, the first thing in the document that the high contracting parties agree to do is to "respect" their several rights in their insular possessions and dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean. Why was it necessary for the parties to this proposed treaty to agree to respect each other's rights in their possessions in the region of the Pacific Ocean? Do not the high contracting parties respect each other's rights, no matter whether those rights arise in the regions of the Pacific Ocean or the Atlantic Ocean or anywhere else? Do you think we asked anyone to respect our rights in the Philippines or in Hawaii? We already have treaties of amity and commerce with these several Governments which insure to each the fullest respect for the rights of the other wherever they arise; and without any treaties at all every honorable nation would respect the clear rights of every other country in its possessions and dominions, wherever situated.

The only possible reason for this language in the proposed treaty is that the rights of some of the parties to it, in their possessions and dominions in the regions of the Pacific Ocean were not clear. They must have been thought to be merely colorable—open to question. This is made clear by the declaration made by all the high contracting parties to accompany the proposed treaty which states that the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean. And so it is, that by this proposed treaty we are to pledge ourselves to respect the title acquired by Great Britain and Japan to the German colonies in the Pacific Ocean. After pledging themselves to respect the title thus acquired, the makers of this document added to it the language:

> Provided, however, That the making of the treaty shall not be deemed to be an assent on the part of the United States of America to the mandates and shall not preclude agreements between the United States of America and the mandatory powers, respectively, in relation to the mandated islands.

That is, the United States will respect the right acquired under the mandates, but it will not assent to the mandates themselves, and reserves the right to make agreements with the mandatory powers respecting the mandated islands. That right, of course, it would have, whether it was reserved in the treaty or not. And since the United States pledges itself in the most unequivocal manner to respect the rights which Japan and Great Britain assert in all their insular possessions and dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean, it is obvious that the belated declaration that the United States does not necessarily assent to the mandates themselves is without force or effect.

I come now to the construction of the most important language of this section, and indeed the most important language of this treaty, which provides, in effect, that if there should develop between the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question—not a question respecting merely their insular possessions or insular dominions but any question involving a controversy arising in the region of the Pacific Ocean and which in any way involved their rights to their insular possessions, and the question is not settled by diplomacy, then all the other high contracting parties shall be invited to meet together in conference, and when so assembled the "whole subject" of controversy shall be "referred" to them. For what purpose? "For consideration and adjustment." Here is a complete scheme for hearing and adjusting all controversies arising between the parties to this agreement involving their said rights, providing only that such controversies shall arise out of some question originating or existing in the region of the Pacific Ocean and which is not settled by diplomacy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? I ask for information? I am not sure that I understand the interpretation which the Senator places upon the antecedent subject. It seems to me that the antecedent of the verb about meeting together and settling relates to the insular possessions and not to any matters that might be in the region of the Pacific. Does the Senator think that it would mean the mainland if a controversy should arise out of the mainland?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; I understand that, by the subsequent action of the makers of this treaty, the mainland was taken out of the scope of the treaty, excepting as it might be possible that in a secondary way outside interests might involve interests in the Pacific. Then I think that they would be confined to the consideration of questions arising in the Pacific Ocean; but I am arguing solely upon the theory that the treaty is confined to questions arising in the Pacific.

Mr. KING. That is, to the insular possessions of the parties in the Pacific?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The terms of the treaty do not quite say that. "Any Pacific question" is the language of the treaty."

Mr. KING. Yes; "any Pacific question." Is that language qualified by any antecedent which would seem to limit the controversy to the insular possessions?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think it is, and I am arguing it on the theory that it is so limited.

When such a controversy arises, the signers of this contract or proposed treaty are to be convened. That is the first step. When so convened, the controversy is to be referred not merely for consideration, not merely to be examined into and reported upon, but it is to be so referred for "adjustment." You will observe that by the language of this section the jurisdiction of this conference to adjust a controversy is only invoked if diplomacy fails. If the controversy can be settled by diplomacy—that is, by negotiation—the representatives of the high contracting parties are not called together. Clearly, therefore, when the representatives of the high contracting parties are convened as a body they are to act not as negotiators, not as diplomats, to smooth out differences, but as arbiters to settle the controversy referred to them. The board or body that is to decide the controversy is provided for. The general nature of the controversy which is to be submitted for decision is sufficiently defined or described. It is specifically provided that the controversy thus to be referred is to be adjusted—that is, determined, settled—by the body to which it is referred. "Adjustment" is defined in Webster as "reducing to just form or order; settlement." Its synonyms are "arrangement"; "regulation"; "settlement"; "disposition."

You will observe that the reference of the controversy here is not made for the purpose of a mere examination into the facts. It is made in order that an "adjustment" or settlement of that controversy shall be made by the signatories to this pact or agreement when they shall have been duly convened on the invitation of the immediate parties to the controversy. The language of this document permits of no other reasonable construction than this. It is the construction which any court would give to the language of the agreement if it were made between private individuals. If it had been the purpose of this agreement to provide that the signers of this document as a body should not have power to adjust or settle the controversy, but only to consider and report concerning it, it would have been easy so to declare. The arbitration treaties in 1914, commonly referred to as the Bryan treaties, all contained, in substance, the following language:

> The high contracting parties agree that all disputes between them of every nature whatsoever which diplomacy shall fail to adjust shall be submitted for investigation and report to an international commission to be constituted in the manner prescribed in the next succeeding article.

But the signers of this pact are given far greater power than that. To them "the whole subject" is referred not only for consideration, but the whole subject is referred to them for adjustment. That is to say, Mr. President, if effect is to be given to the plain language of this document, the United States, if it shall become a party to it, will bind itself to submit for settlement to a body composed of a representative or representatives of the British Empire, the Japanese Empire, France, and the United States all controversies affecting the rights mentioned in this document.

Gentlemen may cavil and explain, but that is what the language of this paper says, and that is what it means. It is true that the proposed treaty speaks of this gathering of these representatives of the high contracting parties as a conference. It does not make any difference what you call it. It is what the persons are authorized to do after they are convened that gives character to the body. And they are authorized and required to adjust the controversies mentioned which are referred to them.

Nor is it left optional with the immediate parties to the controversies whether they will refer their controversy for adjustment to this board or body. The language of the proposed treaty is that they "shall" invite the other high contracting parties to meet together, whereupon the whole subject will be referred to them for consideration and adjustment. Simply because an assemblage of the representatives of various nations is called a conference does not prove that such assemblage may not make decisions which will become binding upon the parties concerned.

Our distinguished Secretary of State recently declined in behalf of this country to send representatives to the Genoa economic conference, in which the Italian Government has invited various nations to participate at Genoa in the near future. Mr. Hughes's letter declining in behalf of this country to participate in that conference was published generally in the press of this country on March 9. And without taking the time to read the letter of Mr. Hughes, I call attention to the two reasons which he assigns for not participating in the conference. First, he declines to enter the conference because it "is not primarily an economic conference," and political questions will, he fears, be discussed; and, secondly, he believes that we should not participate in the conference with the present rulers of Russia, whom he holds "chiefly responsible for Russia's present economic disorder." Now bear in mind that the Genoa conference is to be purely a meeting for discussion.

Nothing has been referred to it or is to be referred to it for settlement. Yet the Secretary of State has decided that we ought not to participate in that conference because of the character of some of the subjects that may come up for discussion, and because of the policies of at least one Government which has been invited to participate in the conference. The same Secretary of State and the same administration which has taken this action with regard to the Genoa conference propose to tie us up with an obligation from which we can not escape for at least 10 years to go into conference with the two most imperialistic nations on the face of the globe, no matter what conduct they are guilty of, no matter what people or lands they may ravish in the meantime, no matter to what extent our own rights and honor may be involved. We can not decline to go into a conference with them if we should ratify this proposed treaty.

But, Mr. President, if the proposed treaty went no further than to require us to enter into a conference with the Governments mentioned over any controversy with them, including our rights and duties in the region of the Pacific Ocean, it would be bad enough. It is not difficult to foresee a situation where as a result of a continuation of those methods of aggression and exploitation which have characterized both the British and Japanese Empires in the past, it would be more difficult for a self-respecting nation to go into a conference with them than it was for the present administration to go into the Genoa conference. But this proposed treaty binds us, in the paragraph I am now considering, to go far beyond a conference. Indeed, what this paragraph provides for is not a conference at all. It is more in the nature of an arbitration. It requires us not only to confer, it requires us to refer, and refer for the purpose of obtaining an adjustment or settlement of all of those controversies between the parties mentioned affecting our said rights. Language could not well be broader in including the questions which are to be referred, and it could not well be more definite in prescribing their method of adjustment. The declaration which accompanies this proposed treaty shows that whoever prepared it knew that it provided in this paragraph for something more than a mere conference. That declaration provides, and I think that is a pretty good test—

> That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers (which is the paragraph I am now considering) shall not be taken to embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective parties.

They exclude all such questions from the scope of jurisdiction which they confer upon this body. If it is only a meeting to confer and hold conversations, why was it necessary to take away from it all consideration with respect to domestic questions? The makers of this pact well understood that they were turning over to the jurisdiction of this so-called conference power to determine questions, and therefore they did not dare to confer upon them jurisdiction over such questions as Japanese immigration on the Pacific coast. If they are only to meet and hold conversations, why are they not to hold conversations about that as well as other questions?

I suppose that under this declaration or reservation if a controversy arose between Japan and the United States over the admission of Japanese to this country that it would be said that this was a question within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States. But why withhold that subject from the conference if nothing more than discussion was intended? It was clearly contemplated that the questions referred under the provisions of this paragraph are to be dealt with otherwise than by mere discussion. They are to be adjusted. They are to be settled. Hence purely domestic questions were excluded from consideration and adjustment.

It may be true, of course, that we can not be forced to acquiesce in the adjustment which is made of the questions referred. That is true of any agreement we might enter into. But, sir, once we become a party to this treaty we can not, without violating it, refuse, in case of a controversy, to invite the parties to meet together for the purpose of adjusting the controversy, and we can not refuse to abide by that adjustment when made, unless we are willing to repudiate the obligation we deliberately assume when we become a party to the treaty. It has been asserted in the debate by some of the proponents of this treaty that any settlement of a controversy submitted to the representatives of the parties signing this proposed treaty would have to be made unanimously at their hands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Take, for instance, the Hawaiian Islands, which are now inhabited by a mixed population of races, about one-half Japanese. Conceive that a number of years from now—for instance, when the Japanese are still more numerous than they are now, as they are likely to be—a race controversy arose and a hundred Japanese were killed, just as a number of Japanese were killed by the Russians in the island of Sakhalin. Japan met that situation by moving her army in and taking possession of Sakhalin Island. Would there not be some such controversy there between the United States and Japan, so that Japan might demand that it be settled by a conference of the four powers?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it could be removed from consideration by a determination that it was a domestic issue, then Japan might not be able to insist that it should be considered by this body which is created to adjust differences, but unless it be held that this conflict with respect to the rights of Japanese in the Hawaiian Islands is a domestic question, clearly it would come within the scope of the authority conferred upon the body created by this treaty to determine questions of controversy which arise between the high contracting parties.

Mr. SIMMONS. Who determines whether the questions raised are domestic or not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is not made clear by anything in this pact. That would have raised a great many questions here, which would have prolonged the discussion considerably, I think; but it seemed to be a part of the plan with regard to the consideration in the Senate of this crucial and determining treaty, which reaches out to control so largely the whole field, that it must be shortened and simplified as much as possible to avoid controversy.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did we not have the contention, when we were discussing the Versailles treaty, raised chiefly by Senators on the other side of the Chamber, that it was necessary to definitely prescribe, in the reservations, who was to determine whether any question was domestic or not; and was not the argument then made that unless that were done the right to determine what was a domestic question to America would be left to the league instead of to America?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I quite agree. My recollection of the debate as it progressed on the League of Nations is that all of these issues, it was argued, could be settled by reservation or by specific amendment, so that there could be no question or controversy about it. But here the matter is left quite open.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the reservations which were adopted on the Versailles treaty went still further. They reserved specifically to the United States the right to determine whether a question was domestic or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I believe that is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that was insisted upon vigorously and persistently on the ground that unless that was done we would commit to the council the right to decide whether the particular question was a domestic question or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That comes back to me now with very great clearness. I recall that very distinctly. But here the whole question is left open for controversy.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the point I was making.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the point is well taken.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. May I say, apropos of the question propounded by the Senator from Nebraska, that I do not think our Government or any other civilized nation would admit that the assassination of its nationals by some other Government or State was a purely local or domestic question which that State could determine as it pleased. That becomes an international question. If Japanese citizens were killed in Hawaii or American citizens were killed in the Pescadores it would be, notwithstanding the words "insular possessions," an international controversy, in my opinion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is quite true.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have in my hand the resolution of ratification of the Versailles treaty, and I wish to call attention to reservation numbered 4. I read only a portion of it, as follows:

> The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I ask the Senator from Nevada from what he is reading?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am reading from the resolution of ratification of the Versailles treaty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As proposed by whom?

Mr. PITTMAN. These are the reservations adopted by the majority of the United States Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And proposed by whom?

Mr. PITTMAN. They were proposed, most of them, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the majority leader of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me, the Senator from Nevada read from the treaty a provision which President Wilson had put in that treaty upon his return to Europe, after he had brought the original draft here and conferred with various and sundry Members of this body. My recollection is that upon his return to Europe he incorporated in the treaty a provision similar to the one the Senator is now discussing, namely, that the treaty should not apply or be construed to apply to purely domestic questions, such as immigration, which I think was almost the language.

Now, with that very language or substantially the same language in the Versailles treaty as in this treaty, when that treaty came before the Senate the majority in this body insisted that the rights of the United States could only be safeguarded by the specific terms of the resolution just read by the Senator from Nevada in the reservation.

The two cases seem to me to be on all fours, and it is strange, with that history fresh in the minds of at least two of the delegates, that they should not have insisted upon incorporating in the treaty some such provision as they had insisted upon incorporating in the resolution of ratification of the Versailles treaty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am bound to say that I quite agree with the view expressed by the Senator from North Carolina. There is no provision in the proposed treaty which settles the question and determines what is and what is not a domestic issue.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Right on that issue, Japan has frequently contended and Japan now insists that she has a right to participate in the coastwise trade of the Philippine Islands and in the trade from the Philippine Islands to the United States. I would like to inquire if the Senator from Wisconsin could state offhand whether that would be a domestic question or an international question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should be inclined to say that that is really a domestic question, but I can see that it might well be open to controversy.

Mr. GLASS. It already is being controverted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I so understand.

Mr. PITTMAN. Under article 15 of the Versailles treaty I find this provision:

> If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

That was the provision as brought back in the treaty. It was not considered sufficient to protect the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Even that provision had to be supplemented by reservations——

Mr. PITTMAN. By reservation No. 4, which I have just read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Reservations such as were presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and adopted by a majority of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That does not seem to have occurred to the representatives of the Senate who served as delegates to the conference which framed this treaty.

Mr. SIMMONS. One of the delegates who framed this treaty was in charge of the Versailles treaty when it was under consideration in this body.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. And he is accredited at least with having written these reservations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is the record.

Mr. President, I want to bring the attention of Senators back to the line of my discussion, so I will repeat briefly.

It is true, of course, that we can be forced to acquiesce in the adjustment which is made of the questions referred under this treaty. That is true of any agreement we might enter into. But, sir, once we become a party to the treaty we can not, without violating it, refuse in case of a controversy to invite the parties to meet together for the purpose of adjusting the controversy, and we can not refuse to abide by that adjustment when made unless we are willing to repudiate the obligation we deliberately assume when we become a party to the treaty.

It has been asserted in the debate by some of the proponents of the treaty that any settlement of a controversy submitted to the representatives of the parties signing this proposed treaty would have to be made unanimously at their hands.

There is no such provision in the proposed treaty, and common sense would dictate the opposite conclusion. That contention would be good in the case of a technical common-law reference. But in such case the immediate parties to the controversy would not sit. When the representatives of the nations involved are convened in the manner provided in this article for the purpose of considering and adjusting controversies referred to them they will necessarily make their own rules of procedure in the absence of specific rules laid down in the document which calls them into existence as a board or body. They must determine their own methods of procedure, which will include determining the vote by which their decisions will be reached and the manner in which their conclusions shall be stated. A minority can, of course, dissent. But the mandate which calls these representatives together requires them to reach a conclusion, to make an adjustment. And there is nothing express or implied in the document requiring that conclusion to be unanimous. But suppose we took the position that we would not be bound by a decision to which we did not agree, made by this conference or committee or body which we had convened for the very purpose of passing upon the question we had referred to it. What position would that put us in before the other parties to the treaty and before the world? If the decision of the majority were against us, as it would be certain to be in the large number of cases where the interests and purposes of the British Empire and the Japanese Empire were the same, we would be placed in the position of not abiding by the decision we had invoked, and we would be properly charged with having submitted our controversy to a tribunal of our own selection and then repudiating its decision because it was not rendered in our favor. No, Mr. President, if we ratify this treaty, if we become parties to this contract we submit to the tribunal for which it provides the questions for settlement or adjustment specified in this paragraph, and we must abide by the decision rendered. If we are not willing to abide by the results of the conference we must keep out of it altogether.

There is one further objection to this section, which I shall briefly notice.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, before he leaves that line of his argument, if it had not been clearly understood and intended that a majority vote should determine the question and should be a settlement of the dispute, does not the Senator think that the treaty makers naturally would have provided some method of settlement where there was no settlement because of the dissent of one member?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Absolutely so, Mr. President; and I think, therefore, that it is implied, and the implied provisions of a contract are just as binding as the expressed provisions. I think it clearly implied here that when the decision is reached all parties to it must be bound, in so far as they can be bound in any such instrument as a treaty, and that is up to the limits of their own honor.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Wisconsin says it is "clearly implied." Does not the Senator think it is necessarily implied?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do think it is necessarily implied, if that makes it any stronger than the other statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Because here is a provision for a settlement—an agreement that there has to be a settlement. If it depended upon a unanimous vote——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There might never be a settlement.

Mr. SIMMONS. There might never be a settlement. If it was the intention that it should be determined by unanimous vote, I take it that the treaty makers certainly would have provided what was to be done in case no settlement should be reached by a unanimous vote.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Clearly they must have done so. In contemplation of working out a consummation of the very purposes of this treaty they must have worked out a provision that would have covered that question.

Mr. SIMMONS. There can always be a settlement when the majority is to determine.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yesterday in his carefully written and carefully read address the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], whose position was indorsed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], took the position that nothing could be done under this proposed treaty except by unanimous consent. Does the Senator from Wisconsin think that that statement is warranted?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I have already indicated that it is an impossible conclusion to be drawn from the very terms of the treaty itself and from all that is sought to be claimed for it by its sponsors here in the debate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it will be remembered that the framers of the Versailles treaty, and particularly of the covenant of the League of Nations, felt that in international law it was essential to state in the instrument itself that no act could be performed without the consent of every member of the council of the League of Nations. Otherwise it was assumed that the ordinary parliamentary rule of a majority controlling would govern.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly.

Mr. President, there is one further objection to this section which I shall briefly notice. That is that it clearly excludes all other countries than the high contracting parties from the meeting called to adjust the controversies referred to them, no matter how great the interest of such other country may be in the controversy. I have already pointed out that the controversies referred to the representatives of the parties to this pact include all controversies between the parties arising out of any Pacific question in which their rights are involved touching any of their Pacific possessions. Suppose, for example, Japan not only refuses to withdraw her troops from Russian territory but increases her forces there with the obvious design of still further encroaching upon Russia's sovereignty. Naturally, we would object, because our own interest in the Pacific might be seriously menaced by this further aggression of Japan. A controversy between us and Japan would therefore arise, which under the terms of this proposed treaty we would have to refer for adjustment as the terms of this section provide. Or suppose, again, that the Japanese should refuse to surrender the northern portion of the island of Sakhalin, which admittedly belongs to Russia and is now forcibly occupied by Japan, and we, believing that our rights in the Pacific are menaced, as they doubtless would be by such action on the part of Japan, make a protest, and again a controversy arises which must be submitted to the representatives of the four powers signing this document. Clearly in this controversy Russia is a necessary party. She is at least one of the parties in interest, and perhaps the principal party in interest. By the very terms of this document she is excluded from the meeting of the representatives of the four powers called to adjust the controversy. The language of the document is that they—meaning the immediate parties to the controversy—"shall invite the other high contracting parties." They are not authorized or permitted to invite any other power. That is made clear by the next portion of the sentence, which declares that the parties so invited shall meet in a "joint conference"; that is, a conference made up solely of the representatives of the parties so invited to attend. And it is to this conference so constituted that "the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment."

I remember, Mr. President, when this particular question was under discussion, one day during the debate in the Senate two or three Senators—I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] among others—raised the question that any of the outside powers could be invited to attend such a conference as is provided for by the treaty. I think, however, the very terms of the treaty exclude them, as I shall presently show.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If it would not divert the Senator from the line of thought he is pursuing, I should like to present this suggestion to him: At the very time the conference convened in Washington the Japanese were trying to extirpate the schools, churches, and the converts whom the Christian missionaries from this country had financed and consecrated themselves to for the last 50 years; and yet not one word of expostulation was addressed to the Japanese representatives here in Washington. Can the Senator from Wisconsin explain that strange silence against the outrages which Japan was then committing upon the Christian churches of this country?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I would not undertake an explanation of that situation without unlimited time in which to go into the subject. I think that is one of the most fruitful sources of discussion which could possibly have been suggested. I have been astounded to find that some of the supporters of this four-power pact, who have heretofore been greatly exercised over and interested in the aggressions which the Japanese Government is making upon the people who have come within her sphere of influence, have apparently lost their interest in those helpless people.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. May I trespass further upon the time of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It has come to me from a source which I can not reveal, but upon which I rely, that the chaplain who opened the Limitation of Armament Conference with prayer, just as our Chaplain opens our sessions here with prayer, had in his prepared invocation alluded to the merits of the blood of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, but he was asked to strike that allusion out, and he struck it out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In other words, he denied his Christ?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. He did.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. And he did it in deference to the nation which is now, in the persons of the Christian converts in Korea, again crucifying Him.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just an instant?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator has been discussing the very remarkable reservations which the American delegates attached to this treaty before the ink upon the treaty was dry, and he has been discussing something of the character of the domestic questions and the like which may be involved. I want to read, without comment, a very brief telegram which was published by the San Francisco Call on December 23 last, as follows:

JAP ENVOY ON EVE OF SAILING WIRES ADIEUS TO HARDING.

Katoro Mochizuki, member of the Japanese Parliament, prior to his sailing to-day for Japan, sent the following message to President Harding:

"I am leaving your country to-day with great joy and happiness. Let me once more, my dear President, tender my heartfelt respect to you. Between your country and Japan there are many things still to adjust under your leadership—such as, for instance, the fortification of Hawaii and our immigration question in California. I trust that your lofty and noble idea of statesmanship will do justice toward our country and people in California and Hawaii. Praying you to keep your good health for the sake of the peace of the world at large, au revoir.

"KATORO MOCHIZUKI."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, if I were desirous of entering the field of prophecy, I should hazard the forecast that Mr. Mochizuki is not likely to be disappointed.

Mr. President, I feel that I must hasten along. I wish to cover a bit more of the ground which I consider essential to the proper discussion of this important document. I was setting forth a further objection, and I wish now to resume the thread of my discussion.

Introduce another party into the meeting of the four powers and it is not the joint meeting specified. And it is only to the joint meeting of the representatives of the four powers mentioned that the controversy is referred for settlement. Or take another illustration. It is well known that for years the Chinese Government has conducted a heroic fight against the use of opium and the opium traffic among her people and that the British Government has in years past, by the most brutal methods, forced opium upon the people of China. While latterly, I understand, the British policy has changed in this respect, it is still true, authorities upon that subject state, that the principal difficulty the Chinese Government has in combating the evil arises from the fact that opium may be freely bought and traded in in the territory covered by the foreign concessions, and particularly by British concessions. Under the present arrangement the Chinese Government is powerless to stop the traffic in that large portion of her territory practically under British control. Our own interests in the Pacific are, of course, affected by anything that involves the debauching and the demoralization of the Chinese people. And suppose that we make a protest over this or any other matter involving British aggressions in China. A controversy arises which under this proposed treaty must be referred for adjustment in the manner I have described. China can not be a party to it. Here, Mr. President, is the great vice, or at least one of the great vices, of this compact. When we become a party to it we must either make up our minds to go along with the Japanese Empire and the British Empire and acquiesce in whatever they may choose to do in the regions of the Pacific Ocean or, if we protest against their conduct because our own vital interests are involved, we must submit the issue so made for adjustment to a body a majority of which we know in advance is packed against us.

SECTION 2.

My interpretation of section 1 of the proposed treaty is made more conclusive, if that is possible, by consideration of the language of section 2. That section is as follows:

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

Note well the language: "If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power," what happens? Not a meeting together in some designated place by the representatives of the parties to the treaty to consider the case and render a decision as is provided for under section 1, but the parties will communicate with each other. If nothing but communications were contemplated under section 1, why the great difference in language and the entire difference in the scheme of the two sections? Section 1 contemplates that trouble may arise between the parties and it provides a body by which the causes of the trouble will be investigated and which shall then adjust or settle the difficulty. Section 2 contemplates that trouble may arise between a member or members of the pact and some outside power or powers, and it provides an entirely different method of dealing with that situation.

Section 2 contemplates: (1) Aggressive action by some outside power against one of the four signers of the pact; (2) immediate communication between the parties to the pact in order to arrive at an understanding; (3) the understanding arrived at is to embody the most "efficient measures" to meet the aggressive action of the outside power. That is as far as the specific language of the section goes.

Of course, any Senator may argue if he chooses that the efficient measures to meet the aggressive action of a hostile power consist in sending out a delegation with olive branches to talk over with the enemy the matter of its wicked conduct. That seems to be about all that the proponents of this proposed treaty are willing to admit that we obligate ourselves to do under this section. I have marveled, sir, at the arguments made by distinguished Senators in this body during the last few days in an effort to show that this section imposes no obligation upon us to meet the aggressive action of an enemy power with anything more deadly than talk. We all know that what is implied in a constitution or in a statute or in a treaty is just as much a part of the document as what is expressed. Our Government depends to-day for its life and vitality and operation as much upon the implied powers of the Constitution as upon the express ones.

Not only that, sir, but it is the implied rights and duties that attach to all contracts and to all relations in life even more than those which are expressed in words that make it possible for men to live together in a civilized society. Now, sir, the whole scheme of this document is that the high contracting parties are entering into a partnership, or at the very least a joint adventure. By this document they agree to combine together, separate and distinct from all other powers of the earth, for certain purposes, and they declare that they have certain interests in common which it is necessary or at least desirable to protect by means of this combination. By this act alone they make themselves joint adventurers at the very least, and there at once attach to them all the obligations of loyalty and devotion to their joint interests as opposed to all other interests which the law attaches to the relation of partners or joint adventurers.

Lloyd-George, speaking in the House of Commons August 18, 1921, only six months ago, anticipating the results of the Washington conference, said:

If the alliance with Japan could merge into a greater understanding with Japan and the United States on all problems of the Pacific, that would be a great event which would be a guaranty for the peace of the world.

Every war-breeding alliance between nations since the dawn of history has been declared to be in the interests of the peace of the world.

Continuing, Lloyd-George said:

I am still hopeful that such an understanding as would make us feel that this partnership would be established will ensue as a result of the coming conference at Washington. (See N. Y. Times, Aug. 19, 1921.)

He had a pretty good understanding, Mr. President, as to what would be accomplished at this conference.

The universal acclaim with which this four-power pact has been greeted by the leading statesmen of the British Empire, including Mr. Lloyd-George, leaves no doubt that in their estimation the hope he expressed was realized in the document now before us. He calls it a partnership. I have used the somewhat looser term of joint adventurers. In either case the same duty attaches to the relationship, which requires the parties to stand together, to work together, and to protect and advance the rights of all in the subject matter of the adventure or partnership against the act or acts of any other power or powers of the world.

Now, sir, recognizing this as the plain obligation which the parties assume from the relationship, it is worse than idle to attempt to argue that this section of the treaty does not obligate us to use force whenever force is the "most efficient measure" with which to repel the aggression of some outside power upon the rights of one of our copartners or coadventurers under this proposed treaty. I shall not consume the time of the Senate in discussing a proposition so obvious.

SECTION 3.

Section 3 of this proposed treaty is as follows:

This treaty shall remain in force for 10 years from the time it shall take effect, and after the expiration of said period it shall continue to be in force subject to the right of any of the high contracting parties to terminate it upon 12 months' notice.

The only point that I wish to make upon this section is that if we ratify this treaty we become bound absolutely to continue under it for the period of 11 years. You will note the entire absence from this proposed treaty of a provision common to many treaties that either party may terminate it upon giving a certain specified notice. Once we ratify this proposed treaty there is no escape for us for 11 years at least. No matter what the conduct of our associates may be during that time, we can not withdraw from the enterprise upon which we enter with them when we become parties to this document. For 11 years at least we are married to them. We must meet with them in conference. We must submit to them for adjustment questions vitally affecting our rights and our national honor, and no matter how divergent or irreconcilable our views and policies may be, for 11 years we are bound to continue in this unnatural relationship.

If any Senator can tell us or tell the people of this country what there is in the history of the British Empire or the Japanese Empire, or in their present conduct or future prospects, which makes him desire to unite the destinies of this Nation with them for 11 long years, I will be glad to listen to his reasons. But, for my part, Mr. President, I know that the road to peace and prosperity for us and our highest service to the world lies in keeping free from this particular combination. We can only serve the world and our own people while we are free to pursue our own ideals and our own ambitions in an effort to uphold freedom and democracy and the rights of the common man.

These, sir, are not the ideals of either of these empires with which we are asked to associate ourselves. Such an unnatural association, Mr. President, must inevitably lead us into conflict with our associates, or we must surrender those principles of liberty and equality which are fundamentally obnoxious to the Empire of Japan and to establish which we fought two bloody wars with the British Empire.

SECTION 4.

The fourth and last section of this treaty provides:

This treaty shall be ratified as soon as possible in accordance with the constitutional methods of the high contracting parties, and shall take effect on the deposit of the ratifications, which shall take place at Washington, and thereupon the agreement between Great Britain and Japan which was concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate.

I have now read all the provisions of this proposed treaty excepting its formal parts. We are told by the proponents of it that the chief and, indeed, practically the only value of this treaty to us lies in the last three lines which I have just read. What are they? I repeat them:

Thereupon the agreement between Great Britain and Japan which was concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate.

Those lines provide that upon the ratification of the pending treaty the treaty concluded between Great Britain and Japan on July 13, 1911, shall terminate. That treaty is commonly referred to as the Anglo-Japanese alliance. That alliance was originally formed in January, 1902. It was modified and renewed in August, 1905, and was again renewed on July 13, 1911, for 10 years more, with the right on the part of either party to terminate it upon one year's notice after the 10 years had expired.

The Senator from Massachusetts, who with the Senator from Alabama has had the principal charge of the treaty in the Senate, in expounding its terms for the benefit of the Senate said, as reported in the RECORD of March 8, 1922:

The chief and most important point in the treaty is the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance; that was the main object of the treaty.

Again, on page 3551 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Senator, speaking of the work of the American delegation in the preparation of the treaty, said:

We were clearly of the opinion that there lay before us three great objectives, three dominant purposes to be attained. One was the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. The next was an agreement between the five principal allied and associated powers sitting at the table for reduction of naval armament. The third was to accomplish all that was possible to aid China.

The matter of the so-called aid to China and the reductions of naval armament is taken care of in separately proposed treaties, which will be discussed somewhat at length later, so that the only point made, so far as the four-power pact now before the Senate is concerned, was that it terminated the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

Again, on page 3552 of the RECORD, the Senator from Massachusetts says:

The treaty now before us terminates the Anglo-Japanese alliance. * * * It is not necessary for me to go into detail as to the reasons for my opinion as to the great importance of this single achievement. It is sufficient to say that in my judgment the Anglo-Japanese alliance was the most dangerous element in our relations with the Far East and with the Pacific. * * * That menace to peace is removed by the four-power pact treaty. * * * While that alliance was in existence reduction of naval armament was difficult, if not impractical.

I might read many other quotations from the speeches of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama and other proponents of this proposed treaty to show that substantially the only merit claimed for the four-power pact now before the Senate is that if adopted it will terminate the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

The provision of the Anglo-Japanese treaty of July 13, 1911, and the only one which can be construed as in any way menacing the United States, is that which is contained in article 2. Article 2 of the Anglo-Japanese treaty of July 13, 1911, is as follows:

If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action wherever arising on the part of any power or powers, either high contracting party shall be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests mentioned in the preamble of this treaty—

That is, in the Far East, and that is the only thing mentioned in the preamble of the treaty—the high contracting parties will at once come to the assistance of its ally, and will conduct the war in common and make peace in mutual agreement with it.

Now, Mr. President, when we put aside the ominous, mysterious, and threatening innuendoes of the gentlemen who claim that the Anglo-Japanese alliance is such a menace to the United States and look at the language of that alliance itself, we find that it has nothing to do with the United States unless the United States should make an unprovoked attack upon either the Japanese or British Empire in the Far East or take unprovoked aggressive action against one or both of them.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Every one of the Senators who now profess such relief that the Anglo-Japanese alliance has been abrogated was opposed to the Borah resolution, which brought about this conference out of which this treaty grew.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. So all their alarm has arisen over the Anglo-Japanese alliance, since over their objection and that of the President the resolution was adopted and the conference was called.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is absolutely true. In other words, the Anglo-Japanese alliance has been brought forward by those who want to tie us up with imperialistic governments for the prosecution of great enterprises among the helpless peoples of the world, and they have taken this Anglo-Japanese alliance and, by subterfuge, have made it appear as a menace to the people of this country and their Government. How many people in the United States have been losing sleep in the last 20 years because of the existence of this treaty? During the 20 years this treaty has been in existence Great Britain was powerful on land and sea; from London, the financial center of the world, she dictated to the business interests of the world, and yet in all those years we heard nothing of the menace of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Did we hear anything of its menace in 1902, 1906, 1910, or 1914? No; it was only when it was desirable to resurrect it and to project it into this discussion in order that we might be brought into this combination, so desirable to the big interests of this country for the exploitation of all the natural resources of the world.

The plain English of it simply is that if we make an unprovoked attack upon Great Britain, Japan will come to her aid; or if we make an unprovoked attack upon Japan, Great Britain will come to her aid. Now, sir, so long as Japan and Great Britain honestly carry out the terms of that treaty and take no joint action against the United States until the United States makes unprovoked attack upon one or the other of them in the Far East—and that is the language of the treaty—there is not the least possibility of trouble for us in the Anglo-Japanese alliance. If, on the other hand, the Japanese Empire or British Empire does not intend to carry out the terms of this treaty honestly, but either or both are intending to use the language of this alliance as an excuse for making an unprovoked attack upon us, then they are not to be trusted to enter into this four-power pact, or any other agreement, with us. If they will carry out honestly the Anglo-Japanese alliance, we are not in the least danger. If they will not carry out that treaty honestly, there is no reason to suppose that they would honestly comply with the treaty we are now asked to make with them.

But more than this, Mr. President. If this Anglo-Japanese alliance is any menace to the United States, that menace will not be removed by our ratification of this four-power treaty. On the contrary, it will be aggravated by it. After noting the apprehension with which our distinguished representatives who negotiated this treaty viewed the Anglo-Japanese alliance, I turned once more to the four-power pact they offer us as our sole means of salvation from the peril of this threatening alliance, and I found to my astonishment not a line or a word in it to prevent the renewal of the alliance between the Japanese Empire and the British Empire whenever they choose to renew it.

There is a provision in this treaty which, if ratified by all the high contracting powers, will terminate that Anglo-Japanese alliance, but there is no provision in this pending treaty which pledges Great Britain and Japan not to form another alliance. Follow me just for a moment.

At any moment after we have ratified this treaty the British Empire and the Japanese Empire can renew this alliance. They can renew it in exactly the same terms in which it is written to-day, and there is nothing in the treaty now offered us which forbids their doing this. Ah, but it will be said that two such honorable sovereigns as His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas and Emperor of India would not do so dishonorable a thing. Wouldn't they! I find that these worthy monarchs, when they entered into the Anglo-Japanese alliance, thought it wise and prudent to contract against doing exactly that sort of thing. They did not dare to trust each other as we are now asked to trust both of them.

Article 3 of the Anglo-Japanese alliance provides:

> The high contracting parties agree that neither of them will, without consulting the other, enter into separate arrangements with another power to the prejudice of the objects described in the preamble of this agreement.

These two Governments had been allies for a good many years prior to the time they negotiated this alliance of 1911. They had been allies since 1902. They knew each other. They evidently believed that it was a wise precaution on the part of each to bind the other not to enter into a separate arrangement with some other power to the prejudice of the agreement they were then making.

If it was a wise and proper precaution for these powers to take thus to protect themselves from each other, certainly it is the greatest folly on our part not to take at least equal precaution to protect ourselves from both of them.

I wonder if our delegates were asleep on this proposition. They say they were reaching out eagerly to secure the abrogation of this Anglo-Japanese pact, and in it they found recorded against each of the other parties to it the suspicion that they might on the side enter into secret compacts prejudicial to the terms of that compact, unless they were bound not to do it. Yet it seems to have occurred to none of the delegates who were intrusted with the honor and the interests of the United States to so protect us against Great Britain and Japan from entering into another Anglo-Japanese treaty just as soon as they have secured our ratification of this proposed treaty. * * *

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How could the Anglo-Japanese alliance be a menace to this country except by some unprovoked aggression on the part of Japan and Great Britain toward our country or by some international conduct on our part that would cause war?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; and let me limit the suggestion of the Senator a little further. By the very terms of the treaty, aggression upon our part had to be in the Far East. We might have attacked Great Britain and we might have attacked Japan elsewhere than in the Far East, and then we would not have incurred the hostility of the combined nations under the terms of that treaty to repel the attack. The only thing that treaty provides against, so far as outside powers are concerned, is an aggressive attack against their interests by an outside power in the Far East, and then they are bound to combine to repel that attack. The United States had no disposition to attack, as, of course, we know we had not. We know that if we obey the admonition of the founders of this Government, we will not have trouble in the Far East. We know if we pursue the policy we have pursued for almost a century and a half no trouble will be had with our foreign neighbors. The only reason, the only menace, that the Anglo-Japanese alliance could possibly be to us was that we might offend the two powers combined and bring about a combined attack of those two Governments, provided we invaded what they considered their rights in the Far East.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Can the Senator imagine a greater reflection upon our self-respect than to say that we have joined in an alliance with these nations because they were a menace to us in that they were likely to do something injurious to our peace when our back was turned?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I can not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What would the Senator think of a man who would join in an agreement to cooperate and unite with two men who were attempting to rob and assault him simply to prevent their unlawful acts being taken against him?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I go a little further than that, and I say that the combined efforts and the propaganda used to manufacture the Anglo-Japanese treaty into a present peril was a subterfuge on the part of all who engaged in it. It is a betrayal of the interests of this Government to twist the Anglo-Japanese treaty into a menace, for the purpose of bringing us into this combination and reversing the policy under which we have grown to be a great and independent Nation before all the world and an example that is inspiring to all people who love liberty and equality.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator give any reason why, when the call was made pursuant to resolution of the Senate for this conference, the four-power pact was not indicated or cited as one of the paramount purposes of the conference? Can the Senator give any reason why that was not mentioned in the call, mentioned in the agenda, mentioned in the address of the President to the conference, and in the address of Secretary Hughes? Can the Senator account for the reason now that when the conference was called to limit armament, which was the great and paramount purpose of it, that seems to have been subordinated now and this is mentioned as the transcendent achievement and the great and paramount work of the conference?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can only say that I believe that it was the theme that was uppermost in the minds of those who brought about the conference—the President and his administration advisers.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to say to the Senator from Utah that I had printed in the RECORD this morning a statement by the editor of one of the leading Canadian papers, in which statement he makes the claim that Canada's opposition to the Anglo-Japanese alliance and the pressure which Canada brought upon Great Britain to get rid of it was the reason for this subject being on the agenda of the conference.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I venture to call attention to what the President said in his invitation to the powers to this conference. I would like the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to page 18 of the document—Document No. 126. There the Senator from Utah and other Senators may read as follows, if the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me taking this much of his time:

> It is not the purpose of this Government to attempt to define the scope of the discussion in relation to the Pacific and Far East, but rather to leave this to be the subject of suggestions to be exchanged before the meeting of the conference, in the expectation that the spirit of friendship and a cordial appreciation of the importance of the elimination of sources of controversy will govern the final decision.

In other words, the invitation was broad enough and comprehensive enough to warrant our representatives in taking up and considering and reaching the agreement indicated by this so-called four-power treaty, as later on I shall hope to make very clear to any senatorial mind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Surely we have had enough of secret treaties in recent years. We certainly ought to take the precaution to protect ourselves against them that those nations took to protect themselves from the danger that each would make a counter alliance against the other.

No, Mr. President; let no man be deceived by the talk of danger to the United States in the Anglo-Japanese alliance. That alliance has existed for more than 20 years, and until the agitation started a few months ago to fasten this agreement upon our people no one in this country ever suggested, so far as I have heard, that there was any danger to us in that alliance. Attention in this country was first called to it seriously by the British talk of terminating it. The fact is, as shown by the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that the sentiment in the British Empire for scrapping the arrangement was very strong, especially in the Dominion of Canada, even before the Limitation of Armament Conference was called. New Zealand and Australia preferred to have the alliance continued, but favored no alliance not satisfactory to the United States. It had become simply a piece of political junk as far as Great Britain was concerned which they wanted for many reasons to get rid of anyway, and her statesmen hit upon the clever idea of polishing it up and selling it to our delegates at the conference as something of great value.

Why, Mr. President, there has not been a time in a hundred years when Great Britain was so incapable of waging war as at the present time. Until she can at least pay the interest on the debt she incurred in her last war she is not likely to undertake another one, and particularly with the United States. At no time during the 20 years and more that the Anglo-Japanese alliance has existed have we ever feared it or had the least reason to fear it, and to attempt at this particular time to distort it into a menace to the United States is grotesquely absurd and smacks of intellectual dishonesty. Imagine Australia and New Zealand, who hate the Japanese as they do the plague, making war upon us in behalf of Japan. Picture Canada, our next door neighbor and lifelong friend, bound to us by the ties of race, language, and religion, and a century of friendship and close association, marching an army against us at the command of the yellow race. No one knows better than the British statesmen that they could not raise and send against us a single regiment of Englishmen merely to fight the battles of the Japanese. Besides all this, Britain's empty treasury and her domestic troubles everywhere make a formidable war unthinkable for her for years to come. With millions of her subjects in open revolt and millions more covertly plotting her downfall, it would be sheer madness for her to enter upon a war against the United States, and particularly as an ally of Japan. Nor is Japan likely to tempt fate by making war against us with the Russian Bear aroused and eager to strike her at the first opportunity in retaliation for the insults and wrongs heaped upon Russia by the Japanese Empire.

I was astounded, Mr. President, at the easy attitude of one of the representatives of the Senate at the conference that there was not any likelihood of trouble for 10 or 11 years from Russia because she could not very well be aggressive.

Mr. President, Russia had an army of 7,000,000 well-trained soldiers that participated in the great World War. She hurled her legions against the German line and drove it back until internal discord broke her military power. Those trained men by the million are in Russia to-day. The natural resources of that country are probably the richest anywhere in the world outside of our own, and our own are being now pushed along many lines toward rapid depletion. Let her effect a combination with some outside power—and nobody for a moment supposes that the power of the German nation is broken—and what would be the result? I think it is beginning to dawn upon the minds of those who made the Versailles treaty that they themselves have got to rescue Europe from the terms of that treaty; that they have got to reinstate the German people in a position where they can be industrially productive again if they hope to save Europe from utter financial destruction.

We are arraying ourselves in this combination against China, India, Russia, Germany, and all the central powers. There will be a day of settlement. Time works out many transformations.

Mr. President, there is some other reason for the attempt to force this treaty upon us. And that reason is found in the desire of the great interests which control the Governments of both those countries to secure the cooperation and protection of the United States in their further schemes of exploitation and imperialism. We know the shameful history Japan has made in recent years in Korea, China, and Siberia. We know what Great Britain has done and is doing in India, China, Egypt, and elsewhere. Both those countries have shocked and horrified the civilized world with their disregard of treaty rights and the rights of neutral nations and weaker peoples. What they have been doing in the countries mentioned in recent years they wish to continue to do. But they wish to continue to do it with the sanction and, if possible, the cooperation and protection of the United States.

Great Britain, so eager for spoils, increased her holdings at the Paris conference until she so extended her dominions that she is breaking under the strain at many points.

In this connection I will read briefly from an article in the January, 1922, number of the National Review, published at London, entitled "The new Pacific pact," by T. Okamoto, London correspondent of the Tokyo and Osaka Asahi:

> The inclusion of America and France in the new pact is considered in Japan to be merely an extension of the Anglo-Japanese alliance and causes no uneasiness but the greatest satisfaction. Japan's concern is limited to the question of whether concerted action of four powers will be more effective than the benefits obtained by an alliance between the two powers. One criticism of the inclusion of more powers in a Pacific pact was that "there was too much water in the whisky." This might possibly be the case if there were any attempt on the part of one of the powers to impose upon the others a line of policy or to insist on its particular interests without regard to the benefits of the other parties, including China.
> It is essential that the powers should keep themselves informed of the changing situation in China and take precautions to adjust their policies according to the variations which are taking place, and if the original aims of the new pact are to be fulfilled success must depend upon the cordial cooperation of all the powers concerned, and especially on that of the two powers with the largest interests involved.

Here you have the whole scheme in a few sentences. It is published in the leading British journal by a leading Japanese correspondent. The Anglo-Japanese point of view, here clearly expressed, is that this pact is simply a means of taking us into the Anglo-Japanese alliance. This, of course, saves the benefits of the alliance to Great Britain and Japan, and by taking us into it makes it something of great value to those countries.

They are a little afraid that our coming in will dilute the whisky somewhat. In other words, they assume that if we enter into their plans for exploiting China and the other defenseless peoples of the Far East they will have to divide the spoils with us. While they apparently regret this necessity, their view, as clearly expressed by this writer, is that our presence in the combine will be worth far more than it costs. Perhaps in view of our conduct in the Philippines, in San Domingo, and Haiti they believe that we will be agreeable to their somewhat more brutal methods of exploitation. It will be noticed that this writer says that if the parties to this pact will fully cooperate with each other all will be well.

That, Mr. President, is what this compact is for; it is to secure our cordial cooperation with Japan in her atrocities in Korea, in China, and in Russian territory. It is to secure our cordial cooperation with Britain in her debauchery and robbery of the Chinese and in holding India in subjection, and thus strengthen her so that she may continue for a while longer these policies and aggressions which have made her so well hated throughout the world. That, Mr. President, is what this treaty is for. That is what it is expected to accomplish. And that is what it will accomplish if we ratify it. The ratification of this treaty means the fulfillment of the plans and ambitions of the imperialists, not only in the British Empire and the Japanese Empire but in these United States as well.

This treaty, Mr. President, makes for war and not for peace. How can it make for peace to unite our destinies with those of the two great island empires whose only political principle is that they must conquer and exploit weaker peoples in order to maintain their existence and their commercial supremacy.

But I speak, Mr. President, not only of the shame of such a partnership as we are asked to form but of the danger of it. It is true that at present Germany and Russia are prostrate and China is impotent. But that condition will not last. It can not last. The day will come when these great countries, with their unnumbered millions of subjects, will recover their strength and power, and then woe to the nation and combination of nations which united to oppress and exploit them in their time of weakness and distress. If we ratify this treaty, Mr. President, it means that we deliberately take our place with Japan and Great Britain and the imperialists of France in order to profit by the misfortunes of Germany, Russia, and China, and we will be called upon to pay the penalty, even as the British Empire and the Japanese Empire must pay the penalty of their misdeeds. No, Mr. President, fortunately for us, the path of honor and of self-interest is the same in this case, and that path leads away from this unholy combination of exploiting nations. Let us keep our ancient and honorable position of freedom from entangling alliances. In that position we can follow our own ideals and we can support the cause of justice and condemn acts of injustice among nations according to our own convictions of right and wrong. Both our honor and our self-interest require that we should maintain ourselves in that position by rejecting this proposed treaty.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, in the purer and better days of the Roman Republic, when the conscript fathers met to consider domestic or foreign affairs, there was this maxim, "Let every man write upon his brow his thought concerning the republic." In what I have to say this day I shall endeavor to speak in the true spirit of that maxim, without malice toward any nation, assuredly without any unkind feeling toward any Senator, asking charity, as I hope always to bestow it, upon those who differ from me.

I think I appreciate the gravity of the question submitted for our determination; I hope I appreciate my own duty. I think of America; I exalt America; I would serve America. I think of my own country and have uppermost and foremost in my mind the welfare of our people. My love for this country is not confined to State boundaries. The interests of Maine, or of Georgia, of Florida, or of Kentucky, are, nationally speaking, as dear to me as the interests of the great State which has overhonored me in permitting me humbly but very affectionately, in part, to represent her. The expression of these sentiments may seem unusual, but I hope not untimely.

I have heard much during this discussion which was amazing, disturbing, and, I fear, hurtful. Friendly nations have been denounced, and vials of wrath poured on the heads of peoples lately our associates in the Great War. Listening to these vituperative addresses, one unacquainted with facts would suppose, Mr. President, that we were at war with all the nations of the earth or with those who but yesterday sat at the conference board and with whom we are now asked to join in friendly treaty. One would suppose that we were at this moment marshaling our forces to strike at Japan or at France or at Great Britain. But I thank God reverently that we are at peace with all the nations of the earth; and may it be so forevermore. I am convinced that what we are asked to do will be in the interest of the peace and happiness of our country, and the peace and happiness of the world, and therefore I shall vote to ratify this treaty.

Mr. President, we are at peace with all the world and we were at peace when our great peace-loving President sent an invitation to certain nations to gather here in our Capital, to sit down at the council board in conference to consider matters of high and vital importance to our own people and to the peoples of the nations invited. It has seemed to me during the debate that passion or prejudice has put out the light of reason. I will not say that personal ambition has prompted utterances, but it has seemed to me that passion or prejudice has prevented those who have discussed this question from bearing in mind the past, the present, and the future—has prevented them from keeping uppermost in mind the purpose of the President as announced in his invitation. There can be no doubt whatever but that every good man and every good mother in this land applauded and thanked the President for sending forth that invitation, which expressed the noble and righteous motive and purpose of this Nation. I do myself a pleasure and, I hope, the cause I stand for a service by putting into this RECORD once more the historic invitation of the President of the United States extended to Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. I trust my time will permit me to read it and that it will not be unwelcome to the ears of Senators who do me the honor to be present and to listen.

THE PRESIDENT'S INVITATION TO POWERS.

The President is deeply gratified at the cordial response to his suggestion that there should be a conference on the subject of limitation of armament, in connection with which Pacific and far eastern questions should also be discussed.

Productive labor is staggering under an economic burden too heavy to be borne unless the present vast public expenditures are greatly reduced. It is idle to look for stability, or the assurance of social justice, or the security of peace, while wasteful and unproductive outlays deprive effort of its just reward and defeat the reasonable expectation of progress. The enormous disbursements in the rivalries of armaments manifestly constitute the greater part of the encumbrance upon enterprise and national prosperity; and avoidable or extravagant expense of this nature is not only without economic justification but is a constant menace to the peace of the world rather than an assurance of its preservation. Yet there would seem to be no ground to expect the halting of these increasing outlays unless the powers most largely concerned find a satisfactory basis for an agreement to effect their limitation. The time is believed to be opportune for these powers to approach this subject directly and in conference; and while, in the discussion of limitation of armament, the question of naval armament may naturally have first place, it has been thought best not to exclude questions pertaining to other armament to the end that all practicable measures of relief may have appropriate consideration. It may also be found advisable to formulate proposals by which in the interest of humanity the use of new agencies of warfare may be suitably controlled.

It is, however, quite clear that there can be no final assurance of the peace of the world in the absence of the desire for peace, and the prospect of reduced armaments is not a hopeful one unless this desire finds expression in a practical effort to remove causes of misunderstanding and to seek ground for agreement as to principles and their application. It is the earnest wish of this Government that, through an interchange of views with the facilities afforded by a conference, it may be possible to find a solution of Pacific and far eastern problems, of unquestioned importance at this time; that is, such common understandings with respect to matters which have been and are of international concern as may serve to promote enduring friendship among our peoples.

It is not the purpose of this Government to attempt to define the scope of the discussion in relation to the Pacific and Far East, but rather to leave this to be the subject of suggestions to be exchanged before the meeting of the conference, in the expectation that the spirit of friendship and a cordial appreciation of the importance of the elimination of sources of controversy will govern the final decision.

I particularly invite the attention of the Senate to the following paragraph in this invitation which I am reading:

It is not the purpose of this Government to attempt to define the scope of the discussion in relation to the Pacific and Far East, but rather to leave this to be the subject of suggestions to be exchanged before the meeting of the conference, in the expectation that the spirit of friendship and a cordial appreciation of the importance of the elimination of sources of controversy will govern the final decision.

Accordingly, in pursuance of the proposal which has been made, and in the light of the gracious indication of its acceptance, the President invites the Government of the French Republic to participate in a conference on the subject of limitation of armament, in connection with which Pacific and far eastern questions will also be discussed, to be held in Washington on the 11th day of November, 1921.

Mr. President, I have made this document a part of my remarks in order that those who may chance to read the proceedings of this day may have before them this invitation, and may see again the purpose of the conference as thus outlined by the President, and in order that that purpose may not be obscured or forgotten—in order that the motive behind the conference, the altogether commendable motive of our President, may be kept in all our minds. Let us see, as we proceed, whether that motive ran through all the proceedings and governed the deliberations and actions of the honorable men who represented you and me and our country in the conference called into being by the President.

I believe that the motive actuating the President and each and every one of our representatives was pure, patriotic, loyal, commendable, and that the hope of each and every one of these honored and honorable men was that they might render some service to their country. I hasten to add that I think every Senator is similarly actuated. If we differ, we differ as patriots. If my views are not in harmony with yours, I cheerfully admit that you are actuated by the same motives that prompt every word I shall utter and every vote I shall cast. I can not suffer myself to believe that the Secretary of State or the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Alabama or Mr. Root was actuated by other than the highest motives, patriotic motives, good motives. All they did, all they said, everything done, everything said by them, was, according to their minds, for the welfare of their country, which they love and would serve just as faithfully as any Senator in this Chamber.

A similar invitation, Mr. President, was sent also to China, to Belgium, to the Netherlands, and to Portugual, with each and all of which countries we are at peace; and so it came about that there were nine nations assembled around the table of conference here in the Capital of this Republic.

President Harding recognized, as we all recognize, the condition of the world, and he thought that such a conference would result in benefit to America and to the whole of mankind. Therefore this invitation was extended to those nations whose interests seemed to lie largely here in the greatest of our oceans, in the Pacific, out upon whose billows I have looked so many times. These invitations were accepted by these several nations. Their acceptances are matter of record. They are printed here and all may read, and I assume that all Senators are entirely familiar with the several acceptances of these eight different nations.

No one, unless he is perversely insistent upon inputing wicked motives, can see any wrong motive in the acceptances by these different nations. They severally respond to the sentiment expressed by our President. These acceptances breathe a commendable and peaceful spirit.

INDEPENDENT SOVEREIGN NATIONS.

It ought to be remembered that these nations came voluntarily to this conference. They were sovereign independent nations. I undertake to say, and I do say, that each and every one of these nations came here voluntarily; they came as independent sovereign nations, even as we were an independent sovereign Nation; they conferred together as independent sovereign nations; in so far as our representatives and theirs could agree, subject to constitutional approval of their acts, they agreed as sovereign independent nations; and finally, I undertake to say, and I do say, that each and every one of these nine nations having met as sovereign, having conferred as sovereign, having agreed as sovereign, having parted as sovereign, stands to-day a sovereign nation. When my country shall have entered into this agreement, if it does, it will continue a sovereign Nation, unbound and unshackled, the master of her own destiny, and we, the Congress, will continue to have the power, cooperating with the Executive, to shape the policy of this Nation in peace time and in war time.

In other words, Mr. President, this agreement, this treaty, does not strip this Nation of any of its sovereign power. It does not bind us to war. To anticipate somewhat my argument, this treaty could not bind us to war. The learned Senators of my profession when in private life know full well, and the people ought to be told or reminded, that no treaty is valid which undertakes to withhold from or deprive Congress of the power to declare war. Any treaty which undertook to bind this Nation to enter into war would be utterly and completely null and void, ab initio, from the beginning unto the end.

The treaty-making power, I remind Senators, is not all-comprehensive. There are well-known limitations to the treaty-making power, and I wish to emphasize, if I may, that if this four-power treaty undertook directly, expressly, or impliedly to commit this Nation in the future to an act of war, or to a declaration of war, it or any such provision in a treaty would be utterly null and void. The Constitution, the supreme law, vests in Congress the power to declare war, and just as any statute is void if it runs counter to the Constitution, so any treaty is void if it similarly runs counter to the Constitution. But I hope it will come to be realized and clearly apprehended that this treaty does not undertake to deprive the Congress of any of its constitutional power in respect of a declaration of war. That power vested in the Congress remains there, and any effort on our part, as a branch of the treaty-making department, to take that power away from the Congress would be a vain and idle effort of no legal or binding effect.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator if he supported the League of Nations?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I not only did not support the League of Nations; but, following the banner lifted high by my learned friend from Missouri, I opposed it with all my might and all my power, though far away and probably unheard beyond the Rockies.

Mr. REED. I thought that was true, and I am sorry the Senator has abandoned my banner; but that is not the point.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I have not abandoned that banner.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator if at that time, when he was opposing the League of Nations, he did not make the argument that it committed us to war, and urged that as an insuperable objection to it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think I can answer in a few words. I was opposed to the League of Nations. I thought, with the Senator from Missouri, that it set up a supergovernment, and that by virtue of many of the provisions of the covenant of the league we were and would become bound to abide the decision of other peoples and others nations, and that we would not continue to be what we were and what we hoped to be, what I think we still are, namely, a free, independent, sovereign people, and under our Constitution masters of our own fate in peace and war. For that reason, thus broadly stated, I opposed the League of Nations.

Mr. REED. The Senator makes the point that the treaty-making power can not enter into any compact legally committing us to war because the Constitution of the United States does not confer that power upon the President and the Senate. That is true; everybody knows that who knows anything. Yet the Senator says he opposed the League of Nations because it undertook to commit us to the decisions of that supergovernment. Of course, we could not, under the Constitution, have been legally and technically bound by the league any more than we can be bound by the agreement we are now discussing.

The Constitution then was an insuperable obstacle, according to the Senator's argument; nevertheless the Senator argued then that by entering into the league pact, although the constitutional power did not exist to legally bind this country, we were so far committing ourselves by the compact that we could not in honor refuse to carry out the mandates of the governing body. In other words, we were then just where we are now. The argument the Senator urged against the league applies to this treaty exactly and absolutely.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There, of course, we differ radically. We differ in our construction of the instrument.

Mr. REED. Certainly; but if the construction of the treaty be correct, namely, that we do engage ourselves with these other nations, then it is no answer to say that we can not engage ourselves, any more than it was an answer in the days when we were discussing the League of Nations. You come out at exactly the same hole in both cases.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think not. Neither the Senator nor I wanted our Nation to agree to that instrument and then hereafter be dragged at the chariot wheels of empires and be put in such a position that if Congress asserted its constitutional power we would be charged with violating a treaty entered into. Therefore, the Senator opposed entering into that treaty, and so did I.

Mr. REED. And for the same reason I oppose this treaty.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I see the Senator does.

Mr. REED. And for the same reasons the argument fails which the Senator has thus far made; that is, it applies to the League of Nations as well as to this treaty. The whole question, then, comes down to this: Do we, by this treaty, commit ourselves?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To what—to war?

Mr. REED. That is the point.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I understand the Senator has argued that if we join in this treaty we commit ourselves to use force, which means war.

Mr. REED. That is the whole question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With great deference, I do not adopt that construction, as I shall attempt to point out in a moment.

Mr. REED. The argument the Senator is making that the Constitution is an insuperable objection to our entering the League of Nations applies equally to this treaty. The same argument applies to both instruments. The question therefore recurs, Are we in any way by this instrument entangling ourselves, so that our honor will be involved?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think not.

Mr. REED. That is the whole question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly it is; and I hope the Senator will hear just this word in immediate response to his thought. Of course, no one familiar with the Constitution, as is admitted, will contend that any treaty would be valid which undertook to strip the Congress of its power to declare war. I have briefly stated that proposition here in anticipation of an argument, namely, that this treaty does not undertake to commit us to use force, but that if it did, it would be utterly null and void. That was the thought I sought to express.

Recurring now, if I may, I have said that these nations came here as sovereign nations, conferred as sovereign nations, agreed as sovereign nations, and with the utmost respect for Senators I maintain that these nations parted as sovereign nations, and that each and every one of them to-day stands a sovereign nation, and that by entering into this agreement none of them, certainly not our country, parts with any portion of its sovereignty.

I think it very well to bear those propositions in mind, for they lead to many conclusions. If I thought that entering into this treaty would deprive Congress of the right of determining whether this Nation should take up arms or not; if I thought that this treaty deprived us of the right to enter into or refrain from entering into war; if I thought that this treaty bound us in honor to go to war at any time, or against or for any nation, contrary to the judgment of Congress or the true interests of our country, no one, not even the Senator from Missouri, would be more vigilant and earnest in opposition to the ratification of this treaty than I would be. But I am well satisfied that this Nation remains or will remain absolutely sovereign, and that this or future Congresses, which I trust will meet here in Washington for centuries to come, if our Constitution remains in its present form, will have the unquestioned right, as it has the unquestioned power, to declare war, and to determine the course of this Nation if war is thought necessary as between ourselves and other nations of the earth.

The great peace conference met, and in welcoming the delegates the President delivered an address worthy of the great event. Listen to his words:

> Gentlemen of the conference, the United States welcomes you with unselfish hands. We harbor no fears; we have no sordid ends to serve; we suspect no enemy; we contemplate or apprehend no conquest. Content with what we have, we seek nothing which is another's. We only wish to do with you that finer, nobler thing which no nation can do alone.
>
> We wish to sit with you at the table of international understanding and good will. In good conscience we are eager to meet you frankly, and invite and offer cooperation. The world demands a sober contemplation of the existing order and the realization that there can be no cure without sacrifice, not by one of us, but by all of us.
>
> I do not mean surrendered rights, or narrowed freedom, or denied aspirations, or ignored national necessities. Our Republic would no more ask for these than it would give. No pride need be humbled, no nationality submerged, but I would have a mergence of minds committing all of us to less preparation for war and more enjoyment of fortunate peace.
>
> The higher hopes come of the spirit of our coming together. It is but just to recognize varying needs and peculiar positions. Nothing can be accomplished in disregard of national apprehensions. Rather, we should act together to remove the causes of apprehensions. This is not to be done in intrigue. Greater assurance is found in the exchanges of simple honesty and directness, among men resolved to accomplish as becomes leaders among nations, when civilization itself has come to its crucial test.
> It is not to be challenged that government fails when the excess of its cost robs the people of the way to happiness and the opportunity to achieve. If the finer sentiments were not urging, the cold, hard facts of excessive cost and the eloquence of economics would urge us to reduce our armaments. If the concept of a better order does not appeal, then let us ponder the burden and the blight of continued competition.

It is not to be denied that the world has swung along throughout the ages without heeding this call from the kindlier hearts of men. But the same world never before was so tragically brought to realization of the utter futility of passion's sway when reason and conscience and fellowship point a nobler way.

I can speak officially only for our United States. Our hundred millions frankly want less of armament and none of war. Wholly free from guile, sure in our own minds that we harbor no unworthy designs, we accredit the world with the same good intent. So I welcome you, not alone in good will and high purpose, but with high faith.

We are met for a service to mankind. In all simplicity, in all honesty and all honor, there may be written here the avowals of a world conscience refined by the consuming fires of war and made more sensitive by the anxious aftermath. I hope for that understanding which will emphasize the guaranties of peace, and for commitments to less burdens and a better order which will tranquilize the world. In such an accomplishment there will be added glory to your flags and ours, and the rejoicing of mankind will make the transcending music of all succeeding time.

THE WORK OF THE CONFERENCE.

When the conference was over, participated in by these sovereign nations, and on our part by gentlemen whom we know, loyal men, patriotic men, men coming from learned New England and from scholarly Southland, we know that the world applauded their work. I do not know how others feel, but I love to think that the very angels sang in joy over the work of that conference. Man rejoiced because man thought, the Nation rejoiced because the Nation thought, that it was a step, a very great, long step, toward world peace, toward peace without sacrifice, toward peace with power unimpaired and rights guaranteed. So the result of the conference, carried on by learned men, speaking different languages, coming from different countries, was certain treaties and certain declarations. The Senate is familiar with the several treaties negotiated, the several declarations put forth, and the several resolutions adopted. We have before us one of these treaties and an accompanying explanatory declaration, but all of these treaties should be borne in mind as we proceed to consider them severally.

It ought to be remembered and it ought to be recalled that at the close of that conference there was no dissenting voice, there was no misunderstanding. There was entire harmony among the representatives of the different nations, each jealous of its own rights. They met, they conferred, they parted, and their work is before us.

The Senate of the United States under our Constitution has very great powers. Doubtless Senators recall that some of the framers of the Constitution thought that Congress should have the exclusive treaty-making power. Others thought that the President should exercise that. A compromise was effected, so that it came about that the President negotiates treaties, which become effective when approved or ratified by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.

This power of ours, I think, has been wisely exercised. We have entered into a great many treaties with other nations, treaties of amity, treaties of peace, and to-day we have 70 or more arbitration treaties which were negotiated by the Executive and concurred in and approved by the Senate. These treaties are designed for wise purposes. They are designed to avoid war—the bloodshed, ruin, desolation of war. I do not suppose there is any Senator who will oppose entering into an arbitration treaty when its purpose is to avoid war.

WHO DRAFTED THE FOUR-POWER TREATY?

The work of the conference is seen in treaties, conventions, arrangements, understandings, among or between the several nations, and we are here to-day immediately to consider what has been formally termed the "four-power treaty" as one of the many negotiated.

Who drafted this treaty? Who framed it? At the beginning of this discussion in the minds of some Senators there seemed to be some mystery about it. To them it seemed to have been born in darkness, perhaps conceived in wickedness, by un-American-thinking men or by cunning foreign diplomats. We listened to much concerning the alleged "mysterious origin" of the four-power treaty. We were reminded of the dangers lurking in "secret diplomacy" and our chosen representatives were accused of concealing something. But, lo, the truth, the fact, is now known, and perturbed spirits may rest. The letter of our Secretary of State addressed to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], which is to be found on page 3712 of the RECORD, should silence criticism. It was my purpose to read that letter, but time will not permit.

I mention it to add that if there ever was a candid doubt or honest suspicion as to the origin of the four-power treaty, if there was a reasonable suspicion or a reasonable doubt as to who drafted it, who framed it, that doubt has been removed and that suspicion ought to be for all time out of the mind of any Senator who entertained it. No one with any regard for his own reputation can question the truth of the facts set forth in that letter. I invite the attention of the country to that letter which gives us the origin of this particular treaty. I hold myself in check. I do not wish to say anything which may be construed as offensive by the most sensitive or punctilious. I hold myself in check, but I do venture to say that it is unusual language to utter in the Senate when that language conveys the charge, even by innuendo or remotely, that anything said in the letter of Secretary Hughes is untrue. In view of what we now know it is improper, it is unjust, it is unwise to impute bad faith to our delegates, for see what you are doing. Pause to see what you are doing. You are imputing bad faith to our own Secretary of State. One would suppose, if he dropped down from Mars, that this body was hostile to and had no confidence in the integrity, not to say veracity, of our own adviser. I had hoped, Mr. President, that this debate might proceed on high lines, Senators differing, it may be, but always with respect, always with courtesy, and always with perfect faith in the good motives of others.

Mr. President, this treaty is couched in plain and simple language. The words employed are plain and simple English words. I am not competent to say, but I am assuming that as they appear in the French language they are equally plain and simple and understandable, and being plain, simple, and understandable they need no corroborative or extraneous evidence as to their meaning drawn from contemporaneous utterances; but if there were any ambiguity, uncertainty, or unintelligibility in the language used, we are told by those who drafted the instrument that they understood it and that each and all of them understood the language to mean the same thing.

The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] performed a service when during his address he called our attention to the fact, as found on pages 3844 and following of the RECORD, that when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] reported the four-power treaty to the conference in plenary session he emphasized the fact that there is no force lurking in its terms. In that behalf the learned Senator from Massachusetts said:

> There is no provision for the use of force to carry out any of the terms of the agreement, and no military or naval sanction lurks anywhere in the background or under cover of these plain and direct clauses.

And, as the Senator from Wisconsin pointed out, this construction was accepted by all the delegations representing the signatory powers.

Why see, or affect to see, uncertainty where there is certainty, ambiguity in unequivocally "plain and direct clauses"?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the Senator from Massachusetts then reported to the Senate a reservation setting forth the very language which the Senator from California now says was already in the treaty.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly he did, to remove all doubt from the mind of the Senator from Arkansas; to remove a doubt from all minds; to have it so plain that the wayfaring man, and so forth, can read and understand; to make it so plain that the plainest—yes, the most simple—man would understand.

Mr. CARAWAY. Even a senatorial mind might understand?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; even a senatorial mind from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. And California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope the Senator has not intended to be so unkind as his remark would seem to indicate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, the Senator can not accuse me of unkindness. I do not mean it toward anyone.

Mr. FRANCE. The language is so plain and so simple as to admit of no differing construction by intelligent men, according to the Senator from California. Yet here in the Senate there is substantial division of opinion not only between the proponents and the opponents of the treaty but even between the proponents of the treaty themselves, as was evidenced yesterday when the Senator from Missouri advanced the thought that this treaty gave protection to the Koreans, and the Senator from Massachusetts advanced the theory that it did not.

Mr. REED. To which "Senator from Missouri" does the Senator from Maryland refer? I wish the Senator would state so that it may appear in the RECORD.

Mr. FRANCE. I refer to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not wish to be ungracious or disrespectful, but I will say I can answer Senators separately, though not in battalion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I see the hands of the clock are approaching rapidly the hour of 3, but I will, of course, yield to the Senator from Maryland, though he will recall the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are acting, and appreciate my desire to conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly; I do.

Mr. FRANCE. What I have said is a statement preliminary by way of answer to a question——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Delighted as I am to hear the Senator from Maryland, will he have the goodness to reserve his speech until I have finished? Of course, if he desires to ask me a question, I shall endeavor to answer.

Mr. FRANCE. I do not intend to make an address, but I was merely answering a question which has evidently proven embarrassing to the Senator from California. Therefore, I shall not trespass further.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I thank the Senator. What I am saying, of course, Senators may reply to. I have not intended to be offensive; but I am not apologizing, and I do not wish Senators to think I am. I am willing to debate the questions involved with the utmost respect for the opinions of others. If Senators do not think so, I am sorry.

Responding to the thought of my friend from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], I repeat that this is simple, plain, and understandable language. I am not imputing wrong motives to Senators who may see something in the language which is not what I determine it to be; far from it. The statement which I made can not in the ordinary course of debate be regarded as offensive; it is not intended to be so.

What is there mysterious, what is there obscure, what is there which calls forth the rather vain exhibition in some quarters of acquaintance with the dictionary—to remind us that there is such a thing as a dictionary—in these words:

I.

The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

I should in fairness, however, say that some question arose as to the meaning of the words "insular possessions and insular dominions," and I cheerfully admit that any doubt upon that point may have been well grounded in the mind of him who entertained it. I admit that the language might be susceptible of future misunderstanding. Therefore, to remove that doubt, there is this supplementary and accompanying agreement or treaty signed by the parties to the main four-power treaty. If there was a doubt, if there was a question in the mind of any honest man—and I assume that if there was a doubt it was in the mind of an honest man—that doubt has been removed by the supplementary treaty, and all argument as to the uncertainty of the term "insular possessions and insular dominions" should cease. The clarifying language in this supplementary treaty, signed February 6, 1922, is as follows:

The term "insular possessions and insular dominions" used in the aforesaid treaty shall, in its application to Japan, include only Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin), Formosa, and the Pescadores, and the islands under the mandate of Japan.

Let us examine again the language of this treaty. Article I reads:

If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

There is nothing mysterious in that language. When the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] reported this treaty to the conference he explained it, and all those present acquiesced in his statement. The doubts which have arisen, the different constructions which have been placed upon that language since then, do not make the language uncertain. A conference is a conference. We had a conference in Washington, did we not? Nations sat in conference; results had to be unanimously arrived at. Any conference which may be called under the terms of this treaty must be participated in by the same nations, and any result reached at such conference in the future must be unanimously arrived at. There ought to be no doubt upon that question in the mind of any Senator.

Section 2 provides:

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

This is provision for a conference which will be participated in by sovereigns, where unanimity of action is necessary. That brings me again to what I said a moment ago, namely, that the power to engage in war is not expressly taken from us and can not be taken from us, for the reason suggested, that power being lodged exclusively in the Congress of the United States under the Constitution of our common country.

Section 3 of the treaty fixes the term of its duration.

The treaty is to remain in force for at least 10 years. That is a very wise provision, for if during that period of 10 years these four great nations can remain at peace there is ground for hope, rational hope, that peace will thereafter continue as between or among them indefinitely. Is not that a prospect of encouragement, and should we not welcome any agreement, any treaty, which leads toward that consummation?

If Senators could persuade me, even though they did not convince me, that entering into this treaty would bring about war or injury to my country, I would not vote to ratify or consent to it. I use the words "convince" and "persuade" I hope correctly. We are often "persuaded" to do things which we are not "convinced" are wise. Therefore I repeat that if I could be even persuaded that this treaty will endanger my country I would not stand here favoring its ratification.

It may be too late to appeal to Senators who have fixed notions upon this subject; it may be altogether idle to attempt either to "persuade" or to "convince" them, and in so far as the verdict of this body is concerned I may be wasting my own time and yours, but perhaps it will serve a good purpose to pursue the argument a little longer.

I am not thinking of my political fortunes. I am thinking of the fortunes of my country. I have been somewhat surprised at the utterances of some Senators who threaten their brethren with retirement because they favor this measure or that measure. I indulge in no such threats. In so far as the personality of the Senate is concerned, if I could forget partisanship I should trust that you might all continue here forever.

I do not personally wish to see any Senator retire because of his views or vote on this or other measures; nor do I threaten him with retirement because he views his duty in a different light than I view mine. I am not speaking for myself nor thinking of my political future, but I am speaking here in behalf of a cause which I think makes for the welfare of every State in this Union and of every man and woman in this country.

I repeat, and concede for argument's sake, to be perfectly fair and frank and candid, that there may have been some doubt—indeed, I must assume that there was honest doubt—as to the meaning of certain words used in the treaty in respect to the term "insular possessions and insular dominions." I assume perfect sincerity on the part of others. I impute no wrong motive to men; I may fight ideas and principles, but not men—although I do not run away from men. We are not in the habit of running away from them in California; and I see so many smiling faces of Senators that I know I will never have occasion to run away from any of them. I say there may have been doubt as to the meaning of the term "insular possessions and insular dominions" as used in the treaty. Very well, be it so. What have we before us upon that subject?

I invite the attention of Senators to page 892 of this Senate document, No. 126, and in order that it may appear once more in the RECORD I take the liberty of reading "the declaration accompanying the four-power treaty." It reads:

In signing the treaty this day between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signatory powers:

1. That the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean: Provided, however, That the making of the treaty shall not be deemed to be an assent on the part of the United States of America to the mandates and shall not preclude agreements between the United States of America and the mandatory powers, respectively, in relation to the mandated islands.

2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

Other doubt as to the meaning of this treaty is removed by the supplementary treaty later entered into by the signatory powers, to which I shall in a moment invite attention.

I pause here, however, to dwell upon this declaration accompanying the four-power treaty.

It seems to me that Senators should be glad and feel relieved because of this declaration accompanying this treaty, for here once again we say, in effect, as we said when we ratified the treaty with Germany, that we do not make ourselves a party to the treaty of Versailles; and as to the second provision in this declaration, anyone who would preserve the civilization of America should be relieved when it is remembered that that provision is an official recognition of the right of America to determine who shall and who shall not enter into and abide in America. It is a solemn recognition of international law, a solemn recognition that the United States has a right to determine the question of immigration without offending justly, under law, any other nation; and to us of the Pacific coast that is a great and important recognition of a vital right.

This declaration, Mr. President, was signed on the same day that the treaty itself was signed. It has the same dignity. It has the same binding force. I have heard something to the effect that it may have been signed physically before the physical signing of the accompanying or preceding treaty proper; but that is neither here nor there. That is scarcely worthy of serious discussion. It is enough for us to know that the treaty was signed, that the declaration was signed by all parties on the 13th of December, and there it is. It is a recognition of a vastly important principle. It is a recognition of a vastly important question of policy for America. It is a recognition that if, in its wisdom, this Nation shall close the doors of the Pacific to oriental immigration, no oriental nation signatory to this treaty will have cause for offense. It is a recognition that this Nation can close the doors of the Pacific or close the doors of the Atlantic to the coming of any undesirable people to America, and that neither Japan nor Great Britain nor France will have any just ground of complaint.

Time was, Mr. President, when nations questioned that right; but long ago America asserted that principle, even as we were the first nation to assert the important doctrine of the right of expatriation. Just as we asserted the latter doctrine—that a man might throw off the allegiance of the nation or country of his birth and take on the allegiance of another country—so we early asserted the doctrine that this Nation had and has the right to determine who shall enter into and abide in the United States. I think it very important that the American people should know of the significance of that declaration and of the recognition of that right.

I turn aside here to say that I was concerned over that immediate point while the conference was in session. While I did not think that any act of the conference would impair that principle or imperil that right, I was overpleased—it is not too much to say that I was overjoyed—when I saw that declaration, wherein Japan admits, concedes, this fundamental, important, and, as I think, vital principle to America. That declaration itself was worth the conference. That declaration will be invoked, if necessary, by me in this Senate Chamber, for I do hope the hour is coming, and may it come quickly, when the doors of the Pacific shall be shut to the coming of undesirable peoples, even as I would close the doors of the Atlantic to the wicked Bolshevik or the man who comes here with torch to burn down or with bomb to blow up the temple of American freedom. I would close the doors of the Pacific and the doors of the Atlantic to the coming of any man or any people who do not come here thirsting for liberty, thirsting for regulated government, thirsting for individual freedom, religious freedom, political freedom, safeguarded by the Constitution of the United States. I would close the doors to every man and to every woman, if there be such, who, coming here, comes with a desire or an intent to overturn or subvert the beneficent form of government which we enjoy. Therefore, even at the risk of wearying you, at the risk of being called repetitious, I repeat that this declaration is a very, very helpful declaration for America, for the time may come when this Nation will deem it necessary to preserve our type and standard of civilization, our level of life and living; and therefore I was rejoiced when all doubt or misgiving or fear in my mind was removed by that declaration.

Lest I be misunderstood, let me say that this Nation, Mr. President, has been and is an asylum of liberty. This Nation has extended its arms in welcome to the downtrodden, the weary, the broken in spirit, the oppressed of many lands; and they have come from many lands, and, with here and there an exception, they have joined in our American life. They have fought, they have died for the Republic of their adoption, and all such America welcomes; but the doors should be shut—they are now partly shut; they should be wholly and completely shut—to classes who come spreading wicked doctrines, revolutionary doctrines which threaten our institutions, but will not achieve their wicked purpose. I trust Senators will bear in mind that accompanying the treaty which we are considering is this important declaration, part and parcel of it; and if you shall be successful in defeating this treaty, remember that you are defeating and nullifying the declaration to which I have devoted so many words. I should grieve to see that accomplished, for, apart from all other considerations, I think this is a public, national, international recognition which will be an anchor of safety to us in years to come.

On pages 892 and 893 of Senate Document 126, and immediately following the declaration to which I have invited attention, Senators will find the supplementary treaty, signed February 6, 1922. I commented briefly upon that treaty, but venture to repeat, perhaps, and to add a few words. Doubt unquestionably did arise as to the meaning of the words "insular possessions and insular dominions," and this supplementary treaty was intended to remove, and I submit does remove, such doubt, for this supplementary treaty provides:

> The term "insular possessions and insular dominions" used in the aforesaid treaty shall, in its application to Japan, include only Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin), Formosa, and the Pescadores, and the islands under the mandate of Japan.

In other words, to set the matter at rest, to estop argument, to close opposition, to make all here who must act and all others who are concerned in our action cease to have doubt upon the meaning of those words, we point to this supplementary treaty. "Insular possessions and insular dominions" was a phrase which was thought to include, perhaps, the main islands of Japan. We now know that such is not the meaning to be attributed to those words. In fairness, in courtesy—and I wish others were here to hear it now—if there was doubt upon that subject it is removed, unless men perversely insist upon having doubt when all the sunlight of heaven floods their minds.

That supplementary treaty may not have been necessary, Mr. President, but who shall question that it clarifies the meaning, and why not be frank about the matter? Why not admit what I have thus very poorly stated?

If there is such a thing as partisanship entering into this discussion, you and I must forget it. I am glad to know, to feel, to think, to see that partisanship does not enter into this discussion. Quite apart from partisanship, may we not once and for all admit, the one to the other, that further debate upon that point, namely, as to the meaning of the words "insular dominions and insular possessions," should cease, all doubt as to the meaning of the words being removed?

The position of California upon this question in this body may have depended upon this very declaration in respect to the right of nations to determine laws in respect of immigration. I am very sure of the position of California upon that question. California has asserted the right, under the Constitution, which we here now claim, that this Nation may without offense determine all questions of immigration to its shores. That is the position of California. I trust it is the position of every one of the 48 States, and that when the time shall be opportune this Congress or succeeding Congresses will take up that question and will assert that right by appropriate legislation. Our position in California is, of course, vastly strengthened by the terms of the treaty which is under consideration.

But there still remains in the minds of thoughtful men some doubt as to the meaning of this treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has just stated that the position of California with respect to the immigration question, namely, that it is a domestic question and not subject to control by international conferences, is well established and well recognized, and that this treaty strengthens the position of California in that regard. Has there ever been any doubt in the Senator's mind as to the position of the United States on the right of this Government to control absolutely, as a domestic question, the subject of immigration to this country?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No, Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. How, then, can it be said that this treaty strengthens the position of California on the subject?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have never had any doubt as to the position of our country upon that question, but I said a moment ago that here is a recognition by Japan, a recognition by Great Britain, and a recognition by France of that right.

Mr. ROBINSON. The conference itself will determine what are domestic questions, will it not? Who will determine under this treaty what constitutes a domestic question or whether a question involving the regulation of immigration is a domestic question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is the treaty——

Mr. ROBINSON. I know what the treaty says about it, and the Senator does, too.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will put a direct question, I will try to answer it directly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under the four-power treaty, who has authority to determine what constitutes a domestic question and whether a question involving immigration is a domestic question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. International law determines that question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not ask the Senator what principle determines it; I asked whether, under this treaty, one government alone would determine it for itself or whether the governments acting by a majority would determine it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I answer in this way: That paragraph 2 of the declaration accompanying the four-power treaty provides as follows:

> That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

Wherefore my contention is—and I submit it to the learning of the Senator—that this conference can not control that matter; that any controversies which may arise as to that matter are not to be controlled by that conference, for here they say, in express terms, that any controversies which arise under the second paragraph of article 1 "shall not be taken to embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers." Therefore I see no danger in that conference. That conference would not discuss the question, or, if they did, neither separately or collectively would they have any control or jurisdiction over that matter. They have admitted it; they say it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator contend that the rule would be any different respecting the subject if this treaty is agreed to from that which now prevails?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; the fundamental rule would remain, Senator; but, as I have undertaken to say, I think it is much to have Japan and to have Great Britain and to have France thus solemnly make that admission.

Mr. ROBINSON. Suppose a controversy arises between Japan and the United States which Japan insists is not a domestic question under international law and which the United States insists is a domestic question under international law. Who would determine which is right?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In such a supposititious case, each nation being sovereign, there is no tribunal, perhaps, to decide it. I hope we would be in the right and I hope we would have the courage to assert our position; but in the case which the learned Senator suggests, of course there is no tribunal set up on earth to determine such a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, Mr. President, has the Senator any objection to modifying the committee reservation, or the reservation carried in the nature of a supplementary declaration in the treaty, so as to provide that each nation shall independently and for itself determine what constitute domestic questions and what questions are not to be submitted to conference under that limitation?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There are many reasons why I would not now seek to amend this treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not talking about an amendment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was about to say that I have many reasons why I would not now go further than the reservation to which I am going immediately to address myself. I do not think it would accomplish any good for our country I think this proposed reservation comes late. I think it deals with a question which, perhaps, might well have been considered when all the nations were here assembled, but I do not think it would serve any good purpose now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a statement?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; if it does not take too much time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that, and I shall not long delay the Senator; I have not interrupted him before.

As I understand the Senator now, he thinks that the conference ought to have made clear in the reservation which it reported with the treaty that each nation shall have the right, and exercise it, to determine what constitutes a domestic question, and what, therefore, is excepted from the consideration of the conference.

The Senator says that suggestion comes rather late and that there are many reasons why he thinks the Senate should not modify the reservation in this treaty, or the amendment in the nature of a reservation, to make clear what the conference ought to have done. What are the reasons?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not say what they ought to have done. They might well have done it, and later on I will make answer to that; but if the Senator will pardon me, I will give my reasons later on.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. I am compelled to wait.

WE ARE ENTERING INTO NO ALLIANCE.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Doubt did arise in the minds of Senators as to the meaning of words, as to the proper interpretation of language, as has been so many times pointed out, but I think that many Senators were more concerned over a doubt as to whether by this treaty we were entering into an alliance, an alliance which bound us in time of peace and in time of war. I can readily understand why such a doubt may have arisen in the first instance. Those of us who opposed the ratification of the Versailles treaty had occasion to study the question of alliances. This is not a time for any display of historical knowledge, but if it were timely anyone could quote more or less elaborately from historical works and books recognized as authorities as to the meaning of the word "alliance" as used without modifying words or as modified by preceding or subsequent words. There were some and there may still be some who think that by the treaty proper we formed an alliance in the sense of an alliance which would bind us in time of peace and also in time of war, so that we would be obliged morally, obligated legally, to join in offensive or defensive war if engaged in by any one of the four powers. I suppose they would argue also that even as we would be bound, so these other three nations would be bound to come to our assistance if we unhappily became embroiled in war. Undoubtedly if that thought was entertained, namely, that this treaty is an alliance of a dangerous character, hurtful to us, it was honestly entertained; but should it be further entertained?

The committee has proposed a reservation to the resolution ratifying the treaty. The language of that reservation is familiar to the Senate. It removes all question as to the alliance proposition. The reservation reads as follows:

> The United States understands that under the statement of the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

How can we further argue, therefore, assuming that we ratify this treaty, that we are committed to armed force, that we have joined an alliance, and that there is an obligation resting upon us to join in any defense?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With pleasure.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator, of course, understands that the reservation merely attempts to express the understanding of the United States as to the meaning and effect of the treaty?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from California is a great lawyer, and he knows that in the making of a contract it is necessary that there should be a meeting of minds; that is, that all the parties to the contract shall understand it mutually.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON. If Great Britain and Japan construe it to be an alliance and the United States construes it to be a mere agreement to confer, does not the Senator think that the treaty itself should be so amended as to make clear that there has been a meeting of the minds of the nations signing the treaty?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think I have a prompt and conclusive and satisfactory answer to the question which the Senator is good enough to propound. It is quite true that there must be a meeting of the minds, as we say, of the parties to an agreement or contract; but I remind the Senator that so far as I am at present advised Great Britain has not yet formally ratified the treaty, France has not, and Japan has not. Therefore, if we ratify it with this our interpretation, in future controversies, if they should arise, these powers would be presumed and held to have adopted our interpretation.

Mr. ROBINSON. They would only be presumed to have accepted it as the interpretation of the United States. Their interpretation of the instrument would not be governed by our interpretation of it. The Senator, I assume, would regard it as unfortunate if in a matter of so much importance there should be an arrangement construed differently from the beginning by the various parties who have signed it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I would, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then does not the Senator recognize the fact that if the language of the agreement is such as to permit or make possible conflicting constructions of it, the language ought to be clarified so there could be no conflict?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think that we here clarify it. We declare our meaning, our interpretation, if it needs interpretation; and if they accept it, I repeat myself, they would be held to have ratified the treaty with the interpretation which we have placed upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is to say, with the understanding that the United States interprets it in the way that our reservation expresses it, but that would not impose upon Japan and Great Britain an interpretation which they in fact would not agree to.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think they would be held to the interpretation, we having made it first and before ratification by them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me make this illustration: If the Senator signed a note by which he agreed to pay at a fixed time $500 to a given payee, with the usual terms of a note, and then attached to it a stipulation that it is not a note, does the Senator think that would change in fact or in law the nature of the instrument he would have signed?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not sure, if the Senator accepted the "note" with my interpretation upon it, that it might not be construed as a changed document and he be held to have adopted my interpretation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Would it not be better to change the document itself if the Senator did not want to sign a note, so it would not constitute an undertaking to pay?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It might be, possibly, but not necessarily.

Mr. ROBINSON. In other words, the correct policy to be pursued in entering into national agreements is the same as that which ought to govern in engagements between individuals. They ought to understand the nature of their undertaking and they ought to concur in interpretation of the undertaking. No one party to an undertaking can impose upon the other parties to it a construction different from what the instrument itself implies.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I merely wish to add, somewhat in rejoinder, that many here think the reservation entirely unnecessary, but they also think that it achieves the purpose in view, which is to remove doubts in the minds of those here who have to pass upon the instrument.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly yield again?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With pleasure.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is well known that a number of Senators, at least three, find this agreement positively obnoxious to them, and their convictions as to what the undertaking of the United States ought to be without the reservation, because their construction of the treaty without the reservation is that it does constitute an alliance in law and in fact.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There is no doubt about the position of Senators. Touching the wisdom of using language so plain, so clear, as to express thought so as to avoid future controversy, the history of the world affords abundant evidence. I need not remind my friend that the very holy words uttered by our Savior on the cross have been the subject of long and heated controversy, long and heated debates. According as these words are read they have given rise to two great denominations in the Christian world. I hope it will not be improper for me to repeat those sacred words:

> Verily I say unto thee to-day shalt thou be with Me in paradise.

So simple, so beautiful. There are those who believe the Savior meant to say that even that day the penitent thief on His side would be with Him in paradise, while there are others who believe He meant to say that thereafter, after the great judgment day, the penitent sinner would be with Him in paradise.

Whence arises this difference of meaning? It comes from a difference of punctuation. Read thus, as some do:

> Verily I say unto you, to-day shalt thou be with Me in paradise—

And immediate translation into paradise is promised.

Read thus, as others do:

> Verily I say unto you to-day, thou shalt be with Me in paradise—

And a different meaning as to time is conveyed.

Thus we have that centuries-old controversy among honest, devout, sincere, religious people as to the meaning of that immortal sentence. So it is utterly impossible to draw an instrument as to the meaning of which there may not arise some question, some doubt.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Just what the illustration of the Senator from California has to do with the immediate controversy my mind is unable to comprehend, but I know that——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is my fault, doubtless. It is not the Senator's lack of comprehension, but my poor words.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was about to say it must be my fault rather than the fault of the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I had well-defined intentions when venturing to illustrate the difficulty of expressing thought with perfect accuracy; but see how impossible it is for us to make ourselves understood.

Mr. ROBINSON. If there be any force in the suggestion which the Senator from California makes, it is that such are the limitations of human wisdom and language that nations entering into treaties can never write an agreement which accurately expresses the meaning and intention of all of us.

Does the Senator think that if the four powers writing this treaty had intended that there should be no obligation or liability upon the nations signing it except to hold a conference and talk over the subject of dispute coming within the jurisdiction of the conference it would have been a physical impossibility, considering the limitations on human wisdom, to have said so in such language that even a United States Senator could not have placed two constructions upon it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That may be so. If I have any regret now, it is that the Senator who propounds that question was not chosen by the President to serve us in that capacity.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for a brief reply to that——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It needs no reply.

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to suggest to him that, under the Constitution of the United States, the function of negotiating a treaty is entirely separate from that of advising and consenting to its ratification. The Constitution does not contemplate that Senators, whose duty it is under that instrument to exercise a function entirely separate from that of the Executive in negotiating a treaty, shall become negotiators of the instrument and thus commit themselves in advance to the manner in which they shall discharge the constitutional function of advising and consenting to its ratification.

I think that the mistake did not occur in omitting the Senator from California and myself as members of the American delegation to the conference, but the mistake did occur when the Executive, in order to secure influence in this body necessary to ratify this treaty, appointed the majority and the minority leaders as delegates to the Washington conference. I think that that Executive function should have been exercised by some one else, so that the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama could have been left entirely free to do just exactly what they did when the Versailles treaty was before the Senate, namely, to exercise their constitutional function of advising and consenting to the ratification of the treaty independent of the bias that must exist when they have assisted in negotiating the treaty.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator from Arkansas has called to my mind a very important discussion which took place over 100 years ago in regard to the functions of the Senate and the President, respectively, in and about the negotiating and the ratifying of treaties. I think Senators will recall that in the early days of this Republic the President invited and cooperated with the Committee on Foreign Relations in and about the negotiation of treaties. I do not quite agree with the Senator from Arkansas as to the true functions of the two departments in respect to the negotiation of treaties. I, of course, see the force of the thought that one who negotiates a treaty should not be called upon to ratify or approve it, but that is an academic question which we can discuss in the cloakroom.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. We will discuss the question here.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With great respect, I contend that it has no bearing upon the present discussion.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it has.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Very well; the Senator from Arkansas may proceed. I will listen to a question, but I am anxious to conclude my remarks.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from California, of course, recognizes that an individual who negotiates an instrument, or is responsible for its negotiation, is, according to every rule of human conduct and practice, bound to its furtherance. The selection of Senators to negotiate treaties invariably confuses the Executive duty to formulate them, in the first instance, and the senatorial duty to pass upon the wisdom of the process and the substance of the negotiation. That, I think, is a subject of considerable importance here.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I grant, Mr. President, that the thoughts of the Senator from Arkansas in respect to that matter are worthy of very respectful consideration, but I am very far from thinking that now is the time for weighing or discussing them.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I will ask the Senator from California whether the question of the Senator from Arkansas does not imply that if some one else had negotiated the treaty which the Senator from Alabama assisted in negotiating, the Senator from Alabama would have opposed the treaty thus negotiated by some one else?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; but it does imply that if some one other than the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama had negotiated the pending treaty when the treaty was submitted to the Senate, instead of having those Senators from the beginning committed to its ratification, they would have been free to do what the Constitution contemplated they should do—review the action of the Executive rather than become advocates for its support and ratification. That is a distinction which my friend from Wisconsin is bound to admit.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. George Washington invited members of the Foreign Relations Committee into conference with him——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And so did Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And so have his successors. However, very seriously, I do not quite agree with the Senator from Arkansas. The Senate is a branch of the treaty-making power.

I see no danger, certainly no impropriety, in having Senators, quite regardless of personality or partisanship, cooperate with the President in the initial steps which are taken in the negotiation of a treaty. On the contrary, recalling what I have read upon that subject and the discussions upon it, I can see much wisdom in such a practice. I do not think it follows that because a Senator cooperated with the President in and about the making of the treaty he would vote for its ratification simply because he took part in its negotiation, although, of course, if he approved it when the treaty came from the hand of the President to the Senate, presumably he would vote for its ratification.

Mr. ROBINSON. But if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Pardon me just a further thought on this point. It might well be that the Senator chosen to assist the President in and about negotiating a treaty might not agree to the treaty as it finally was framed. When the President, who has such power, I take it, has approved it and sent a treaty to the Senate, it might well be that some Senator chosen to assist in negotiating it would appear here in his place and as earnestly as the Senator from Arkansas now opposes this treaty oppose the one which he had a part in negotiating. So I see no danger; but, with all due respect, I see no advancement of the argument of the case before us by this digression.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Reference has been made by my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and his course in connection with this treaty. The Senator from Alabama stated a few days ago that he was in cordial sympathy with the provisions and purposes of an amendment proposed by myself. He said he thought it embraced correct principles, but that for fear some other nation, party to the treaty, would not accept the amendment and might reject the treaty because of it, he was unwilling to write into the treaty principles which he himself recognized as just, fair, and righteous.

The point I am making is that the framers of the Constitution of the United States imposed upon the Executive the obligation to negotiate treaties and upon the Senate the duty to advise and consent to their ratification, and that when the President reaches into the Senate and takes the most influential factors there to assist in negotiating a treaty he deprives the Senate of the unbiased judgment and expression of opinion on the part of those Senators, who, for the time being, have become Executive agents rather than Senators.

What I have said is no reflection upon the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Alabama; but the distinction drawn was one which the founders of this Government thought wise to make, and I respectfully submit that in the illustration I have just used their wisdom was given emphasis.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I do not myself wish to prolong this digression, but I desire to say in reply to the last words of the Senator from Arkansas that some very great Presidents whom we all revere and some very great Senators whose fame lives have proceeded along the lines of the present Executive—that is to say, have called in Senators to advise and assist, to cooperate and join with him in and about the initial steps in the negotiation of treaties. I am not here to say whether or not such action was wise. I think, however, the Senator from Arkansas magnifies the supposed evil or unwisdom of having a Senator chosen to assist in the initial steps leading up to a treaty.

The Constitution of the United States was framed by wise men; the powers conferred upon the Government by the then existing thirteen original independent States are in the Constitution to-day. The Constitution reserves to Congress the power to declare war, and no treaty, no agreement into which we could enter could deprive the Congress of that power. Such an attempt would be a nullity. Nor would this Nation be morally bound to recognize any such attempted deprivation of power given to the Congress by the Constitution.

Moreover, Mr. President, every one of these nations is aware of the existence of our Constitution, and they are held to know our system of government. Thus being held, they can not hereafter charge us with violation of duty if Congress shall assert its unquestioned constitutional power. We must not assume that the signatory powers are steeped in ignorance; they were represented by intelligent delegates; but, whether they are wise or foolish in international affairs, they are held to know the framework of our Government and the powers of Congress under the Constitution, and no Japanese statesman or English statesman or French statesman in the years to come could ever claim that Congress had abdicated its power, if it could, or that the Senate had ratified an instrument which deprived future Congresses of exercising their constitutional power. It follows that no nation in the future can ever charge us with violating our legal obligation or our implied moral obligation, if it shall hereafter be demanded of us, and we refuse to enter into war obedient to any supposed express or implied terms in this treaty. The answer of Congress would be that the power to declare war was a power which the treaty-making power could not impair, and that all parties to this treaty were, as they now are, presumed to know our constitutional form of government. And Congress might further answer and say: The power to determine what we shall do in any particular instance or situation is vested in us by the Constitution, and we can not be justly charged with breach of good faith if or when we decline to declare war.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, the treaty-making power—one of the very greatest powers of the Government, with perhaps less limitations upon it than any other power—is entirely distinct from the power of Congress; and it is true that no authority in this Government, save Congress, can make a declaration of war. Does the Senator say that the treaty-making power can not, within the limitations of its authority, obligate this Government under a defensive or an offensive alliance?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To make war?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It can not.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree with the Senator that Congress has the sole power to declare war.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is exclusive.

Mr. ROBINSON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then it excludes any other body.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Government could enter into a contract, however, through the treaty-making power to make war upon any conditions that it saw fit, could it not? The execution of the contract, which is an entirely different thing from the making of the contract, would, of course, depend, under the Constitution, upon the action which the Congress took or refused to take. But while treaties under the Constitution are defined as part of the law of the land, they are in most instances merely executory contracts; and there is no limitation within my knowledge, under the Constitution or any other instrument, which deprives the treaty-making power of the right to enter into a contract, if it sees fit to do so, to make war or to refrain from making war, notwithstanding the fact that the execution of the contract, the carrying out of it, is dependent, under the Constitution, upon the power of Congress to declare war.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can not agree with the Senator that the treaty-making power, which is made up of the President and the Senate, is broad enough, extensive enough, to deprive Congress of that vital national power to make war, nor can any treaty be so framed as to make it obligatory upon Congress to declare war in order to carry out such a treaty. The right or power to declare war remains there, in the Congress, where the Constitution places it. May I add a word by way of an argument ad hominem? We must stand for the proposition that only Congress can declare war; for, look you, it is conceivable that an unwise President might sit in the chair of Washington. It is conceivable that an unwise Senate might sit in this Chamber.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is conceivable, but hardly probable.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, we are wise in our day and generation. We must never admit—I never shall—that the treaty-making power has the right or power morally or legally to bind this Nation to go to war. I say this because of my reverence for the Constitution, my belief in its wise distribution of powers. We must never pass the sword out of the hand of Congress, which represents all the people. We must never place the sword in the hand of the treaty-making power.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree, and I never have taken any other position, that the power to declare war is vested solely in the Congress of the United States; but I assert, and I am sure the Senator as a lawyer when he reflects upon the declaration will concur in it, that under the treaty-making power the United States, if it chose to do so, could agree with Great Britain to make war upon Japan in case Japan attacked Great Britain, and it could agree with Japan that in the event war arose between Great Britain and Japan it would refrain from engaging in that conflict. I am sure the Senator does not mean to say that merely because the power to declare war is vested exclusively in the Congress of the United States the treaty-making power can not engage in an executory contract with another nation either to make war or to refrain from doing so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let me now put a question to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. With pleasure.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Suppose that the treaty-making power should enter into any such treaty. Does the Senator claim that it would be obligatory on Congress to declare war?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Government would not be legally at war until Congress declared war, and Congress would be at liberty to abrogate the treaty of the United States, just as it has frequently done, by legislation. The Government frequently enters into a contract with respect to import duties. The Congress, by regulating the tariff, may repeal or modify the provisions of that treaty. So that Congress at last is free to exercise its own judgment respecting a declaration of war; but, nevertheless, the treaty-making power can engage in a contract to make war or to refrain from making war.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Such a contract would be utterly null and void, and being so would not be binding.

Mr. ROBINSON. It might not be carried out, like a great many contracts that are made that are not executed. Most of the contracts that governments make in the form of treaties are executory contracts, like the treaty with Colombia for the payment of $25,000,000. The treaty-making power agreed with the Colombian Government that the United States should pay to that Government $25,000,000 upon certain considerations. The Constitution provides that no money shall be paid out of the Treasury except upon an appropriation authorized by Congress; so that while we are under a valid contract to pay Colombia $25,000,000, its execution depends upon legislation by Congress; and that is true in many cases. Most of the treaties we enter into require legislation to carry them out; but the Government can enter into a treaty notwithstanding the fact that Congress must carry it out if it is executed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then let us enter into this treaty and carry it out.

Mr. President, I have heard, I was about to say with amazement, certainly with regret, attacks made here upon nations with which we are at peace.

It must not be forgotten that we are at peace with these signatory nations. It must not be forgotten that we were lately associated with them in a great, tragic war. I do not think it is the time to go over the history of the world, to point out the sins, the follies, the crimes of mankind. The history of the world is wet with blood and tears. It is strewn with broken promises and violated treaties; but, Mr. President, are we to enter into no more treaties because treaties have been broken? Are we to remain at war forever? Of what avail is it to run over the history of the world and point out that this treaty or that treaty was violated? Of course we should study the past for its lessons. There is said to be a certain philosophy of history and that nations may be studied as to future conduct by their past; but I respectfully and very seriously submit to Senators that their language, the language of debate indulged in has been provocative of ill will, of estrangement, of hatred, it might be—perhaps not, but it might be—even of war. The whole United States, the whole world is craving for peace. Because we have had wars with nations, must we never enter into treaties of peace with them? We had, it is true, two wars with England, and at Yorktown yonder the undefeated flag of this Republic floated above the fallen banner of England, and at New Orleans yonder Andrew Jackson, the patriot—God forever rest his intrepid soul—achieved a glorious victory. We had two wars with England—the Revolutionary War and the War of 1812—but we made peace, did we not? And that peace has continued for over a century, has it not?

We had a war with Mexico, and many of us owe our seats in this body, perhaps, to the result of that war. My only regret is that while we were about it we did not acquire a little more of the territory of our southern Republic for our great benefit and for their greater benefit, so that we could control the Colorado River and to-day own Lower California.

We had a war with Mexico, but we made peace with Mexico, did we not? We had a war with Spain in 1898, and a proud hour of my life was when, standing in a Masonic hall in San Francisco, I was privileged to bid Godspeed to the boys of Tennessee who were among the first to cross the Pacific and lift our banner in victory yonder in the Philippines. A war of 100 days was ended by our triumphs at Manila and at Santiago. We made peace with Spain, did we not? Our flag is over yonder now in the Philippines, although there are Senators on this floor who want it hauled down, and some of them who are inveighing against this treaty and betraying concern over the Philippines are on record years ago in favor of immediate withdrawal from those islands. To-day they seem to be very much concerned with our rights in the Philippines. I refer them for the moment to the Jones Act and the preamble to that act, and to the Clarke amendment, which was championed by their learning here in this body. We had war with Spain, but we are at peace with Spain, are we not?

Then we had the great Civil War, that great fratricidal strife. I love to think that from the blue above General Grant and General Lee, reunited in death, look down upon their countrymen reunited for evermore in peace and in war. We made peace, honorable peace, lasting peace, among ourselves and we stand to-day as one people, with one Constitution, with one flag, with one hope, with one love, and standing thus united as one people the world can not excel us in times of peace, nor can it conquer us in time of war.

We have made peace lately with Germany, and let us hope that it will be honored and lasting. I know it will be honored by my country. My country has never violated a treaty. It stands erect, strong, righteous. We are not ashamed of the past. We need not blush to-day. We have made peace with Germany, have we not? We have not striven to crush the fallen foe. We have not striven to oppress or deprive beyond the limit of justice. Why do I say this, a thing so familiar to us all? It is simply to remind Senators that because of wars past, or of broken treaties, we are not to turn away from this proposed treaty of amity and peace.

There is nothing that I could add to convince Senators who have already arrived at fixed conclusions, but the people of this country ought to know the nature of the debate that is in progress, and the real questions of doubt which are being discussed. Wherefore I have trespassed far longer upon the attention of the Senate than I had expected to do.

I, Mr. President, coming from the West, coming from a State with a thousand miles of seacoast, looking out upon the greatest ocean of the earth, we take a peculiarly deep interest in this proposed treaty. The vital immigration problem is ever with us. We are familiar with the Pacific. We have in mind Hawaii, Samoa, Guam, the Philippines, Alaska, and the Aleutian Islands. We vizualize that ocean and our possessions. We would have our possessions safeguarded; we would have that ocean the highway for a great and peaceful commerce.

Mr. President, this treaty does not hamper this Nation in dealing with future problems. It does not commit this Nation to armed force, offensive or defensive. It secures recognition of important international law principles. It is a solemn engagement to respect the rights of the parties to it. It makes for peace on earth. It has not in it the seeds of war or the cause of war. It is not a holy or an unholy alliance in that offensive sense. It is not charged with any danger to this country. It will not cause one son of California or Georgia or Alabama to be torn from his mother's heart to fight the battles of the world.

I do believe that every father in America, if he grasped this question correctly, that every mother in America, if she understood it, would call upon us to ratify the work of our great President and our great Senators and those other great Americans who wrought for you and for me and for them.

We have had enough of war, of bloodshed, and of destruction, I do not lose faith in the cause of peace. Humanity has struggled up from darkness and bondage into light and freedom. His path may be wet with his tears and blood, but man stands higher and freer to-day than ever before. I believe mankind has advanced and is advancing. The sword is in our scabbard now. I would keep it there. The sword is in the scabbard of every one of these four signatory nations. I would keep it there. In pleading to-day for ratification of this treaty I believe I am pleading the cause of peace on earth, for peace with honor, for peace with safety, for peace and for the progress and prosperity and happiness of my country.

This treaty was negotiated and signed by great Americans, and I ask and urge that their words and their acts be ratified and approved.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I understand we are now proceeding under the rule limiting debate. I have committed to writing the thoughts I expect to submit, and in view of the brief time allotted to Senators from this time on, I ask to be permitted to proceed without interruption. I make this request especially because there are other Senators who desire to follow me. If, after I shall have concluded, it is the desire of Senators to submit questions to me I shall answer them to the best of my ability.

My purpose is to support the four-power pact. I would prefer that it be ratified without any reservation whatsoever. My belief is that most of the Senators on the Republican side of the Chamber and a few Senators on the Democratic side have concluded to vote for the reservation offered by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut. I am opposed to it, but before discussing this reservation let us briefly consider the four-power pact as well as the other treaties in the form in which they have been presented to the Senate.

The Borah resolution calling for the naval disarmament conference was bitterly opposed by the majority on the Republican side of this Chamber. Temporarily, Members who favored the biggest Navy in the world won their fight, but the victory was only temporary. They could not stem the tide of public opinion. The American people—aye, the people of the world—are heartily tired of competition and the expense in building and maintaining engines of war, and finally the Borah resolution won.

Then the President called for the conference, but it was not limited to the three great naval powers—the United States, Great Britain, and Japan. Other powers were invited. The invitation was apparently limited to those who were more immediately concerned in the agenda which the President and the Secretary of State had in mind.

I am not concerned to-day about the wisdom or the unwisdom of inviting these additional powers.

I am not concerned in this discussion about the subjects which might have been considered in addition to those which were considered.

I am not greatly concerned as to who was the real draftsman of this treaty or that treaty, or any particular section of any treaty.

I am concerned only in what was, in fact, done. The question is, Shall we approve or disapprove? And the country is waiting with bated breath the result.

With few exceptions Senators approve the plan for the limitation of naval armament, the restricted use of submarines, and the abolition of noxious gases in war. For myself, I am in hearty accord with what the conference did in that behalf.

And now, Senators, in view of the fact that the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan have agreed upon a program to cast aside a part of their armor, what is wrong with the proposals that these powers, partly thus disarming themselves, should go a step further and say to one another, "We are going to respect each other's rights in our insular possessions and dominions"? And if a controversy arises among any two or more of them that it shall be submitted to a joint conference for consideration and adjustment, and if a controversy should arise between one of the joint powers and an outsider, that they shall fully and frankly communicate with one another to meet the exigencies?

FOUR-POWER PACT.

The preamble of the four-power pact declares its purpose to be to preserve the general peace and maintain the rights of the signatory powers to insular possessions and dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Is not this a laudable purpose? Are we so wedded to the old order of international relations that we shall refuse to look forward to the settlement of international disputes except by the arbitrament of the sword? Must we forever worship the old methods of war? Are we so enamored of them that they must be permitted to continue? Do not the people of the Nation—aye, the world—indulge the hope that the Senate shall take counsel of experience and attempt to devise some ways and means whereby to reduce to a minimum the chances of war rather than to let international disputes go adrift as heretofore? Must we continue in the despairing belief that the only way to defend ourselves is to prepare and to continue our competition in the building of mighty machines of war, both on land and sea? If it be said that there is risk to run in entering a compact such as is now before us, my answer is that the risk certainly is no greater than we have heretofore incurred without these agreements or compacts, to say nothing of the enormous expense to which we have been put, and for which we must continue to contract if the old order is to prevail.

Now, what do the four powers agree to do to preserve the general peace and to maintain their rights in their insular possessions and dominions? Do they agree to equip or furnish armies or navies to preserve the peace or maintain these rights? The treaty does not so say. Do they agree to resort to force for this purpose? The treaty does not so say. Is it an alliance of offense or defense in the ordinary acceptation of that term? There is nothing in the treaty that justifies that conclusion.

What is the plan proposed to thus preserve the general peace and maintain these rights? It is this: They enter into a solemn compact among themselves to respect their several rights in relation to their insular possessions and dominions. Every other stipulation is ancillary to this one single thought.

The learned Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] suggests that this provision is nothing more than a statement of the rights of nations as defined by international law, and I assume he means that without this treaty there is the implied duty of each nation to respect the rights of other nations.

On the other hand, the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] takes the position, if I understand him correctly, that under the general principles of international law no Government is required to respect the rights of other Governments. I can not agree with this view. I think the Senator from Montana is correct in his statement that it is the implied duty of each nation to respect the rights of other nations. But the pending treaty is more than an implied obligation. It expresses in exact and unequivocal language this implied duty. It is more. It is a promise on the part of each nation that it will perform its duty toward the other nations.

Wheaton in his work on International Law says (p. 24):

> International law as understood among civilized nations may be defined as consisting of those rules of conduct which reason deduces, as consonant to justice, from the nature of society existing among independent nations, with such definitions and modifications as may be established by general consent.

So we have here in this four-power pact more than an expression of the principle of international law. We have the solemn pledge that each nation will respect one another's rights, or if you please the rights as defined by international law. Our system of international law is found in textbooks of authority—the approved usages of nations; the general opinions respecting their mutual conduct; the fundamental principles of natural justice; to say nothing of various treaties of peace and alliance and commerce regulating international rights and obligations. The principles of international law are not unlike the principles of the common law of England and of this country.

The admission, however, of this fact does not avoid either the necessity or the wisdom of written compacts more clearly to declare or define or modify the law of nations. It might as well be argued that there is no need of a statutory law because the common law may equally protect when once it is understood. Surely no objection can be raised to a solemn compact to respect these rights. What, then, is the next step?

The treaty provides that if a controversy should arise involving the rights of the signatory powers in these insular possessions or dominions which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, then the disputants agree that they will invite their associates to a joint conference to which "the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment."

Does any Senator seriously think that when the four powers agree to submit a dispute between any two of them to a joint conference for consideration and adjustment that this means an obligation to resort to war or to force? Certainly neither war nor force was in the contemplation of the draftsmen of the treaty. On the contrary, the very phraseology of the treaty indicates clearly to my mind that the purpose was to avoid war and force and to settle the matter amicably about the conference table. When the four powers thus meet for consideration and adjustment, if an amicable settlement is not effected then the only alternative is no settlement. And if there is no settlement as the result of the conference the parties to the dispute will be no worse off than they would have been had there been no pact or no conference. Permit me to say with all due respect that they who see war or the use of force under this pact are not giving to this language the usual meaning which is required by every canon of construction that is known to the law. It is a strained construction they are giving to it.

Let me see if I can make my position a little clearer. When we speak of nations sometimes we become confused. Let us narrow for the moment the scope of our inquiry. Let us substitute for the four nations four farmers entering into a solemn, neighborly compact whereby they agree to respect each other's rights in their farms, and then provide that if a dispute should arise between any two of them the four shall be invited to sit around a conference table and refer the whole subject in dispute to the four for consideration and adjustment. Does anyone seriously believe that such a compact would endanger the peace of the community or that it might result in the use of bowie knives and revolvers? To assert that it would is just as logical as the suggestion that has been made on the floor of the Senate that this pact will lead to war. If that be the conclusion to which our brethren are driven, I shall be very wary hereafter about sitting down with other Senators at the council table in order to adjust our differences over pending legislation.

Let us notice article 2 of the treaty. In substance it provides that if the rights of any of the signatory powers in relation to their insular possessions or dominions in the region of the Pacific are threatened by the aggressive action of any outside power they agree to communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken jointly or separately to meet the exigencies of the particular situation. In controversies between outside parties and parties to this treaty I see no agreement to use force or to go to war or even to furnish the sinews of war. I see in the pact only what its language clearly imports—the signatory powers agree to communicate fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken to meet the exigencies.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, at that point, applying my question to that language, if they were to consult as to the most efficient means to meet an emergency, the emergency being an armed attack, what would come of that?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I have just this instant been told that the Senator asked not to be interrupted, and I beg his pardon.

Mr. POMERENE. I asked that because my time is so very limited.

They would confer together. I can not anticipate what is going to be done. The party that is attacked, I may say, is not required to await the result of the conference before it defends itself. I touch upon that, I may say, later in my argument.

There is nothing in the language of this pact which justifies the conclusion that any understanding which might be reached by the representatives of the four powers would necessarily bind any of them, and particularly the United States, without the sanction of the constitutional authorities.

If one of the powers was in imminent danger of being attacked, there is nothing in this treaty which will prevent it from taking the same measures for defense that it would without the pact, except that it agrees to "inform fully and frankly" the other powers as to the situation with the view, of course, to come to some understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken to meet the exigencies. There is no reason why this full and frank communication should not take place on the very instant that there is a belief or a thought that aggressive action is threatened. In these days of steam and electricity, of cable and wireless, the threatened aggression could scarcely be begun and become known to the nations threatened until it was communicated to the other powers. I am not willing to say that no good can come out of this full exchange of information and this effort to come to an understanding. My belief is that great good will come out of it. I am not apprehensive of danger.

It is clearly understood that any action by the four powers looking to the consideration and adjustment of any controversy arising between any two of the signatory powers, or any understanding as to any aggressive action by an outside party toward one of the signatory powers, must be by the unanimous vote of the four powers. I think there is no doubt about this. If there is, it can clearly be cared for by a proper reservation in the resolution of ratification.

ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE.

To me a very important and very significant provision of this treaty is that upon the exchange of ratifications the agreement between Great Britain and Japan concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall end. That treaty is, to my mind, clearly an alliance of defense, if not of offense and defense. It contains three provisions which are of particular importance in connection with the discussion of the four-power pact:

(1) If the rights and interests of either are in jeopardy "the two Governments will communicate with one another fully and frankly and will consider in common the measures which should be taken to safeguard those menaced rights or interests."

(2) "If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action, wherever arising, on the part of any power or powers either high contracting party should be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests * * * the other high contracting party will at once go to the assistance of its ally and will conduct the war in common and make peace in mutual agreement with it."

(3) Neither party, without consulting the other, will "enter into separate agreements with another power to the prejudice of the objects described in the preamble."

Whether rightly or wrongly, whether with or without justification, there is a feeling of apprehension on the part of some of our very good people largely traceable to this Anglo-Japanese alliance. It has caused in certain sections of our country a sense of uneasiness toward Japan and of dissatisfaction toward the British Empire. In Great Britain, too, the impression prevails that this alliance stands in the way of a better international understanding between the two great English-speaking powers. In my judgment, it lends something to international amity to have it known that this alliance is to end.

Of course, I understand some Senators believe this four-power pact is an entangling alliance which is fraught with danger and will lead us into war. They and I differ so radically that I do not pretend to attempt to reconcile our differences. I am addressing myself rather to those Senators who heretofore have indicated that they did believe in a League of Nations and that they were not afraid of international associations.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho has with great ability, earnestness, and eloquence pointed out the dangers which have grown out of the Holy Alliance and the alliance of the Central Powers. They were alliances of defense, if not of offense and defense. I know that great wars succeeded, if they did not grow out of, these alliances, but I also know that we got into the greatest war of all history without being in an alliance with any nation. I know, too, if I read history aright, that both the Holy Alliance and the alliance of the Central Powers were formed for selfish purposes only, and that their framers were not prompted by either good faith or good will toward their own peoples or the peoples of the world. And if the able Senator from Idaho, or anyone else, can point out to me that there is an element of bad faith in this treaty or that the parties thereto are not inspired by higher purposes than were the members of the two alliances to which he referred, or that the environment is the same, then his argument will have more weight with me than it now has.

BRANDEGEE RESERVATION.

The distinguished Senator from Connecticut has offered this reservation:

The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

There is no commitment under this treaty "to use armed force" and "no obligation to join in any defense," but if the treaty is not an alliance, what is it? If the phrase "no alliance" is used in the limited sense of an alliance of offense or defense, then I would be content with this part of the reservation, but under the rules of legal construction words must be given their generally accepted meaning, unless a contrary intention appears. Thus construed, can there be any doubt about the proposition that an agreement among the four powers to respect each other's rights in their insular possessions and dominions is an alliance among these nations for that purpose? If so, why should we in the body of the treaty agree to respect these rights, and then by a reservation state that there is no alliance whatsoever? And that is what it will mean if adopted.

This might not be very important, except that under the Anglo-Japanese alliance, in article 2 of that treaty, it is provided:

If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action, wherever arising on the part of any power or powers, either high contracting party should be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests mentioned in the preamble of this agreement, the other high contracting party will at once go to the assistance of its ally, and will conduct the war in common and make peace in mutual agreement with it.

Whatever may be said of the policy of such an agreement between Great Britain and Japan, it is a fixed fact, and it is a treaty of very peculiar value to Japan. Whether rightly or wrongly, a sentiment has prevailed in this country that there is danger to be apprehended on our part from Japan. I think this fear is exaggerated, but it exists. It is a very difficult thing to determine in advance the cause of a war or which party may or may not be the aggressor, and if some difficulty were to arise between the United States and Japan, no matter what its character, who could say with certainty which of the parties was the aggressor? I can not believe we would be, but it would not be for us to decide under the Anglo-Japanese treaty. It would be a question which Great Britain would decide for herself.

This being so, I am very firmly of the opinion that in the conduct of our foreign affairs a treaty of this kind might be the cause of more or less anxiety or uneasiness on our part, as well as of very great security to Japan. So, then, the United States has something to gain and Japan something to lose by the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese pact.

And now, if this treaty is ratified, we are rid of the provisions of the Anglo-Japanese pact and Japan has lost her potential security, and all she gets in return is the four-power pact. True, we agree to respect one another's rights in our insular possessions and dominions, but, as I construe this treaty, there is no agreement to go to war in behalf of Japan or any other of the four powers.

We only agree "to confer together if the controversy is between two powers to the pact for consideration and adjustment," and if the rights of any party to this pact are threatened by any other power they agree to communicate together "as to the most efficient measures to be taken to meet the exigencies." That is all; and no understanding which may be reached in the first case and no measure which may be proposed in the second case would compel the United States to act except with the consent of the Senate or the approval of the Congress of the United States, as the case might be.

I look upon this treaty, if ratified without any reservations, as a plighting of good faith, coupled with the obligation of international law to respect one another's rights in the family of nations, and so, if ratified, I regard it as of very great value in the interest of international peace.

On the other hand, let us look at this subject for one moment from the standpoint of Japan. She now has a defensive alliance with Great Britain in the event she is attacked. She gives it up under this treaty as it was negotiated and presented to the Senate, and now with the Brandegee reservation we destroy much of its virility. I assume that those who support the Brandegee amendment expect Japan to ratify the treaty with the reservation. If after the Senate shall have said, if it does say, that this treaty is no alliance, how can the Government of Japan go to her people and say that they have received anything of substantial value in comparison with that which they have surrendered?

I have nothing in common with Japan save and except as I feel it is my duty as a Senator to act in the spirit of good will and good faith toward every member of the family of nations; but I am looking at it rather from the standpoint of the possibility of what we may expect with reference to the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance in the event that this reservation is adopted. Adopt it, and should we be surprised if Japan should refuse to accept the treaty with the reservation?

I can understand the opposition to ratification of this treaty by those Senators who are opposed to any international alliance or association among the powers of the world, and I have heard their discussions, which were conducted with very great ability and earnestness. I have some very positive convictions upon that subject myself. I can not agree with those Senators, and I am content to let them go their way, as they will permit me to go my way.

But addressing myself for a moment to the Senators who believed in the Versailles treaty, and voted for its ratification in one form or another, I am at a loss to understand how they can justify themselves in voting against the ratification of the present treaty under existing circumstances. If there was a possibility of persuading the President of the United States to return to the Senate the Versailles treaty, and opposition to the ratification of the pending treaties would induce him to do so, then I might believe it wise to continue to oppose ratification, but it is not possible to bring about that course of procedure. It is within the sole power of the Executive to return it to the Senate, and he has decided not to return it. He alone is clothed with power to negotiate treaties with foreign nations, and exercising his constitutional power he presents this treaty.

Certainly no one who approved of article 10 of the Versailles treaty in any of the forms in which it was proposed to ratify it can object either to article 1 or article 2 of the pending treaty. Articles 1 and 2 of the pending treaty are but a pocket edition of article 10 of the Versailles treaty.

Under article 10 the members of the league undertook "to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league," and in case of such aggression or any threat or danger of such aggression the council was required to "advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled."

Like it, under article 1 of the four-power pact, the parties agree "to respect their rights" in relation to the insular possessions and dominions, and instead of it being the duty of the council under the Versailles treaty to advise as to what means should be adopted in case of aggression or threat or danger of aggression, each party agrees to invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference for consideration and adjustment. Or if an attack is made by some other power, then they agree to inform one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient means to be adopted to meet the exigencies. The differences between the two treaties, so far as these particular provisions are concerned, are differences largely of phraseology.

I recognize the fact that what I have just said will be considered by those who were opposed to the ratification of the Versailles treaty to be an argument against the ratification of the pending treaty. They may take that view if they will, but it is my reason for voting to ratify this treaty and I prefer to vote for it as it came to the Senate from the President, except to add the reservation which I have proposed and which lies on the table:

It is, however, understood that any adjustment provided for under article 1 hereof, and any understanding contemplated under article 2 in order to be binding upon the United States shall be ratified and executed in accordance with the constitutional methods of the United States.

I do not think this reservation is necessary, but it may help to clear the way for those who have doubts to support it, and it is plainly stating to other peoples who may not understand our constitutional form of government just what our position is.

ENTANGLING ALLIANCES.

The opponents of the League of Nations as well as the opponents of the pending four-power pact are constantly quoting George Washington's advice in his Farewell Address "to steer clear of permanent alliances with any power of the foreign world." But they overlook the very material qualification of this language which immediately follows. I quote: "So far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it."

This advice to steer clear of permanent alliances must be construed in connection with the context. This advice was based upon a recital of conditions as they then existed.

It follows his declaration that "Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation." And then he continues: "Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concern."

Again, he adds: "Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course."

Without attempting to quote all that he says in this behalf, he adds: "When belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interests, guided by justice, shall counsel."

His advice against permanent alliances is based upon the situation in Europe as he then saw it, and to which I have just called attention. I think when he was advising us to steer clear of permanent alliances with foreign powers he had in mind alliances of offense and defense, not agreements to respect one another's rights or agreements to sit down at the council table to talk the subject over in the event that these rights were infringed.

How different are world conditions now and our relations to them! Then we were a small Nation of 13 Colonies and 3,000,000 people scattered along the Atlantic coast. Now we are 48 empire States with 110,000,000 of people; the greatest industrial and commercial Nation of the world, with a foreign commerce aggregating, in 1920, $13,506,497,797, and extending to the four corners of the earth.

Since Washington's day science has annihilated distance. The stranger nations of yesterday are the neighbors of to-day. Nor can we describe our location in the world as "detached" or as a "distant situation." Washington in the greatest flights of his imagination never dreamed of the steamboat and the locomotive; of the telegraph, the telephone, or the wireless; of the submarine or the airship; or the many countless engines of peace and war with which every schoolboy of to-day is familiar.

To use his own words, he thought of "belligerent nations under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us," and, of course, in his judgment, at that time they would not "likely hazard the giving us provocation." But I think we ought to give George Washington credit for taking counsel of facts as he saw them in his day. He did not then know that our country was to extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific or of our island possessions in the Far East.

Can anyone seriously think of George Washington under present changed conditions advising against treaties with the nations of the world agreeing to respect each other's rights in their insular possessions and dominions? Can anyone think of George Washington saying that it would be a dangerous alliance if we were to agree in advance with other nations to sit around a council table for the purpose of considering and adjusting controversies which might arise between them? As well might we think of George Washington in the place of General Pershing at the head of our armies solemnly advising the American people to do away with their modern guns and implements of war and substitute therefor the old flintlock of Revolutionary days.

Again, those who would quote George Washington as an authority against this treaty overlook this paragraph of his Farewell Address:

> Taking care always to keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Are we not confronted by an "extraordinary emergency" now? Have not some of the Senators who are opposed to this treaty been constantly warning the country against the dangers in the Pacific from Japan? Have they not told us that the Philippine Islands are in jeopardy? And have we not been warned of the menace to our security arising out of the Anglo-Japanese alliance? Are we not now so burdened with a national debt growing out of the World War that our people are fairly groaning under the burdens of taxation? If they are sincere in their belief that we may be attacked by Japan in the near future, can they not see that the situation at least approaches the "extraordinary emergency" to which the Father of his Country referred when he said that we might safely trust to "temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies"?

And now, when we look at the four-power pact, we find, if it is an alliance, is it not in the language of Washington "a temporary alliance"? By the third article of the treaty it is only to continue for a period of 10 years. Does anyone seriously think more danger may arise to this country by agreeing upon a program with Japan, Great Britain, and France for a period of only 10 years to respect one another's rights in our insular possessions and dominions than there will be if we do not make the agreement?

COMPANION TREATIES MUST BE KEPT IN MIND.

Possibly it would have been better if the scope of the four-power pact had been broadened so as to include a final disposition of the Manchuria problem, or even to go further and arrange a settlement of the questions which may hereafter arise between Russia and Japan in Siberia. Thus far we have not seen fit to recognize the Soviet Government of Russia, and it is difficult to understand how, under these circumstances, Russia could have been invited to the conference.

Of course, the four-power pact must to a very great extent either stand or fall upon its own merits, but it is difficult to give proper weight either to its purpose or to its effect without keeping in mind the companion treaties growing out of this same conference.

Let me, therefore, speak briefly of them:

FIRST: THE NINE-POWER TREATY RELATING TO PRINCIPLES AND POLICIES CONCERNING CHINA.

The purpose of the so-called nine-power treaty is to preserve the integrity of China and to prevent further encroachment upon her autonomy. It is not necessary to discuss the aggressions of foreign nations against China during the last generation. We know how that country was victimized by the great powers of the world. Conditions are such that unless the nations which have great interests in the Far East restrain their advances in China, a situation may arise which would threaten the peace of the world. This will be conceded by students of past and present current events. I regret that the treaty has not gone further in its relief to China; but much has been restored to her, and she has gratefully approved what has thus far been accomplished.

To me it is a matter of congratulation that the United States of America, Belgium, the British Empire, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal joined in a treaty looking to the preservation of the Republic of China. This treaty is now on the Senate calendar. Under it the signatory powers agree:

(1) To respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China.

(2) To provide the fullest and the most unembarrassed opportunity to China to maintain and develop for herself an effective and stable government.

(3) To use their influence for the purpose of effectually establishing and maintaining the principles of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations throughout the territory of China.

(4) To refrain from taking advantage of conditions in China in order to seek special rights or privileges which would abridge the rights of citizens or subjects of friendly States, and from countenancing action inimical to the security of such States.

As an incident looking to the carrying out of these high purposes the contracting powers pledge themselves not to enter into any treaty, agreement, arrangement, or understanding, either with one another or with any power or powers, which would infringe or impair the purposes thus declared.

The open-door policy is reaffirmed, and they agree neither to seek nor support their nationals—

(1) In any arrangement which might even purport to establish in favor of their interests any general superiority of rights with respect to commercial or economic development in any designated region of China.

(2) They have solemnly pledged themselves neither to seek nor to support any monopoly or preference for their nationals which would deprive the nationals of any other power of the right of undertaking any legitimate trade or industry in China, or of participating with the Chinese Government or with any local authority in any category of public enterprise which is calculated to frustrate the principles of the open door or of equal opportunity.

And China undertakes to be guided by these principles.

There are other very important stipulations in this treaty, but they are incidental to and confirmatory of the general principles to which I have referred.

SECOND: TREATY RELATING TO CHINESE CUSTOMS TARIFFS.

Without attempting to discuss China's financial condition, it will be sufficient for my purposes to say that China finds herself in need of more funds; that during the past century she entered into many treaties with foreign nations, including the United States, whereby her customs duties both on imports and exports were limited to 5 per cent ad valorem. Under these treaties practices have grown up which have reduced these duties materially below 5 per cent ad valorem.

The purpose of the treaty with China pending before the Senate is to revise these duties for the purpose of making them equivalent to an effective per cent ad valorem, in accordance with the treaties heretofore concluded. China becomes the beneficiary thereby, because it will increase her revenues. The other signatory powers and their nationals will also benefit, because the equalization of rates will place all of them on an equal footing.

Certainly the Senate can have no objection to this treaty unless it is the purely technical one that we are interfering with the domestic affairs of a sovereign State. The justification for this course is based wholly upon China's present domestic condition. She is not able to act legislatively for herself. China can not make this revision without the assistance of the other signatory powers. We can only hope that her internal conditions will be so improved at an early date that it will not be necessary for outside nations to interfere either in fixing or maintaining by treaty duties which should be fixed only by legislation.

THIRD: LIMITATION OF NAVAL ARMAMENT.

Competition in naval armament has become an unwarranted extravagance, unduly burdening the peoples of the nations thus indulging themselves, adding nothing to the security of the world, but, on the contrary, endangering its peace.

I do not know that anyone can seriously object to this treaty, excepting only those who had an ambition to see the United States possessed of the first navy in the world. Those who are prompted by this spirit seem not to consider the cost. In so far as I know, they have given no indication as to what they would do with the fleet if they had control of it. Some of them, perhaps, have been as little concerned about its use as they have been about its expense. To-day this class of minds is in a negligible minority. For a time this sentiment in the Senate was hastening us on to unlimited expense and extravagance until the Members of Congress began to hear the voice of the people back home and throughout the world, and now with almost universal acclaim the American people—aye, the people of the world—approve the treaty placing a limitation upon armaments signed by the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

The capital ships are limited as follows, subject only to the approval of the treaty-making powers:

	Tons.
The United States tonnage to	525,050
Great Britain to	580,450
France to	221,170
Italy to	182,800
Japan to	301,320

But under the plan of replacement the maximum tonnage limitations are as follows:

	Tons.
The United States tonnage to	525,000
Great Britain to	525,000
France to	175,000
Italy to	175,000
Japan to	315,000

I have no doubt that many Senators and Congressmen who were carried away by their own enthusiasm and eloquence while they were pleading for the greatest navy in the world now regret their speeches in that behalf. Few, if any, of them will vote against this agreement for limitation of naval armament.

FOURTH: TREATY RELATING TO SUBMARINES AND NOXIOUS GASES.

This treaty declares as a part of the international law the following principles:

(1) A merchant vessel must be ordered to submit to visit and search to determine its character before it can be seized. It must not be attacked unless it refuses to submit to visit and search after warning, or to proceed as directed after seizure. It must not be destroyed unless the crew and passengers have been first placed in safety.

(2) Belligerent submarines are not under any circumstances exempt from the universal rules thus stated, and if a submarine can not capture a merchant vessel in conformity with these rules the existing law of nations requires it to desist from attack and seizure and permit the merchant vessel to proceed unmolested.

All other nations have assented to these principles. The signatory powers declare that any person who violates any of these rules, whether under the orders of a governmental superior or not, shall be liable to trial and punishment as if for act of piracy.

Again, in the interest of humanity the use of asphyxiating, poisonous, or other gases, and all analogous liquids, materials, or devices are justly condemned and their use prohibited.

I am sure the Senate will not refuse to approve this treaty.

FIFTH: TREATY WITH JAPAN CONCERNING THE ISLAND OF YAP.

Long prior to the presentation to the Senate of the Versailles treaty a controversy arose between the United States and Japan as to what, if any, rights our Government should have in maintaining a cable and wireless station on the island of Yap. Japan insisted that our commissioners at Paris had surrendered this right, if any we had. President Wilson contended with all vigor that this question was referred for future conversation, and that he had not surrendered our claims therein; and President Wilson was right. However, Japan refused to yield, and our right to maintain a cable and wireless station has been the subject of controversy until it was adjusted by the ratification a few days ago of our treaty with Japan bearing upon this subject.

Our right there now is an accomplished fact, and it settles a very important subject of dispute. Japan has a mandate over the German islands lying north of the Equator, including Yap. Maybe they ought not to have this mandate, but it is too late for those who opposed the ratification of the Versailles treaty to complain now because they have it.

TREATY BETWEEN JAPAN AND CHINA RELATING TO SHANTUNG.

And may I say a word about Shantung? When the Versailles treaty was before the Senate days were consumed in denouncing the treaty because it permitted Japan to receive from Germany all her rights, titles, and privileges in the Province of Shantung. It was one of the most vulnerable points in that treaty. The American people thought it was wrong to allow Japan to retain this interest in China. Of no avail was it that President Wilson and others said that Japan had promised within a reasonable time to transfer substantially all of these rights back to China.

Now it transpires that Japan was wrongfully accused; and that she has kept faith with China and the other nations that sat around the council table in Paris. Certainly this treaty has put an end to any cause of contention between China and Japan, and has reassured the nations of the world that Japan kept her faith.

As the result, therefore, of the International Conference for the Limitation of Armament, we have, in addition to the four-power pact, obligating the signatory powers to respect their rights in their insular possessions and dominions:

First, a treaty limiting naval armament.

Second, the limitation of the use of submarines, and the prohibition of noxious gases in warfare.

Third, the treaty of the nine powers relating to the principles and policies to be followed in China.

Fourth, the treaty between the same nine powers increasing the Chinese customs tariffs.

Fifth, the cession to the United States of the right to build and maintain a cable and wireless station in Yap.

Sixth, the return of Shantung to China.

Certainly, these will prove of great benefit to the whole world and will minimize the possibilities of war.

I regret that the President and his commissioners were not able to go further, but I recognize that they represented only one nation at the council table, and I can conceive some of the difficulties which confronted them. If I thought for one moment that any one of the pending treaties would in the least jeopardize the interests of our country, I would not vote for it; but we must deal with nations as we deal with men, and God help the world if we have so little faith in the other members of the family of nations that we refuse to treat with them or to make an agreement with respect to the meeting for conference when international relations are in dispute. The wings of my imagination are not yet strong enough to take me to the dizzy heights where I may think that I see a chance of war simply because I agree to respect the rights of other nations and to meet them for discussion and adjustment in the event that misunderstandings arise.

The Versailles treaty was submitted to the Senate by President Wilson on the 10th day of July, 1919. My very deep regret is that we did not ratify it. If it had been ratified with reasonable promptness I think we would have been at least two years further on our way to normalcy. I preferred that it be ratified without any reservations whatever, though there were a number of its provisions which I did not like. I felt then as I feel now that it was an attempt to bring the nations of the world into accord. The United States had stepped into leadership among the nations. The other peoples of the world had more confidence in the United States than in any other Government. In any event, we could have stepped out of the league within two years by serving the notice provided for in the covenant of the league. If there were any provisions in it which we did not approve, I have never had a doubt that any reasonable amendments which the United States might have proposed to the covenant would have been promptly accepted by the other members of the league. If they would not have accepted them we could have served our notice and withdrawn. But the Senate refused to ratify the Versailles treaty.

We are told that at the November election in 1920 the League of Nations was overwhelmingly condemned. I do not propose to enter into any lengthy discussion of that assertion. If that election was a condemnation of the Democrats who favored the league, it will be difficult for those same gentlemen to say it was not an approval of the position taken by the Republican President, Mr. Harding. True, he and his political associates condemned the league, but they favored an association of all the nations of the world.

The Republican platform declared, "The Republican Party stands for agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world. We believe that such an international association must be based on international justice." I think from this language the conclusion is fairly deducible that the Republicans wanted an agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world, and that they stood for an international association.

President Harding in his speech at Marion August 28, 1920, declared he favored "a society of free nations, or an association of free nations, or a league of free nations, animated by considerations of right and justice instead of might and self-interest; and not merely proclaimed as an agency in pursuit of peace, but so organized and so participated in as to make the actual attainment of peace a reasonable possibility." And then he added: "Such an association I favor with all my heart, and I would make no fine distinction as to whom credit is due."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair; at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.). The time of the Senator from Ohio on the treaty has expired. There is an amendment pending, and the Senator is at liberty to use 30 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Presiding Officer. I desire now to occupy a few minutes in speaking upon the amendment.

MR. HUGHES'S POSITION IN 1920.

On October 15, 1920, Mr. Hughes, now our Secretary of State, with other distinguished leaders of his party, in an address to the voters of the United States with reference to the Versailles treaty, defined the issue between the Democratic and the Republican Party thus:

The question accordingly is not between a league and no league, but is whether certain provisions in the proposed league agreement shall be accepted unchanged or shall be changed. * * *

He also added:

The conditions of Europe make it essential that the stabilizing effect of the treaty made between the European powers shall not be lost by them, and that the necessary changes be made by changing the terms of the treaty rather than by beginning entirely anew.

MR. LODGE'S POSITION.

But, again, where stood the distinguished leader of the majority on the subject of a league of nations? Did we not have a right to expect, notwithstanding his opposition to the treaty of Versailles, that he would take the lead in his present responsible position as majority leader of the Senate and as one of the leaders of his party for many years in the organization of another league of nations or an association of nations? Let me refer to a few of his utterances upon this subject.

In the report which he submitted on August 15, 1911, on the general arbitration treaties with Great Britain and France, he said:

> The history of the United States for more than 70 years exhibits a record of arbitration treaties unequaled by that of any other nation on earth. Every one of those treaties has received the cordial assent of the United States.

At Union College, on June 9, 1915, he said:

> We must bear constantly in mind that from the conflict which now convulses the world there may possibly come events which will force us to fight with all our strength to preserve our freedom, our democracy, and our national life. * * *
>
> What can we do in a larger sense toward securing and maintaining the peace of the world?
>
> This is a much more difficult question; but turn it back and forth as we may, there is no escape from the proposition that the peace of the world can only be maintained, as the peace and order of a single community are maintained, as the peace of a single nation is maintained, by the force which united nations are willing to put behind the peace and order of the world.
> Nations must unite as men unite to preserve peace and order. The great nations must be so united as to be able to say to any single country, "You must not go to war." And they can only say that effectively when the country desiring war knows the force that the nations place behind peace is irresistible
> In differences between nations which go beyond the limited range of arbitrable questions peace can only be maintained by putting behind it the force of united nations determined to uphold it and to prevent war. No one is more conscious than I of the enormous difficulties which beset such a solution or such a scheme, but I am certain that it is in this direction alone that we can find hope for the maintenance of the world's peace and the avoidance of needless wars. Even if we could establish such a union of nations, there might be some wars which could not be avoided, but there are certainly many which might be prevented. * * * It may seem Utopian at this moment to suggest a union of civilized nations in order to put a controlling force behind the maintenance of peace and international order, but it is through the aspiration for perfection, through the search for Utopias, that the real advances have been made.

In an address before the annual convention of the League to Enforce Peace, May 26, 1916, in Washington, D. C., he said:

> The league certainly has the highest of all aims for the benefit of humanity, and because the pathway is sown with difficulties is no reason why we should turn from it. It is the vision of a perhaps impossible perfection that has led humanity across the centuries.
> The limit of voluntary arbitration has, I think, been reached. * * * I think the next step is that which this league proposes, and that is to put force behind international peace. We may not solve it in that way, but if we can not solve it in that way it can be solved in no other.

Keeping in mind, therefore, the declaration of the Republican platform for an "agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world," the pledge of the President himself—and I quote his words—in favor of a "society of free nations or an association of free nations or a league of free nations"; the speeches of the distinguished leader of the majority side of the Senate [Mr. LODGE] in favor of a "league to enforce peace"; and the address of our distinguished Secretary of State, declaring that the question for the voters to determine was not "between a league and no league," but whether "certain provisions in the proposed league agreement shall be accepted unchanged or shall be changed," the American people, and particularly the Republican Party, have a right to feel disappointed because more has not been accomplished in that behalf. They have been looking forward eagerly for the presentation of the President's plan, as defined in his speech of August 28, 1920, for the "society of free nations or an association of free nations or a league of free nations."

Surely the Republican Party can not claim that the people of the United States by their ballots in November, 1920, condemned the President's plan for "a society of free nations or an association of free nations or a league of free nations." They approved it by a majority of nearly 7,000,000.

Speaking for myself, I was disappointed when the Versailles treaty was not ratified, and I was disappointed a second time when President Harding did not present a complete plan for our consideration. Under these circumstances what course should I pursue as a Senator of the United States?

I know of no way to persuade the President to resubmit the Versailles treaty to the Senate for its advice and consent.

I know of no way to induce him to present a plan for a society of free nations or an association of free nations or a league of free nations.

I know of no way to influence our honored Secretary of State to present to the Senate the changes in the League of Nations which he had in mind and to which he referred in his address submitted to the voters of the United States on October 15, 1920, by himself and other distinguished party leaders. And he can not do it unless the President shall send back to the Senate the Versailles treaty for further consideration.

I must vote for these treaties here either with or without reservations or vote against them. I am not in a position to demand what I would like. I can only deal with the treaties as they are. I must either approve them in whole or in part or I must condemn them.

I would not be willing to enter into an alliance, offensive or defensive, which would compel this Nation to enter into the activities of war without the consent of the Senate of the United States, or the Congress, as the case might be.

The pending four-power treaty does nothing of that kind. It is not an alliance either offensive or defensive. It is an alliance binding the four powers to respect each other's rights in their insular possessions and dominions, and binds the signatory powers to submit to a joint conference of the four powers any controversy that may arise with respect to these rights for consideration and adjustment; and in case aggressive action is threatened by an outside party, to communicate fully and frankly with one another in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken to meet the exigency.

Why should this language be so strained in its construction as to leave the impression that it is an obligation to go to war? To assert it would be laughable if it were not said so seriously.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to repeat the advantages as I see them which will accrue to the United States and to the world if these treaties are ratified. I have already given them. Suffice it to say these treaties are a step forward, in my judgment, in the adjustment of international controversies by peaceful means rather than to let them drift into armed conflicts.

Feeling as I do, I shall vote for their ratification. To do otherwise would be to prove false to my convictions and false to what I conceive to be the well-defined sentiment of the country.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Michigan to yield to me for a moment that I may make a request.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I have been asked by Senators on the other side of the Chamber that there may be an evening session, because there are speeches which they desire to have made. I am very glad to comply with the request.

I ask that at the close of the speech of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] there shall be a short executive session with closed doors, and that at the close of that executive session the Senate shall take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night; that it be understood that there will be neither the call of a quorum nor any voting——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At the night session?

Mr. LODGE. No voting and no call for a quorum during the evening session; and that at the close of the evening session the Senate shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Massachusetts. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. As in legislative session, the Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SLEMP, Mr. MADDEN, and Mr. SISSON were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9633) to extend the provisions of section 2305, Revised Statutes, and of the act of September 29, 1919, to those discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and subsequently awarded compensation or treated for wounds received or disability incurred in line of duty; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SINNOTT, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, and Mr. RAKER were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 20) for the appointment of a committee of Senators and Representatives to represent Congress at the ceremonies attending the arrival of the last of the bodies of American soldiers from the battle fields of the World War.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House, in compliance with Senate concurrent resolution 20, had designated Mr. CRAGO, Mr. ARENTZ, Mr. FISH, Mr. MCSWAIN, and Mr. RANKIN members of the committee on the part of the House to represent Congress at the ceremonies attending the arrival of the last of the bodies of American soldiers from the battle fields of the World War.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were subsequently signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 7881. An act to authorize the Governor of the Territory of Hawaii to ratify the agreements of certain persons made with the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii, and to issue land patents to those eligible under the terms of said agreements; and

H. R. 10559. An act making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, consent to the conference requested by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. STERLING, Mr. MOSES, Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, and Mr. BROUSSARD conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer than a few moments in order that I may have an opportunity to express my views very briefly on the controversy now before the Senate.

The debate on the result of the recent Washington conference has covered a large field, and everything which minds of Senators trained not only in legal controversy but in all the arts of the special pleader could devise has been brought before the Senate. The discussion has at no time nor on a single occasion reached the high character of that disclosed when the Versailles treaty was before the Senate. It is true that appeals have been made to love of country, and much of what was said on the former occasion against foreign entanglements has been repeated during this debate. This treaty includes no possibilities for such entanglements.

It seems clear to me that the pending treaty does not in any way bind the United States to the use of force. It is admitted by all that force could not be employed by our Government in the Pacific or elsewhere without the direct action of Congress. The senior Senator from Nevada in his speech a few days ago in the Senate made a statement to which I call your attention. He said that any war in the Pacific would involve the United States, whether this treaty was ratified or not. I think this statement is probably correct, and it answers much of the opposition to this treaty. If the United States will be involved anyway, is it not the part of wisdom for our country to have an understanding with the countries one of which will be involved in any war, if there shall be a war—an understanding to consult with a view to preventing war? The very fact that the four leading nations are to consult will of itself be a great war deterrent.

The opposition to this treaty has become desperate. Not only are the nations who met here at our Government's invitation and who came practically as our guests abused, their motives impugned, their intellectual honesty denied, but the distinguished members of the American commission are in substance condemned either as incompetents or knaves. Their word of honor is sought to be impeached by the statements of men whom the Senators offering them as exhibits afterwards impeach as witnesses unworthy of belief.

I hope the nations who visited us and participated in good faith in a great effort to prevent war and reduce tax burdens through better understanding will know that the few Senators who speak in derogation of them do not speak either for the great majority of the Senate or the American people. It is among the bare possibilities that one more than one-third of this Senate may defeat this treaty, but, sir, that will not disprove the great fact that the large majority believe that the Washington conference was attended by honest, honorable men of great ability and undoubted high character.

If this treaty is defeated by the arguments presented, the world may lose faith in our country. It may hesitate long to enter another conference either called or participated in by the United States, but the humiliation will be ours. This conference was called by our President, not in fear of any nation, not for self-aggrandizement, but for the good of a world blood drenched by war, burdened by the crushing weight of taxation caused by war—called for the purpose of doing every honorable thing to prevent another war and to agree, if possible, upon some plan to lighten those burdens, or at least to prevent their increase.

The treaties before the Senate represent the greatest advancement in civilization that has been experienced in a half century. The leaders in this consummation were great patriotic Americans. They knew and respected our country's sacred traditions. They were wisely informed in foreign affairs. And at least until in desperation a few Senators impugned their motives, they were honorable and honest beyond suspicion even. They prepared the program for the conference, which considered it honestly and directly. Great and complicated questions were involved. The delegate nations were of different traditions and ideals, but all were brought together at the invitation of the one great unselfish Nation to discuss American ideals, and when they left they took with them a better understanding, a wider, better vision of international relations. Some of the delegates at the conference came with bitterness in their hearts toward each other. After weeks of association in the American atmosphere which pervaded the conference they departed at least partially realizing that peace, progress, and prosperity can be better secured and maintained through friendship and honest dealings than through injustice, enmity, and hatred.

That an understanding was reached on this treaty there can be no doubt. That such understanding was what the American commission says it was and what the unequivocal language of the treaty says it was is equally certain.

But some Senators say that it in some way, adroitly hidden, infers at least the moral obligation to resort to war in case deliberation does not peacefully settle the controversy. I am sure that it does not. But again referring to at least one speech which has been made against the treaty, stating that we would be obliged to enter such a war regardless of the treaty, then why not make an agreement which will enable us to prevent such war, if possible?

Senators seem to doubt the wisdom and patriotism of future Congresses. Some of these Senators are wise and distinguished, and I say this sincerely and without tinge of sarcasm. But is it impertinent to suggest that equally wise men will come after them, and inasmuch as no war can be declared or prosecuted without the action of Congress, I am ready and willing to believe that a future Congress will act with wisdom and patriotism. I repeat, however, that there is no legal or moral obligation upon the United States to use force under any provision of this treaty.

But we are told that it was considered in secret. Well, I am simple-minded enough to believe that members of any commission must talk together and not in a hired hall filled with people or in the presence of newspaper reporters and stenographers before they can agree upon the terms of any contract. Especially is this true where some of those nations are unfriendly to each other. Does any sane man believe that any agreement on any of the great matters could have been reached without preliminary discussion in chambers? The Supreme Court deliberates behind closed doors. Its decisions are made public, and the decisions are what the people desire to know.

The matter in which the people are interested is the treaty itself. They care little about what scrivener penned it nor how many times it was rewritten. They want to know what it really is. This treaty carries no suspicion upon its face. Its signers without exception deny that there are any secret understandings relating to it. And of what possible use would be a secret understanding, even if it had been made? After all these denials on the part of the parties to the contract, what nation would feel any moral obligation to observe such a secret understanding? To me this is idle talk.

I am not favorable to the Brandegee reservation. It adds nothing of clarity or force. It simply gives notice to the other parties that we are a suspicious Nation, and by adoption we offer an excuse to other nations to make such reservations or changes as they may impose. The reservation is, however, as inocuous in itself as it is useless, and if I come to the belief its adoption will insure the ratification of the treaty I shall vote for it, but I am sorry that any Senator has thought it necessary in order to make clear what is already entirely obvious.

Considerable discussion has been indulged and unwarranted inferences have been drawn in reference to the fact that two of the four nations to this pact will have when the treaty providing for reduction of armament is adopted a combined naval force in excess of that of the other two nations, and therefore the United States and Great Britain would combine to dominate France and Japan. This criticism dishonors our country. The whole history of our foreign relations disputes this possibility. The world believes that our motive in entering these treaties was not selfish, except that there may be a justifiable selfishness in the desire to prevent any war in which we may be involved, a selfishness which includes not only our highest and best interests but also those of the world.

It is true that Great Britain and the United States under the treaty for armament reduction will have a combined naval force greater than that of the other two nations, but they have such predominance now without reduction if it is conceivable that the United States would enter into any dishonorable contract with any other nation to destroy or humiliate any third nation she can do it regardless of whether these pending treaties are ratified or not, but the Senate must be a party to such an infamy.

I have too much faith in my country, sir, to give this argument serious attention. It is impossible. Our national ideals, our history, is too well established and known now to be affected by unworthy inuendo or unwarranted suspicions. Some men may impugn the motives and character of the great and good men who represented the United States at the Washington conference, but the nations of the earth and the people of our country have faith in them.

Senators who are so eloquently opposing this treaty could with equal force oppose any treaty into which the United States has ever entered. No Senator can be more jealous of our country's unembarrassed sovereignty than I am, but I realize, sir, that our destiny is inextricably involved with that of the world, and that it is the duty of the United States to exert its every proper influence to preserve peace with justice in the world. The late conference opened an honorable and effective way for doing this. We have sacrificed no desirable right, we have entered into no entangling alliance, but we have substituted friendship for hatred among the nations of the world and entered into understandings with them which will reduce the causes for war and make peace more certain.

As in legislative session,

CONDITIONS IN BITUMINOUS COAL FIELDS.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of publicity in the country concerning the possibilities of a strike in the bituminous coal fields. The Department of Labor for many months has been making a very careful investigation of conditions in the coal fields. That investigation has covered bituminous fields in 19 different States. Their report is now ready; I have it before me here, and in view of the possibility of difficulty in the coal fields, it seems to me that it would be rather desirable to have this information available for distribution. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the report covering wages, wage conditions, and so forth, may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PAY OF ARMY AND KINDRED SERVICES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report (No. 572) from the special committee of the Senate appointed pursuant to Senate resolution 240, to which was referred the report of the joint committee of the Congress charged with the duty of proposing a revision of the pay and allowance schedules of the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Public Health Service, the Coast Guard, and the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Accompanying the report is a bill which should go to the calendar, the committee having been authorized by the Senate resolution to report by bill.

The bill (S. 3326) to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

As in legislative session,

SECRET EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business behind closed doors.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of secret executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), under the order previously made, the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate in open executive session reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the pending treaty.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I intend to vote against the treaty, and I shall state as concisely as possible what seem to me to be the chief and indeed convincing objections to this instrument.

I. In principle it departs from past American practice of keeping out of international entanglements over "territorial integrity or political independence."

II. It is not, as it is now drawn, inclusive of all the possible parties to a dispute and hence unjudicial.

III. It is an alliance of large powers for mutual defense of rights which will, if world history is correct, inevitably result in the creation of other alliances to counteract its influence and activity.

IV. It alienates friendly powers like Russia and China, who will regard the treaty as being directed toward and militating against their interests and security.

V. It compels recognition of foreign rights we know to have been acquired by force and to be held in contravention to democratic notions.

VI. It implies the use of force for its fulfillment whenever unarbitrable controversies arise.

VII. It extends our protection, which the other parties are so often apt to need in return for territorial protection which we always have, could, and should furnish ourselves.

VIII. It subordinates national self-respect in paying participation in this treaty as the price for the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese treaty.

IX. It is either antagonistic to the League of Nations or it threatens to involve our tacit recognition of the functions of the league in case any of our allies submit a dispute involving their Pacific rights to that body.

X. On the whole, it would prevent America from passing independent judgment on questions in controversy between nations.

THE ABROGATION OF THE ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE—IS IT A GAIN FOR AMERICA OR A SURRENDER?

Mr. President, in 1911 England, in surveying the political balance in Europe, and with customary vision for seeing turbulent happenings in her possessions in the Orient, made a secret alliance with Japan. There was never any question about the character of this alliance; it operated mutually, gave guaranties of both offensive and defensive force, characteristic of all alliances in case of necessity. Like all alliances between aggrandizing powers, this alliance provided for an exchange of service in return for a privilege to exploit. When the Great War began, Japan at once cleared the Pacific and the Orient of German control, held a threat over India, and thus freed England to give her attention to affairs in the European war stadium. For her reward Japan, with England's approval, arbitrarily seized German possessions in the Orient, tightened her grip on a defenseless, harmless, friendly China, and acquired ultimately for herself valuable parts of Siberia. Though the post-war conference at Versailles dealt with all the territories Japan had taken over to herself, no substantial concessions were made by her toward the return of these territories, and at the establishment of the League of Nations China and Russia were still paying the price of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Though the English home government was acquiescent in these exploitations, some of the colonies—Canada, New Zealand, Australia—partly imbued with a sense of justice, partly alarmed at the growth of the Japanese expansionist movement, began protesting the continuance of this pact of aggrandizement. Public opinion in America mounted high also against the English for associating openly with a power manifestly hostile to the national aims and desires of the United States; and Britain, as Balfour put it, was "between two misunderstandings—one in America and the colonies if she continued the alliance and one in Japan if she terminated it." Then, most opportunely for England, came the Washington conference. Why was not this a good chance to unload the alliance carcass and merge it into a general agreement among Pacific powers? The British did not have to bear the embarrassment of the first move—America made it for her. Shortly before the Washington conference convened Mr. Hughes began negotiation with England for the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. The four-power treaty is the result.

There is no doubt but what the four-power treaty ends this alliance; that is one of the great achievements advocates claim for it. England has thus temporarily diminished the odium of her Japanese alliance and has transferred the residue to the United States. The Anglo-Japanese treaty has been scrapped; in its place is a treaty in which America holds a leading place. Let us consider the gain, if any, accruing to America from the termination of this insidious treaty.

The proper inference from the fact that the abrogation of this Anglo-Japanese pact was beneficial to us is that its continuance would have been harmful. If this is so, in what respects would it be harmful? Obviously, the answer is that it (1) threatened our coast lines on both Atlantic and Pacific sides, (2) that it subordinated our interest in the Pacific, and (3) that in case of war with Japan we would have England to contend with as her ally. None nor all of these claims are sufficient to show why we should have treated with England and Japan to abolish the treaty. What matter if our coast lines are threatened from both sides as long as our international conduct avoids the causes of war? Mutual protection in imperialistic enterprises was what this treaty sought to give. And since we have neither interest nor designs on properties to which they relate, the chances of our becoming involved over them are small indeed. We should be able to protect our own interests in the Pacific as we have always done and make certain that they were being subordinated to none. Substituting our own country in whom exploiting and dominating are unknown in an alliance in return for the abrogation of another alliance (Anglo-Japanese), the parties to which are apparently incurable addicts to imperial habits, is repugnant alike to American practicality and American ideals.

This treaty binds us for 10 years and if not abrogated by one year's notice at the end of that time may continue indefinitely. The claim has been made on the assumption of the continued military impotency of Germany and Russia that within the 10-year period no power could possibly arise in the Pacific capable of seizing territory. This argument is putting your defense of the treaty on the grounds that whether the treaty is good or bad makes no difference, but that conditions are not such that it would have to be put in effect within the 10-year period. Therefore, there is no harm in entering it, because since no possibility of trouble exists no force will have to be applied. This, of course, is specious and relies on an entirely false assumption, which would by application of its principle justify the taking and holding of property because its owner would not or could not object. Russia may possibly, in fact, is likely to, acquire strength enough within the next 10 years to assert her rights in Sakhalin, in which event, by the treaty, we would be forced to consult. How could we decide in favor of Japan? And if we should decide against her, how could we remain her ally? This argument, then, it seems quite apparent, is used on the altogether false premise that even if the treaty is binding, the possible aggressive powers are impotent for military attack. The assumption is dangerous that a now subdued and incapable Russia will continue to be one for 10 years. If Russia were to fight Japan over Sakhalin, we would have but two choices—keep the treaty and support Japan, or do nothing and break our covenanted word. In the first case, war and its evils would result; in the second, we would violate our pledge, and hence lose the respect of the powers associated with us as well as resurrect their old suspicion and distrust.

In agreeing to respect the Pacific rights of the contracting parties we have in fact given our approval to stolen territory held arbitrarily against the will of those occupying it. Nothing could be more contrary to past American international practice, for hitherto we have gone along on the principle that we could defend our own territory and while respecting the just rights other nations had acquired we should let other nations defend theirs. Now, by this treaty we are getting something which we do not need: Compelled respect of our Pacific rights by other powers mutually joined with us and in return giving something which the other powers do need and would have difficulty in giving themselves—compelled respect for their territories and the protection which this respect would bring with it against the invasion of their ill-gotten rights.

Mr. President, I now proceed to enlarge upon some of the objections enumerated by me at the outset of this address:

I.

IN PRINCIPLE IT DEPARTS FROM PAST AMERICAN PRACTICE OF KEEPING OUT OF INTERNATIONAL ENTANGLEMENTS OVER "TERRITORIAL INTEGRITY OR POLITICAL INDEPENDENCE."

Under what theory did the founders consider foreign entanglements undesirable? A survey of the effects which such alliances have had in the past shows that they tend toward the creation of other alliances by excluding the nations having interests in the same sphere, finally ending in misunderstanding and war. Alliances, also, peculiarly enough, seem to have been confined to imperialistic powers for purposes of sustaining territories and rights acquired by imperialistic practice and confiscation. Moreover, alliances make other nations of the world feel a distrust for those participating in them, in that they seem to confine their interest and concern of the signatories to the immediate scope involved.

There is another objection to alliances which seems to me to be the most serious from the standpoint of a country like ours which accepts and has practiced democratic ideas. Inasmuch as it is impossible for us to join with powers who are not imperialistic the tendency in our diplomatic relations will be to regard international rights in the same sense as do imperialists. Admitting the fact that England, Japan, and France have been acknowledgedly selfish in their relations to smaller powers, it is sufficient to add, in view of our recent tendency toward imperialistic practice, as illustrated in San Domingo, Haiti, Samoa, as well as in the tenacity with which we continue to cling to the Philippines, is it not unwise for us to nurture these dangerous imperialistic germs by cementing our national interests closer to such nations?

II.

IT IS NOT, AS IT IS NOW DRAWN, INCLUSIVE OF ALL THE POSSIBLE PARTIES TO A DISPUTE AND HENCE UNJUDICIAL.

Under the present phrasing of article 2 if a dispute arose out of a Pacific question between one or more of the high contracting parties and a power external to the agreement no opportunity would be provided for permitting the nonmember power to state its side of the case. Thus, if after this treaty is put into effect the United States should grant independence to the Philippines and the latter power were to become involved concerning her rights with one of the signatories, the signatory might refer the matter for discussion and adjustment to the conference created by the treaty and arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken without ever having given the Philippines a chance to state the source and scope of the grievance. A conference seeking to do justice would bring in all parties whose rights may be in question in order that full explanations and complete details be obtained from both or all the claimants. Apart from the manifest justice of embracing all the various disputants in the conference, this would tend to expose clearly the causes of trouble and very possibly point the way to an amicable settlement.

Again, it may be readily apprehended that if Russia assumed in the future to gain back by aggressive action that portion of Sakhalin now in possession of Japan, allies, united for and earnestly desiring peace, would permit Russia's inclusion in the communications of the contracting parties relative to the most efficient measures to be taken.

III.

IT IS AN ALLIANCE OF LARGE POWERS FOR MUTUAL DEFENSE OF RIGHTS WHICH WILL, IF WORLD HISTORY IS CORRECT, INEVITABLY RESULT IN THE CREATION OF OTHER ALLIANCES TO COUNTERACT ITS INFLUENCE AND ACTIVITY.

But the possibility of international complications under the treaty are almost incalculable. Commercial, military, geographic rights are held by all the signatories in the Pacific. Under the old system of diplomacy, in which subjection and oppression of other peoples play such an important part, these rights are in a constant state of flux and are continuously being challenged by those against whom they are held. Are we to give our approval directly or impliedly to an instrument which in effect, because it tends to sustain national and international rights, reacts so as to prevent temporarily subdued people from ultimately rising and asserting their claims to the territories they inhabit? If Russia or China rebels against further confiscation of their property or trade rights, we will under this treaty be called into the dispute resulting. Our sanction will be sought by the exploiting party, and if not obtained will give cause for distrust and hard feeling between this Nation and one or more of the parties to this treaty. The whole agreement is a repudiation of fundamental Americanism and a step in the direction of the formation of group alliances, which have been breeders of trouble from the earliest recorded history. The League of Nations at least has the advantage, even if it does create a so-called supersovereignty, of embracing all the world and thus making a system of alliances in different parts of the world unnecessary. This treaty encourages such a system of alliances, for assuming the league to be nonoperative, it leaves Europe, Africa, the American Continent, and the Asiatic mainland unprotected by mutual guaranty between countries, as against the protection extended by this pact to the relatively insignificant insular possessions of the four powers. Assuming the league to be functioning as it was intended to the protection of this pact will, from the standpoint of the league, be meddlesome, unnecessary, and an unjustifiable interference with the functions of the league.

IV.

IT ALIENATES FRIENDLY POWERS LIKE RUSSIA AND CHINA, WHO WILL REGARD THE TREATY AS BEING DIRECTED TOWARD AND MILITATING AGAINST THEIR INTERESTS AND SECURITY.

And how can we regard the attitude toward us of friendly powers like Russia and China, who have territories in the Pacific, and yet who have been excluded from the discussions of this conference? Will they longer continue to look upon us as the champions of the rights of small, weak nations, as the savior of democracy, as the promoters of international peace and justice, or shall they feel that they are left alone and that we, too, are denying them their God-given right to enjoy the natural resources of their own soil and the political rights to which they are entitled? This being the case, is it not natural that they should turn to other sources for protection and help, and that, responding to the call of self-interest and self-preservation, they will link themselves together with other nations to the end of throwing off those who would dominate them and exploit their lands?

V.

IT COMPELS RECOGNITION OF FOREIGN RIGHTS WE KNOW TO HAVE BEEN ACQUIRED BY FORCE AND TO BE HELD IN CONTRAVENTION TO DEMOCRATIC NOTIONS.

Much has been said of the similarity between article 10 of the League of Nations and article 2 of this treaty. A comparison of the two shows, whereas the first concerns itself with the "respecting and protecting" of territories and political independence against external aggression of the entire world, the second demands the "respecting and maintaining" of national rights of the signatories in a certain sphere where their interests lie. Both instruments have designated a conference of the parties to advise upon the means by which these ends shall be achieved. In the strictest sense article 10 of the league is more equitable in that it respects and preserves the rights of the entire world and admits all nations to participate in disputes; whereas article 2 excludes all nations excepting those immediately interested, and reserves for itself the right of determining all disputes arising out of controversies in the relatively limited sphere of the Pacific regardless of other parties thereto. In both articles, if they are presumed to have any effect, is the obligation to consult and decide upon means and then enforce the decision. Whether in the four-power treaty the use of force is inferential is irrelevant, for if the treaty is to have any strength or use at all it must be expected to apply armed force whenever a breach of rights occurs.

There is indeed something novel about the ethical and moral character of our country that it should be called upon and bind itself in an international treaty to respect the rights of other nations when there has never been an instance in history where this Nation has not respected the rights of other nations.

VI.

IT IMPLIES THE USE OF FORCE FOR ITS FULFILLMENT WHENEVER UNARBITRABLE CONTROVERSIES ISSUE.

The treaty calls for consultation and adjudication to meet the exigencies of a situation by conference in case the dispute is between the parties and by diplomatic communication in case the dispute is between the parties and an outside power. It thus implies that each power agrees to act if the rights of the other powers happen to be put in balance. It is not a question of merely consulting and then withdrawing if the circumstances are unappealing. Alliances in their nature call for mutual defense and mutual offense, or special sanction of the "interests or rights" of their members, regardless of what is set forth, implied, or directly understood in advance outside the context. In an alliance when the situation arises in which certain things are specifically called for there is no evading without breach of national honor. If the treaty is binding it is open to the same objections as the League of Nations. If it is not binding it is nebulous and useless, for in event of trouble in the Pacific it would call for no action other than that which the United States might be expected by the world to perform even if she happened to be outside the obligations of the treaty.

VII.

IT EXTENDS OUR PROTECTION, WHICH THE OTHER PARTIES ARE SO OFTEN APT TO NEED, IN RETURN FOR TERRITORIAL PROTECTION WHICH WE ALWAYS HAVE, COULD, AND SHOULD FURNISH OURSELVES.

The foreign relations of the United States fortunately have always been such that it has been unnecessary to request or seek the help of other powers in the maintenance of our territorial and political rights. This is not a characteristic which is true of the nations now related to us in this pact; every one of them at some time in its history has found itself in a position where it was menaced by external forces to such an extent that it became necessary to ask for support from powers abroad who might be urged to take defensive or even offensive action in their behalf in return for an agreement on their part to render similar service. It is not my belief that the United States ever would be in a position where it would be compelled to get help from other nations. Then we can not assume that we are getting any benefit from this alliance in actual military or naval support. The benefits derived under this treaty go altogether to the other powers, who are almost continuously at war by virtue of their commercial and territorial ambitions, and who, therefore, in getting our guaranties to sustain their rights, are receiving strength, assurance, and definite help in case they get into trouble.

VIII.

IT SUBORDINATES NATIONAL SELF-RESPECT IN PAYING PARTICIPATION IN THIS TREATY AS THE PRICE FOR THE ABROGATION OF THE ANGLO-JAPANESE TREATY.

If we regard as among the chief virtues of this treaty the fact that it terminates the Anglo-Japanese alliance, we have reached a lamentable state. Granted that this alliance was threatening our large trade and territorial interests in the Pacific; granted that a tangible agreement existed between the two powers calling for mutual assistance, in case of trouble; granted that the operations of this alliance might very conceivably be directed against the United States, do these things constitute a justification for entering this new alliance in order to remove the dangers of the old? A deeper national humiliation has never occurred in our entire history than would be marked by the adoption of a treaty of compromise with imperialistic nations in order to avoid their exploitations of ourselves—our Pacific possessions. In private life, if two men of doubtful ethics were to unite against a law-abiding citizen for the purpose of interfering with the enjoyment of some of his rights, what would we think of him if he were to join with them and accept their doctrines and wink at their practices as employed and directed against others just to secure immunity for himself? Before the eyes of the world, in the minds of whatever nations there are capable of judging actions in the light of moral values or shrewd enough to recognize the absence of them, if we ratify this four-power treaty on the grounds that it ends the menace of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, of being whipped into line by the joint brandishments of Japan and Great Britain, America is going to present the identical humiliating spectacle. A vote for this treaty, in my mind, is a surrender in large measure of that strength, vigor, character, and nobility of purpose that has given this country its greatness.

IX.

IT IS EITHER ANTAGONISTIC TO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS OR IT THREATENS TO INVOLVE OUR TACIT RECOGNITION OF THE FUNCTIONS AND WORKS OF THE LEAGUE IN CASE ANY OF OUR ALLIES SUBMIT A DISPUTE INVOLVING THEIR PACIFIC RIGHTS TO THAT BODY.

The other three high contracting powers of this treaty—Great Britain, France, and Japan—are bona fide members of the League of Nations, a body organized to determine upon such questions as are raised by interference with the rights designated in this treaty. As members of the league, if they intend to be bound by its provisions, they would have to submit disputes arising to the council of that tribunal. The United States is not joined to the league covenant and therefore could give no validity to determinations it might make on questions relating to the same subject matter in the Pacific which it is the aim of this treaty to deal with. Accordingly, it should be definitely understood before we enter that so far as questions arising from the rights of the four powers in the Pacific are concerned they shall be submitted to and settled by the terms of the four-power treaty for the purposes of which the functions of the League of Nations shall be superseded.

[NOTE.—It is not sufficient to answer that this will be registered as a treaty with the league. Even then, in case trouble or the signs of trouble arose under the covenant the council would be free to accept whatever disputes were submitted to it by England, France, and Japan, unless these powers agree to refer them first to and abide last by the action of the four-power treaty.]

ISOLATION NOT THE ALTERNATIVE.

Mr. President, against the opposition to schemes which, whether or not they are entangling alliances, have claimed for them the virtue of aiming to preserve the peace of the world, there are some like those who have written and are supporting this treaty who cry chauvinism, selfishness, isolation, detachment from the responsibility of helping to solve the problems of mankind. This, however, is not a proper analysis of the reasons why I protest and will vote against this alliance. I am, as are all our citizens and every Member of this Senate, concerned with what perplexes or disturbs the course of human progress. I am eager, nay, zealous, to preserve the peace of the world. I desire that our country should play its proper part in truly keeping the world safe for democracy; in reducing the tremendous burdens of modern warfare; in minimizing the possibilities of costly international conflicts. But I believe that it is not necessary for America to bind herself to entangling agreements with other countries to accomplish this. I am further convinced that the strengthening and backing of imperialistic programs and policies never has and never will promote peace in the world. Conference, consultation, publicity, open frankness, an interchange of views taking place freely and by consent of those concerned in disputes, leaving independent judgment and freedom of action for all nations in deciding the merits of a case, I deem to be the best way of insuring peace between men—to discuss the facts when trouble comes, to cast fullest light upon the controversy and its roots, to unravel the misunderstandings which lie behind it in a council of nations summoned for the purpose who are not bound in advance by any guaranties to regard the attitude of special allies, but who can come to a decision as a result of an impartial survey of the situation. It seems to me to offer far more in the way of keeping stable conditions in the world than a system where fair judgments are warped by alliances and thwarted by prejudice.

Mr. President, I conclude with this proposition: What meaning has this treaty if it is not an implied promise to back up, under certain contingencies, some unknown situation with force? But if it does not mean that it certainly constitutes a perilous, obscure, and bewildering possibility of entanglements.

It matters not so much where and how a nation stands, but it does matter tremendously in what direction it is facing. I protest this treaty because it is making our country face about so far as her international policy is concerned. I protest because it is directing our country away from peace, independence, and freedom from international jealousies and entanglements toward ceaseless trouble, misunderstandings, questionable international practices, stultification, and wars.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, it may be instructive to compare the methods of the four-power pact for the settlement of disputes with that of the League of Nations.

The league covenant obligates members to submit disputes to arbitration or to inquiry by the council or the assembly.

The four-power pact obligates members to submit the disputes within its scope to a conference composed of the four members themselves.

The league covenant thus provides a disinterested tribunal of which the parties at interest are not members. In no other way could a fair and disinterested settlement be obtained. A court of arbitration on which the parties to the controversy sat would be unthinkable. The league covenant requires that when a dispute shall have been referred to the council or assembly the decision shall be rendered by the member nations who are not parties to the question. There are 8 members of the council and 51 members of the assembly and the parties have the right to submit the question to either body if they do not submit it to arbitration.

The four-power pact provides that the disputing parties shall summon the other members of the pact to a conference and that the four members shall then consider and adjust the controversy. The disputing parties thus sit in judgment on their own contentions. In case of an important quarrel involving vital rights no disputant would ever yield. Refusal to concur in the decision of the majority would mean the end of the pact and war or serious rupture of relations would follow. Again, the four-power pact is confined to rights relating to island possessions and dominions in the Pacific—and the four powers are so intimately concerned and interlinked in connection with these possessions and dominions that they would all be more or less interested parties in any Pacific controversy. Consequently, a disinterested and judicial determination of disputes under the pact is practically impossible. The method provided is more of an invitation to war than to a peaceful composition of differences. So far as the United States is concerned the other three parties have so many interests in common, interests compelling them to make common cause, that she would be handicapped at any conference for the settlement of a dispute to which she might be a party. I shall go into this at length a little later.

The league covenant obligates the parties to a dispute not to go to war for three months after the award by the arbitrators or a decision by the council or assembly and in any event not to go to war with a member complying with such award or decision.

The four-power pact contains no such provisions. There is no stated obligation in this pact to refrain from war at all. Immediately after a decision by the conference of these four powers, including of course the parties to the dispute, a dissatisfied contestant may take up arms at once and probably would.

The league allows time for the cooling of angry passions, the return of reason and practical judgment. This invaluable element in any effective process for the settlement of international disputes is absent, as we have seen, from the four-power pact.

The pact proposes, therefore, a crude, primitive, uncertain, and inefficient method for the settlement of controversies.

The league covenant requires a unanimous vote of member nations before any determining action is had, except in certain minor specified matters.

The four-power pact is silent on this subject and the utmost confusion and dissatisfaction may result.

Indeed, it would have been far better for the peace of the world if Great Britain, France, and Japan had reminded the United States when the four-power pact was proposed that the League of Nations provided a satisfactory and efficient method for the settlement of any differences that might arise among the four powers over rights relating to Pacific Islands, and if they had conditioned their acceptance of the invitation to the Washington conference on the willingness of the United States to connect her proposals for naval armament reduction with the world plan for gradual disarmament on water, on land, and in air which the league was carefully working out.

Article 17 of the league covenant provides that in the event of a dispute between a member of the league and a state which is not a member the latter shall be invited by the council to accept the obligations of league membership for the purposes of such dispute on such conditions as the council may deem just. It provides that if the invitation is accepted the league provisions for arbitration and settlement shall be applied with such modification as the council may deem necessary. It provides further that on the proffer of the invitation the council shall immediately institute an inquiry into the circumstances of the dispute and recommend such action as may seem best and most effective under the circumstances. It provides also that if the State so invited refuses to accept and resorts to war against a member of the league the refusing State subjects itself to article 16 and is deemed therefore to be at war with every other member of the league. Whether the invitation is accepted or not the council must take jurisdiction, must investigate the controversy and make whatever suggestions it may consider most advisable.

The four-power pact stipulates that questions involving the rights of the parties in relation to insular possessions and dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean and incapable of diplomatic adjustment shall be settled by a conference of the parties.

The United States is not a member of the league. Great Britain, France, and Japan, the other parties to the four-power pact, are members of the league. But for this four-power pact, therefore, the league would take immediate jurisdiction of a dispute between the United States and any of them and we would have the benefit of disinterested arbitration or of the judgment of a body in which nearly all the nations of the world are represented. Having agreed, however, to submit our disputes as to Pacific islands to a conference of four powers, of which we would be one and the other disputant another, the league would naturally hold on beginning the investigation required in article 17 that we should abide by the decision of the conference. The four-power pact deprives us of the equitable machinery so carefully devised by the league for the proper adjustment of disputes and places us at the mercy of parties immediately and directly interested. This pact drives us still further from the greatest tribunal history has yet seen for the maintenance of world peace—and this is in all probability its deliberate object. It is true that Great Britain, France, and Japan are members of the league, but so are forty-eight other nations, and each member has an equal voice in all decisions except when parties to disputes. If it be said that at least two of the other three members of the four-power pact could block a decision in our favor by the league it may be replied that they could not swing a decision against us unless practically all the world should be convinced of its merit. Furthermore, they could not long withstand the opinion of the balance of the league if it should be exerted in our behalf. In any event the jurisdiction of the league would be far preferable and far safer for the United States than that of the few powers immediately and materially and selfishly concerned in the questions covered by the four-power pact.

In my judgment there could be no such thing as a disinterested decision so far as our rights were concerned, when they clashed with those of Japan, or Great Britain, or France, before a tribunal composed solely of us and them. The ties that unite them are far more binding and more powerful than those which unite any of them to us. Great Britain and Japan are the two principal island empires of the earth. For 20 years they have had a military alliance. For 20 years they have said to all the world, strike one, strike both. For 20 years they have stood ready to shed their blood for one another. In 1914 Japan took up arms for Great Britain, who had recently gone to war for France, in the most critical moment Great Britain and France had ever known. So intimate became these relations as the struggle progressed that in secret they sorted out the German possessions in the Pacific—some of which lie across and control the cable, trade, and travel lanes from the United States to her Pacific holdings, including the Philippines—all of which may be zoned, as Germany attempted to zone the British isles in 1917, so as to place the Pacific under British and Japanese domination, and all of which we are asked through this four-power pact to respect and confirm in their new ownership. In my judgment we are also asked to preserve that ownership in certain contingencies with American blood. Great Britain, France, and Japan were armed allies in the World War for more than three years before we entered the fray.

Only a few days ago Great Britain and France formed a military alliance to last for twenty years. We have repudiated the treaty negotiated by our American President at the time, Woodrow Wilson, pledging us to join with Great Britain in protecting France. It is true that the formal alliance between Great Britain and Japan is formally to terminate if this four-power pact is established, but the community of interest that has knitted these empires together for two decades will remain. That alliance was to terminate or to be seriously modified anyway during the present year, and the claim that its abolition is due to the four-power pact reeks with fraud. That alliance was virtually doomed when Great Britain and Japan joined the League of Nations. They admitted that it was not in harmony with the league covenant and practically agreed to eliminate the military features. The league covenant provides that all treaties out of harmony with its purposes to which member nations are parties shall terminate.

Another link that binds Great Britain, France, and Japan together is their treatment of China. For decades they as well as Russia and Germany exploited the products, violated the sovereignty, and despoiled the territory of China. From 1842, the year of the so-called opium war in which Great Britain forced China to legalize the sale of opium, spreading ruin and degradation among the Chinese inhabitants—from that year dates a story of international theft and plunder that may well bring a sneer from every thinking oriental when European progress is mentioned in his presence. Territories permanently appropriated like Hongkong, territories leased under pressure and placed under foreign rule like Kwang-Chow, vast concessions for railways and for mines, spheres of foreign influence enthroning monopoly and privilege over the fairest and richest sections, erection of foreign post offices and foreign courts on Chinese soil for foreign subjects, control of Chinese tariff laws by foreign Governments—these are some of the marks of western aggression in a land that had organized government, social order, cultivated soil supporting countless millions, philosophy, literature, culture, when the ancestors of these intruders were roving, semisavage tribes.

It is little wonder that the Chinese rose against the despoiler in the antiforeign outbreak known as the Boxer rebellion of 1900, and that for six weeks the world trembled for the fate of western diplomats and citizens beleaguered at Peking. The situation in China may be brought home to the United States by the following quotation: "It was as if the Russians and the English had just seized rival reservations on Long Island and the Jersey coast, commanding New York City; as if the English had wrenched away Charleston; the Germans, Philadelphia; the French, New Orleans; and Cossacks were garrisoned at strategic points throughout New England. It was as if the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railway were manned and guarded by Slavs, the New York Central by Belgians, the Pennsylvania by Prussians; as if the Pittsburgh mines were handed over en bloc to an English corporation and the Russians had exclusive mining rights to the gold of Alaska's Yukon region." The Russo-Japanese war and the World War have left Japan with the Russian and German spoils. The so-called nine-power treaty, which we will soon be called on to ratify, perpetrates a ghastly jest when it solemnly assures the protection of China's integrity for the future. Its meaning is that whatever the rapacious powers have overlooked will hereafter be respected. They respect it only because it got away. But the situation has other complications. Along the western shore of Russia lie numerous Japanese islands, many of them natural fortresses, many of them already fortified, barring Russia's access to the Pacific. Japan knows that Russia will again seek this outlet, and in driving the wedge of the four-power pact between Russia and the United States she, the most militant of the yellow races, has divided two great white centers; she, the devotee of the sun-goddess, heathen to the core, has yoked the greater part of Christendom to her chariot wheel. Great Britain knows that she can not dispense with the aid of Japan in maintaining her Indian Empire under the very nose of Russia; in keeping Russia out of the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean. France knows that she must have the support of Great Britain in opposing the menace of reconstructed Germany and of Japan in preserving her conquests and aggressions in China.

Consider further that beneath an impassive exterior Japan cherishes a grievance against us of the bitterest and gravest sort. Under our laws no foreigners except whites and blacks are eligible to citizenship by naturalization and no Japanese laborers may enter our country. Japan regards this as an insult; a badge and brand of inferiority, a discrimination imposed by the white race on the yellow. Our laws exclude the Chinese laborers by name, but Japan, with the abnormal sensitiveness and pride of the newly arrived, would not tolerate such an indignity, and through the so-called gentlemen's agreement we permit her to enforce our immigration laws as to her subjects. Of course, this is to her an evidence of cowardice on our part and but deepens her determination to press the issue at every opportunity. She does not enforce the gentlemen's agreement honestly because she holds that her farmers and gardeners are not laborers. The result is that the number of Japanese in continental United States has grown from a few score in 1880 to more than 100,000 in 1920. Most of these are in California, where they are slowly supplanting the white farmer with their lower standards of living and clan exclusiveness. Already California and other States have enacted laws prohibiting aliens ineligible to citizenship from owning land, but lower living standards, group action, and racial solidarity are stronger than law, and wherever a Japanese farming community takes root it fastens itself with the tenacity of a cancer on the soil, ousting the American farmer, who can not, will not, and ought not live under such conditions as do the Japanese. A few months ago two Japanese farmers arrived in one of the most fertile valleys of Texas, having contracted for land they intended to cultivate. A deputation of American citizens met them as they stepped from the train, gave them firmly but quietly to understand that they would not be tolerated, and they were soon speeding back to the place whence they came. The State legislature then passed an alien land law similar to that of California. Thus the two civilizations clashed in Texas—the oriental and the American; the heathen and the Christian; the yellow and the white—a clash which is but the forerunner of a more sinister outcome unless the question is promptly settled. We want no Japanese clans monopolizing any part of Texas soil; we want no Buddhist temples under Texas skies.

Let us examine this problem more closely. For 3,000 years the Japanese have been forced to cultivate small areas until to-day, with the most exacting, tedious, and monotonous toil they make a square mile support 2,000 persons. Their farms average less than three acres to a family, and the income of the average farm family ranges from $75 to $150 per annum. Farm hands get about $27 a year with rice and shelter. The Japanese soldier gets about $5.50 per month. In 1917 the average wage in 33 Japanese industrial occupations was 30 cents a day. Skilled artisans received 47 cents, male textile workers 28½ cents, female textile workers 19 cents. Hours of labor for more than a million of these workers ranged from 11 to 14 per day. Japanese school-teachers get $17.25 a month, or about $207 per year. Multiplying at the rate of 600,000 or 700,000 every year the Japanese have about reached the point where the soil can no longer be made to furnish adequate subsistence, even with the discipline, the labor, the training, and study of 25 centuries. Consider further that Japan produces no cotton, coal, or iron, the basic materials of her already gigantic industrialism. Consider also that the poverty and discontent of the working masses may at any time become a menace to the prestige and control of the present autocratic government and it will be seen that Japan must have an outlet for her restless and growing millions or face internal chaos.

This is why the Japanese have almost accomplished the economic conquest of Hawaii. This is why the hundred thousand Japanese in California are receiving fresh and unlawful accessions from the homeland every day. This is why the Japanese Government could not if it would resist the pressure of its hungry myriads for transfer to the large and prosperous Japanese communities beyond the seas. Remember at this point that since they whipped one of the principal white nations in 1905, and became one of the leading powers of the earth, the Japanese Government and the Japanese people can see no reason why the Japanese should not have equal treatment with all others from every other Government and people. Equality, racial, social, economic, and governmental, is their insistent demand. And the Japanese people expect the Japanese Government to secure that equality. They have been taught that their Government is divine in origin and nature; to worship it as part of their religion; and of course they believe that it can accomplish anything, and naturally they can not see why a people whose Government is divine are not the equals of all other peoples. Therefore, the Japanese Government and the Japanese people furiously resent the action of the United States in barring them from citizenship, in refusing those among them who must wrest subsistence from an overcrowded and overcultivated soil admission to our spacious and unoccupied areas; they resent the action of some of our States in denying the Japanese already here the right to own land; they resent the boycotts and expulsions of Japanese farmers that are inevitably developing as the white race begins to strike in defense of its standards and its homes. How much wiser, kinder, and fairer it would be for all concerned to let Japan know now and for all time that the yellow farmer and the yellow wageworker can not and shall not find lodgment on American soil.

Now, what is happening in Hawaii, the most strategic point on the Pacific, where every vessel operating between America and Asia or America and Australia must stop for coal? The distances are such that if a vessel carried its own coal too little space would be left for cargo or passengers. Hawaii is a territory of the United States, like Alaska, and has its own local government and legislature. Of the 263,666 people in Hawaii, according to the last census, 159,900 are Asiatics, and of these Asiatics 109,269 are Japanese. Every Japanese child born in Hawaii is an American citizen, with all the rights of citizenship under our Constitution and laws. The United States Commissioner of Education made a survey of Hawaii in 1919. The commission making the survey was composed of Frank F. Bunker, of the United States Bureau of Education, Washington, D. C.; W. W. Kemp, chairman of education department, University of California; Parke R. Kolbe, president Municipal University, Akron, Ohio; George R. Twiss, professor of secondary education and State high school inspector, Ohio State University. In studying the school situation in Hawaii, these gentlemen found it advisable to examine the nature and tendencies of the population. The survey showed that at the present rate of increase 47 out of every 100 voters in Hawaii will be Japanese in 20 years; that in the succeeding 20 they will control the territorial government of this vital American possession.

Of course, nothing can prevent a constant flow of these Japanese-Americans from Hawaii into California where a hundred thousand or more Japanese already have a foothold on the soil, adding further complications to this appalling problem. The survey indicated further that the Japanese had patience, persistence, thrift, ambition, group solidarity, acumen, and astuteness that enabled them to succeed where other races failed; that the Japanese preserved their racial allegiance and identity. The survey showed further that American public schools in Hawaii were seriously handicapped by Japanese schools taught by Japanese in the Japanese language; that wherever there was a group of Japanese families there was set up by the side of the American public school or near it a Japanese school conducted in the Japanese language for Japanese children who attended the American school; that the teachers of these Japanese schools came in all instances from Japan; that they were certified teachers in Japan and had often been recommended by the educational department of the Japanese Government; that not one of these teachers had been born or educated in Hawaii; that a prominent Japanese educator, Obata Shusan, had said in an address before the Japanese Educational Association of the island of Maui, one of the Hawaiian groups, the following:

> Any man who is to teach in Japanese language schools should not be a man with democratic ideas. The language school is not a place for a man with strong democratic ideas. A man of strong Japanese ideas should be its teacher.

The survey contained the following statement from an American school-teacher in Hawaii: "It is pretty hard to teach American ideals to a child who does his thinking in Japanese. As one who speaks Japanese and has had long experience in teaching orientals I wish to say that if the Japanese schools are continued we shall have a mongrel citizenship both in language and customs. The Japanese schools under cover of religious instruction teach the children loyalty to their Emperor and country. The Japanese language schools must go if we are to teach the young Japanese to become Americans."

One of the sentences of this American school-teacher in Hawaii bears repeating, studying, and weighing: "The Japanese schools under cover of religious instruction teach the children loyalty to their Emperor and country."

The survey showed that Buddhism, the Japanese heathen religion, was growing rapidly both in numbers and power in Hawaii; that the Nishi Hongwangji was the strongest Buddhist sect in the islands, having about 75,000 members; that the head of this sect was located in Japan and was called the hoss or chief priest; that he was honored by the sect as they would honor a living Buddha; that he was represented in Hawaii by a kantoku, a sort of bishop, who had absolute authority over the priests, teachers, and members of the sect in Hawaii, controlling them "as easily as he moves his fingers."

But what of the situation in California? The last Federal census places the number of Japanese in that State at 70,196, a number that of itself does not seem formidable in a Commonwealth with a population of 3,200,000. The California State Board of Control says, however, that this figure, as well as that of the State census, 87,279, is too low. The board points out that the census of the Japanese districts was taken by Japanese enumerators because Americans could not be found who spoke the Japanese language, and that the numbers reported were generally recognized as too small; that many Japanese lived in remote valleys and were difficult to reach for enumeration; that smuggling across the Mexican border is in constant progress; that many Japanese work on both sides the American-Mexican border in the Imperial Valley, a condition making it easy for aliens to enter at this point; that the fishing fleets, operated mainly by Japanese in large power boats in both Mexican and American waters, afford perpetual opportunities for the violation of the gentlemen's agreement. The United States Commissioner General of Immigration reported on January 30, 1919, partly as follows:

> Confidential information of unquestioned authenticity shows very conclusively that Japanese smuggling across the Mexican border is carried on successfully and to a very large extent. Southern California possesses a peculiar attraction to the Japanese and it seems inevitable that if some effective means are not found to curb further growth the Japanese colonies in that section will expand in time into such proportions as to create a serious problem. Once safely across the line the contrabands find concealment at conveniently located ranches conducted by fellow countrymen where they work for small wages until a smattering of English and of sophistication are acquired when they proceed toward their respective ultimate destinations. When any of such contrabands are arrested the resident Japanese who have given them asylum rush to their defense and if necessary do not hesitate to perjure themselves as to the period of residence in the United States of the arrested alien.

The real number of Japanese in California might well be placed, according to the board, at 125,000. Far more significant than mere numbers is the fact that they locate in groups and clans, form farming communities under a definite system of cooperation, adhere to their own language, customs, and religion, never merging into the native society; indeed, finding the native society equally opposed to assimilation; and gradually driving out the American farmer, the foundation rock of this Republic, who will not lower his scale of living to compete with their processes and their standards, who will not share their customs and ideals, who will not reside among them, or mingle his blood and theirs. Already, says the board, these Japanese communities operate 458,456 acres of California's richest land, approximately one-eighth or one-ninth of the total amount. Agricultural California, the California of the Sacramento, the San Joaquin, the Imperial Valleys and similar localities comprises about one-sixth of the State's area and contains about one-third of the State's population. Between that third, that million of rural Americans and one hundred thousand or more farming Japanese has begun a silent battle that will grow more bitter with the years, a struggle involving the supreme issue of civilization; whether American individualism and American independence in their most magnificent embodiment, the American farmer, shall survive on American soil. The board states that the market value of crops produced by the Japanese in California has grown from $6,235,856 in 1909 to $67,145,730 in 1919; that between 80 and 90 per cent of most of California's vegetable and berry crops are produced on Japanese farms; that within a comparatively short time some of the State's essential food products will have passed to Japanese control.

Says Yomato Ichicashi, a Japanese instructor in Japanese history and economics at Leland Stanford University through the charts in his book on Japanese Immigration published in 1915:

> Out of every 100 people growing berries in California 88 are Japanese. Out of every 100 who raise sugar beets 67 are Japanese. Out of every 100 who grow grapes 52 are Japanese. Out of every 100 who raise vegetables for market 46 are Japanese. Out of every 100 who grow citrus fruits 39 are Japanese. Out of every 100 who grow deciduous fruits 36 are Japanese.

That was in 1915. The board says that the percentages are much higher now.

The group system of the Japanese is the century-old clan of feudalistic Japan reborn in the United States. It involves a subordination and absorption of the individual in the objects of the mass, antagonistic to and subversive of the very genius of American progress. Elwood Mead, author of a constructive land policy recently adopted by California and noted student of land problems everywhere, says that our country stands at the parting of the ways; that it must protect its civilization against the oriental or be prepared for continual conflict.

The Japanese birth rate in California is exceeding that of the American. The State Board of Control reports that in 1910 one Japanese child was born in California to every 43 white children; in 1919 one to every 12; that in the 18 farming counties where the Japanese have principally gathered, the birth rate has quadrupled in 10 years; that in districts where the Japanese have most largely settled about one-half of all the births in 1919 were Japanese. It is estimated that at the present rate of increase there will be more than a million Japanese in California in 40 years. They have the same Japanese school system in California as in Hawaii—a system preserving Japanese language, traditions, ideals, religion, loyalty to emperor and country.

A close observer of affairs in California describes the Japanese methods as follows:

> Look at the way Japanese districts have built up. Easterners do not realize the team play the Japanese use in this enterprise, and still less the psychological effect upon the whites in the region invaded. Elwood Mead has investigated many of these developments and finds that what happens is something like this: A few Japanese come to work in the neighborhood for a year or two, during which time they study the soils and crops and learn which tracts are best. Next, backed by members of their clan who have not yet appeared, they lease some of the desirable acreage, paying, if necessary, a rental far above the sums a white man would pay. All over the State they have thus forced up the rental value abnormally. Almost invariably the white owner of the land is delighted to make so much profit, so he signs the lease contract. From that time on the Japanese begin bobbing up, and in a short time they have picked up all the good rentable land about a village. They create their own cooperative buying and selling organization. They fill the public schools with their children. They set up native schools. They practice Buddhism. As soon as possible they begin buying farm land either in the names of their American-born babies or else through corporations, which easily evade the intent of the law prohibiting aliens from acquiring title to real estate. Once they possess such land in quantity they begin to force down the rents they have been paying for leased farms; and as many American farmers have, by this stage of the game, left the district in disgust they find this fairly easy. In some neighborhoods rents have first been driven up to three or four times the prevailing scale, only to be driven down later after foothold had been secured well below the earlier level. And by reason of the presence of a Japanese colony the market value of such acreage drops sharply, for no whites will ever move into a Japanese district. Thus the Japanese manage to buy up all they wish at a bargain. In these methods no consistent American can find a moral wrong. They are not nearly so questionable as scores of business practices favored by our commercial classes. They are shrewd; that is the worst one can say of them. But the essential fact is that they anger the whites who have been the victims of the habit. No man likes to see the value of his farm dwindle as the result of alien neighbors. No man likes to see his children in school with a crowd of foreign children who speak their own language and herd apart from his own. No man likes to see his old neighbors move away one by one, leaving him alone in the midst of a people whose tongue he does not speak and with whom he can have no social intercourse, even if he tries to.

Mr. President, it is not surprising that the American citizens of California are beginning to take matters into their own hands. A typical instance was in 1920 when members of the American Legion served notice on the parties that a sale of land by an American to a Japanese could not go through. I need hardly add that it did not.

A few days ago a court in California rendered an epoch-marking decision on this land question. I quote from a writer upon the matter in the Pittsburgh Dispatch. The article is headed:

CAN'T STOP THE JAPANESE.

The old conflict between constitutional and statutory conditions, the old issue between Federal and State rights, thrust itself into the very center of the California-Japanese land question in the California superior court a few days ago and decided the point at stake in the case of the State of California against Jusuke Shingu. Judge McDaniel decided that American-born Japanese have a right to own land in California—a right that seems to make ineffectual the narrower intent of the land law aimed specifically against the Japanese. The point involved was the legality of a purchase of land by Shingu for his two minor children, which introduced an allegation of fraud and violation of the California antialien land law.

Judge McDaniel stated that he favors the antialien land law and has always upheld its constitutionality, but under the Constitution of the United States any American-born person has the right to the possession in the United States of land in his own right. The court dismissed the charge of fraud, since there was no attempt by Shingu to take possession of the land, and stated that the law does not forbid an alien father from advancing the purchase price of land for the benefit of his children who are American citizens.

To the statement of Attorney General Webb that the decision will permit the rapid and indefinite expansion of land ownership by Japanese, Judge McDaniel said if a fault exists it is basic, growing out of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, which makes of those born in the United States citizens of the State in which they reside. The land law from which anti-Japanese on the Pacific coast expected so much seems to have become stalled before it got started.

Mr. President, this decision bears a remarkable resemblance to the Dred Scott decision on slavery a few years prior to the Civil War. The Dred Scott decision anchored slavery to the Constitution and made war inevitable. This decision—and it will doubtless be sustained by the higher courts—anchors Japanese land ownership to the Constitution, and serious results are inevitable unless the problem is taken in hand.

Mr. President, why should we attempt to deceive ourselves into the notion that harmonious relations, harmonious treaty arrangements, are possible with Japan as long as this question remains unsolved?

No matter where they go the Japanese never lose touch with the home Government. The worship of the Japanese Emperor, obedience and loyalty to him, are part of their religion. There has been but one imperial family throughout the long history of Japan. It traces an unbroken descent for 25 centuries. The Japanese believe that the first Emperor was the grandson of the sun goddess, "the great heaven-illuminating goddess," Ameratsu, whom they reverence above all other deities, to whose shrine at Ise they make their principal pilgrimages, and who said to her grandson, the first Emperor: "This land (Japan) is the region over which my descendants shall be the lords. Do thou, very august child, proceed thither and govern it. Go! The prosperity of thy dynasty shall be coeval with heaven and earth!" Thus world empire is also part of the Japanese religion. The present Emperor is the one hundred and twenty-second in direct lineage from that grandson of the sun goddess. He is therefore a divinity himself and the Japanese, though they travel to the ends of the globe, retain their loyalty and allegiance to him. Keeping up the tradition, he never permits his subjects to drift beyond his tutelage and care. Wherever a community of 100 or more Japanese develops in America or elsewhere a Japanese association is formed under supervision of Japanese consuls and the Japanese Government, and the association practically governs the community. This is going steadily on in California. A tax is levied by the association for Japanese propaganda, a tax authorized by the Japanese Government. Japanese schools are established by the side of the schools of the country in which the community is located—Japanese schools where the Japanese language, Japanese ideals, and the Japanese religion are taught. About 80 Buddhist temples, or churches, have already been erected in California.

Japanese children born in America are American citizens under our laws, but unless their parents or guardians apply to the Japanese Government for permission to renounce Japanese allegiance before these children reach the age of 15, and unless the permission is formally granted, these children are also Japanese citizens under Japanese laws. Thousands of Japanese young men and women in this country owe allegiance, therefore, both to the United States and Japan. It is not difficult to predict which allegiance they would in a crisis prefer. The worship of the Emperor as a sacred being, the constant care of the Japanese Government, the preservation of Japanese customs, language, traditions, and ideals—the hostility of their American neighbors who feel that their own standards of existence are threatened by the Japanese, the influence of clan and family, and of the group unit in the Japanese economic and social system, the refusal of the United States to permit the parents of these younger Japanese to become citizens here, all these operate steadily to alienate the Japanese from everything American—to bind them closer to the Emperor and his Government. Thus there is growing up in the United States a population with which we can never merge—a transplanted Japan to which we can not accord equal privileges with our own people without imperiling our own civilization, and yet on whose equal treatment the Japanese Government will continue to insist, its anger and resentment increasing with our persistent but inevitable refusal until the arbitrament of arms looms on the horizon. It is a problem which must be met and mastered before it gets out of hand.

The special recognition accorded Japan through this four-power pact will make her all the more insistent on the abolition of all discrimination against her people. Her chief aspiration is equality of treatment for her people throughout the world, and every postponement of the controversy makes the final solution all the more dangerous. If I could have my way, I would not undertake any agreement with her until this question had been frankly and permanently set at rest. Sooner or later we must go to the assistance of our American compatriots in California and Hawaii; sooner or later we must make their cause our cause. It is the cause of the American farmer, the cause of American civilization.

It is evident that there can be no genuine understanding between Japan and America until the citizenship and immigration questions are settled. That this view is held also in Japan is evidenced by the fact that Viscount Shibusawa, known as Japan's grand old man, is reported by the Associated Press to have said in a speech at Tokyo on February 25 of the current year that the real attainment of American-Japanese understanding was dependent on the fundamental solution of the immigration question, and that the failure of the Washington conference to take it up was to be regretted.

The reference in Article I of the four-power pact to the harmonious accord now subsisting between the parties is false so far as Japan and the United States are concerned. Japanese presence, Japanese growth, Japanese acquisition in Hawaii, California, and elsewhere in the United States will prove an increasing source of friction with native Americans, and discriminations, restrictions, clashes will multiply. Thousands of Japanese are in the United States whom we have permitted to come, but to whom we deny naturalization or land ownership. Naturally they will claim the protection of their Emperor and their Government—and their Emperor and their Government will keep in close relation with them. Their children will continue to be claimed as citizens by both the United States and Japan, but in their hearts these children will remain Japanese subjects. The Japanese Emperor and Government operating in the very shadow of our flag, with association and with school, will take care that they so remain. The sense of injustice and of wrong cherished by the Japanese Government and people against us on account of what they consider an outrageous discrimination in the matter of citizenship, of immigration, and of rights in the United States, will deepen with the years. Considering the permanent and fundamental hostility of Japan, the ties and interests that bind Great Britain, France, Japan in a community of sympathy and purpose with which we have practically nothing in common—considering the further fact that the most unpopular nation in the world is the nation whom almost every other nation owes—it is easy to see at what a disadvantage the United States would be in any serious dispute under Article I of the four-power pact. We would be presentenced to defeat. The saddest part of it all is that the American people have been led to believe that the four-power pact is essential to the program for the limitation of arms, and is an assurance of world peace.

Senators argue that the four-power pact is necessary to arms reduction—that the nations would not limit armament without it—and then tell us that it commits the parties to nothing beyond mere conversation. And this brings us to article 2, which provides that if the insular rights of the parties in the Pacific are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation. If the parties should reach an understanding that the most efficient measure to be taken in a particular case involved force, may anyone reasonably deny that the parties would be morally obligated to use force? Observe that the language is not that the understanding will be as to measures that might be taken, but as to measures to be taken. The words "measures to be taken" are of like meaning as if they read "measures that shall be taken."

In my judgment, the language of this article is capable in honesty and candor of no other construction. And I am unwilling to commit my country to the use of force, in behalf of other nations, except in concert with practically all nations in a general league where the combined obligation of all would assure world peace.

The four-power pact sets up a group of nations that will lead to counter groups—an alliance that will lead to counter-alliances. It is a reversion to the diplomacy of a hundred years ago—the bloody game of powers against powers, continents against continents. It is our punishment for the repudiation of the treaty of Versailles, the rejection of the League of Nations—a maze of intrigue and deception—the outgrowth of secret whisperings beyond the reach of human records—urged as a basis for a so-called reduction of armaments that leaves the world with the largest land forces it has ever known in time of peace, the seas still choked with floating arsenals—a reenthronement of Machiavelli and Cæsar Borgia as the tutelary geniuses of mankind.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, an interesting and I believe an important issue has arisen between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain respecting the ownership of Wrangell Island. I have no intention of entering into a discussion of the details bearing upon this controversy, but desire to say that it is quite likely that Wrangell Island will have an important relationship to future aggressions on the Asiatic mainland, whether those aggressions take the character of economic penetration supported by military power or actual military invasion.

In the New York Times, in issues of recent date, appeared a history of the discoveries of this island by Great Britain and by expeditionary forces of the United States, their failure to follow up their respective discoveries with occupation and control, references to the importance of the island from the standpoint of Asiatic commerce, particularly the fur trade of Siberia, and the importance of Wrangell Island from a strategic and military standpoint.

I ask leave to have the articles printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The articles referred to are as follows:

STEFANSSON CLAIMS WRANGELL ISLAND FOR GREAT BRITAIN—THE EXPEDITION HE SENT OUT LAST FALL HAS ESTABLISHED POSSESSION, SAYS EXPLORER—TIMED TO FORESTALL JAPAN—ANY PREVIOUS CLAIMS OF AMERICA OR BRITAIN HAD LAPSED, HE HOLDS—NOW OFFERED TO CANADA—STEFANSSON DENIES THAT RUSSIA, TO WHOM THE ISLAND IS ALLOTTED ON MAPS, HAS ANY RIGHT TO IT.

"The British flag has been raised by a party sent out by Vilhjalmar Stefansson on Wrangell Island, one of the most important islands in the Arctic region, because strategically it dominates northeastern Siberia. The explorer now admits that when the little vanguard of his fifth and latest expedition, including citizens of the United States, landed on Wrangell Island, on September 21 last, its mission was political as well as scientific.

"Wrangell Island, which is about the size of Jamaica, lies 100 miles off the northeastern coast of Siberia and 400 miles west of Bering Strait, in latitude 71° N., and longitude 180°. For the most part it is a typical grass-covered Arctic prairie, noted for its interior granite cliffs, which reach a height of 2,000 feet, and also famed as the paradise of the polar bear.

"Following its discovery by the British in 1849, Wrangell Island was occupied in turn by Americans and British, both of whom, according to Stefansson, permitted their claims to lapse after five years, when neither country provided for continuous occupation. The claims of both the British and Americans were shadowy when the ill-fated Kariuk was wrecked off Wrangell Island in 1914. The right of the British to occupy the island was reasserted, however, when 17 members of Stefansson's shipwrecked expedition landed and later ran up the British flag. Following the withdrawal of Stefansson's men, the British claims lapsed again in 1919, so toward the end of the five-year period the explorer began the organization of his Wrangell Island expedition.

"The little party that landed on Wrangell Island for the purpose of reasserting the right of British occupation was composed of four white men and as many Eskimos. The American members were E. L. Knight, of McMinnville, Oreg.; Frederick Maurer, of New Philadelphia, Ohio; and Milton Galle, of New Braunfels, Tex.

"Only the leader of the party, a Canadian, was apprised of the real nature of the expedition when it started, and he was Allan Crawford, a son of Professor Crawford, of Toronto University. The Americans, Stefansson explains, became identified with the undertaking simply through love of adventure. But the Americans were let into the secret when the party landed.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT NOT IN THE SECRET.

"The expedition, which was designed by Stefansson to render an important service to his country, was organized without assistance from the British Government. Indeed, the exact nature of the expedition was not disclosed to the British Government until Stefansson went to Ottawa last Friday to make a report in person to Prime Minister Mackenzie King.

"Stefansson has tentatively planned to sail in the spring for England to report to the British Prime Minister on the results of his latest undertaking in the far north. But, pending instructions from the Government authorities, the explorer does not know whether his country will accept from his hands the gift of Wrangell Island because of possible international complications. He says he has established no personal claims by occupation of the island.

"The Wrangell Island expedition was organized and equipped by Stefansson in the face of many obstacles. The first problem he had to overcome was one of financing. Eventually Stefansson put into the enterprise his entire personal savings from his explorations, his writings and his lectures. Still the financial organization was inadequate. So the explorer sought the assistance of friends. To the generosity of the latter Stefansson attributes the success of the expedition.

"News of the arrival of the expedition was received in New York City by Stefansson on October 22, 1921, in a message signed by Commander Crawford, which was relayed from Vancouver, British Columbia. This message, dated September 21, 1921, read:

"'Arrived at Wrangell Island last night. Letter to you contains documents. Lots of driftwood and tracks. Looking forward to good winter. No ice yet.'

"This is the only message that the organizer of the expedition has received from his men, who are the first white men ever to spend an entire winter on Wrangell Island. But he said that the message, read between the lines, indicated that his party would be able to live off the country, for the driftwood was sufficient to furnish shelter and fuel, and the tracks meant there would be ample food and clothing.

"'I took into my confidence only one man,' said Stefansson. 'His name is A. J. Taylor, a mining engineer in Vancouver. The best men that I had to go north were American citizens, but being a British subject, and desiring to have this a British enterprise, I had to take some Britisher into my confidence. I decided on Taylor, and the latter, acting for me, incorporated under the laws of British Columbia a limited liability corporation called the Stefansson Exploration & Development Co., with offices in the Credit Foncier Building, Vancouver.

"'This company employed the following four men: Allan Crawford, son of Professor Crawford, of Toronto University, who was to be in nominal command, and then along with him two of my very best men, Lorne Knight, of McMinnville, Oreg., with me four years in the North, and Fred Maurer, of New Philadelphia, Ohio, who had been with me in the North and was a member of the party that occupied Wrangell Island in 1914. I sent also a boy, Milton Galle, of New Braunsfels, Tex., who had been with me on a lecture tour.

"'These men, without knowing what they were up to, except that I had confided to a certain extent in Crawford, went by steamer from Seattle to Nome, where I had chartered for them the auxiliary sloop Silver Wave. They sailed from Nome on August 8, 1921. The sloop was commanded by Capt. John Hammer.

FIRST BRITISH DISCOVERY.

"'Wrangell Island was discovered in 1849 by a British naval expedition under Captain Kellett, who sailed close in but did not go ashore. For a long time it was described in maps as Kelletts Land and was supposed to be a continent. When Kellett discovered this island it was assumed to be the same sought by Baron Wrangell, who in 1825 came down the Kolyma River, which has its mouth on the northerly coast of Siberia, and heard from the natives that there was a great land to the north of Siberia. He made seven sled journeys without finding that land.

"'In 1869 an American whaling captain, Long, of New Bedford, sighted Kelletts Land, which was not shown in his maps. But Long had heard of Baron Wrangell, his search and failure, and he connected the island he had sighted with Wrangell.

"'Long told of his "discovery" of the island and of his having named it Wrangell Land in an interview for the newspapers of his first port of call on his return, which happened to be Honolulu, where there were a number of papers published in the English language. His log gave the position of the island correctly, but the discovery which he supposed he had made did not constitute a claim for America.

"'In 1881 several American naval ships were searching for the lost expedition of Captain de Long, sent out by the New York Herald, when two of the ships landed men. The first was the Corwin, aboard which was John Muir, author of 'The Cruise of the Corwin.' This party went ashore for only part of a day, but another American ship, the Rogers, landed there a party who remained for two or three weeks.

"'Their explorations would give to America the claim to Wrangell Island if they had decided to follow it up. But this claim lapsed in 1886. The situation subsequent to 1886 was that both America and Great Britain had shadowy claims.

"'From that time nobody landed on Wrangell Island so far as I know. It was frequently sighted by American whaling ships, but they never took occasion to land.

"'Our ship, the Karluk, a British naval vessel, which was the property of the Canadian Government, and her men all in the employ of the navy, was wrecked just north of Wrangell Island in 1914, when 17 men went ashore and stayed on Wrangell Island from February to September. This is the only time that the island has been occupied.

"'The only Russian who ever looked for that island was Wrangell, and he did not find it. The only Russian ships ever in sight of Wrangell Island were the Taimer and the Vaigatch. They were ordered by the Russian Government to try to rescue my men when they were on Wrangell Island, but they failed to reach the island on account of the ice. Before they had time to make a second trial the war broke out.

"'There are no treaties so far as I have been able to discover that have any bearing on the ownership of Wrangell Island. It is commonly supposed that under the terms of the treaty by which Alaska was ceded to the United States the right of Russia to any territory to the west of the boundary of Alaska was recognized, but there is no such paragraph in that document, as can be readily ascertained by anyone who will take the trouble to look up the treaty.'

"The fact that Wrangell Island had been identified by map coloration as a possession of Russia is attributed by Stefansson to the irresponsibility or ignorance of publishers. When it was pointed out that some maps issued by the United States Government showed Wrangell Island in the same color as Russia, he insisted that such an error on the part of the Government map makers was likely to occur in view of the limitations of some clerk in the employ of the Government."

DISPUTE CLAIMS TO WRANGELL LAND—AMERICAN SCIENTISTS POINT TO OUR NAVY'S DISCOVERY PRIOR TO STEFANSSON'S—TWO LANDINGS MADE IN 1881—E. W. NELSON, ONE OF THE DISCOVERERS, TELLS OF PLANTING FLAGS AND TAKING POSSESSION

[Special to the New York Times.]

WASHINGTON, March 20.

"The claim advanced by Vilhjalmur Stefansson that his recent explorations have established British sovereignty over Wrangell Island, or Wrangell Land, is challenged by American scientists and explorers.

"The only claim, they say, that Stefansson can lay to the island is by right of discovery, and any such claim is negatived by prior discovery, the island having been taken possession of twice within a space of two weeks in August, 1881, by officially accredited expeditions of the United States Government.

"State Department officials would not comment to-night on the claims made by Stefansson.

"The two American expeditionary forces that planted the American flag and laid claim to Wrangell Island in the summer of 1881 had been sent into the Arctic region with instructions to search for the missing cruiser Jeanette, which had been sent out in command of Lieut. Commander George W. de Long on an expedition the object of which was to drift across the Polar Sea. The Jeanette had not been heard from for more than two years, and the American Government sent out five expeditions in 1881 to hunt for the missing steamer, which was later found to have been crushed in the ice, only a few of her crew managing to make their way to the Siberian mainland.

"One of these relief expeditions went in the revenue cutter Corwin, commanded by Capt. C. L. Hopper, United States Navy, and another was sent in the Rodgers, a United States naval vessel, which had been converted for the purpose from a steam whaler and was commanded by Lieut. Robert M. Berry, United States Navy. De Long of the Jeannette had stated his intention of landing on Wrangell Land, as it was then called, and both the Corwin and Rodgers headed for that region and with some difficulty landed forces on Wrangell Land. Both planted the American flag and both left records in bottles in a cairn.

"The landing party from the Corwin was the first body of explorers that ever made a landing on Wrangell Land. The late John Muir, naturalist, was one of the men in the open boat from the Corwin who landed and took possession of the land in the name of the United States Government. There are several scientists in Washington to-day who were in that little group of explorers. One of them is Edward William Nelson, who since 1890 has been with the Bureau of Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture, of which he is now chief.

"'Any claim that Stefansson lays to Wrangell Island by right of discovery,' said Mr. Nelson to the New York Times correspondent to-night, 'is offset by the fact that the United States can set up a priority claim. For nearly a century Wrangell Land had been known to the world of exploration. Lying about 100 miles off the northern coast of Siberia, but considerably west of Bering Strait, Wrangell Land had been known to the Russians and others for a long time. Many efforts had been made to reach Wrangell Land over the ice. They had failed. In the search for the missing Jeannette, forces from both the revenue cutter Corwin and the naval vessel Rodgers landed on what was then known on the maps as Wrangell Land.

"'I was in the open boat that went from the Corwin and landed on Wrangell Land,' said Mr. Nelson. 'John Muir, the naturalist, as well as Captain Hopper, the commander of the Corwin, and others, were in the boat. We landed, erected an American flag, took possession in the name of the United States by right of discovery, and left a written record in a bottle in a cairn which we had erected. We were the first explorers to land on the island. We established America's prior claim.

"'Within a few weeks, although we did not learn of this until we came back from Wrangell, Lieutenant Berry and a naval force from the Rodgers also landed on the island. Lieutenant Berry's force was the first to establish the fact that it was an island and not a continent, as had been previously supposed. Before that Wrangell Land had been shown on the maps as an Arctic continent. Lieutenant Berry's force spent some time on the island, went all around its shores, surveyed and mapped the island, found the cairn our party from the Corwin had erected, copied the record we had left, brought the original back to Washington, and left the copy of our record, with their record, in the cairn. Lieutenant Berry's force also planted the American flag.

"'So, you see, both the Corwin party and the Rodgers party took possession of the island by right of discovery, and that was within a space of a few weeks.'"

"Mr. Nelson did not care to comment on the political aspects of the action taken by Stefansson; but it was learned in an informed quarter that information had reached Washington that British, or Canadian, interests had been considering the establishment on Wrangell Island of a Hudson Bay Co. trading post, and it was pointed out by Government scientists here to-night that such a post would have a strategic value with respect to northeastern Siberia and its wealth of fur. It is learned that there is a fear in some quarters that possession of such a strategic point might, if unchallenged by the United States Government, result in British fur interests elbowing Nome and other American fur interests out of the Siberian fur trade.

"The Supreme Court has held that by the law of nations, which all States have recognized, dominion over new territory may be acquired by discovery and occupation, as well as by cession and conquest; but it has been held that discovery alone is not enough to give dominion and jurisdiction unless followed by possession."

"The State Department admitted yesterday that Vilhjalmur Stefansson's claim that his recent explorations established British sovereignty over Wrangell Island has led it to study the whole question, with a view to taking a firm stand on such American rights as were gained by the expedition of 1881. American air strategists feel that flying progress has given new importance to the Arctic position."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, soon after the convening of the Washington conference, that is, November 28, 1921, I gave a brief interview to the press concerning the conference. I think it has some relation to the matter under discussion, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD in the usual 8-point type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"The suggestion alleged to have emanated from the White House, that the Washington conference is the germ of an association of nations, will not only be disquieting to many, but will have the effect of opening a Pandora's box. The purpose of the conference was not clearly understood by many and its proceedings have not led to a clarification of the situation. There were those who believed that a conference of a few nations could and would limit naval armaments and they saw in the conference a most hopeful prospect. Still others believed that a conference of three of the great naval powers of the world and three or four other nations would accomplish but little in relieving the world from the burdens of either naval or military armament and promoting world peace. Those in this category felt that the scope of the conference should be broadened and other nations invited, so that the entire question of world disarmament and the establishment of international instrumentalities as administrative or executive agencies of the participating powers, could be canvassed and determined. They felt that a conference of a few powers to limit naval armament, even though in the agenda the discussion of Far East problems was provided, would fail to accomplish any effective or beneficial results; that any agreement reached would be regarded by the nations as the basis of an alliance with limited and perhaps narrow objectives; that though it limited the naval armament of three powers and thus diminished the tax burdens of such powers, there would be no removal of the causes of war—indeed that the interpretation of such an agreement might be provocative of international disputes; that any agreement between the members of the conference which did not set up tribunals to interpret it and to enforce it would leave the signatories to the agreement in a helpless situation; and that such an agreement, if entered into, might contravene obligations assumed by some of the powers when they became parties to the Versailles treaty. And still others who were unrelenting foes of the League of Nations believed that the Washington conference would separate Great Britain, France, and Japan from the League of Nations and thus compass its destruction, which to such persons was a consummation devoutly to be wished.

"The uncertain and conflicting utterances of President Harding, both before the election and since, leave the average mind in a state of bewilderment as to what the White House suggestion means. To many—and I am in that class—who believe that the United States should have ratified the Versailles treaty and entered the League of Nations, the suggestion will not be enthusiastically received unless it shall be made clear that it is not the intention of the President and the proponents of this scheme to destroy the League of Nations and to attempt to set up a Republican or Harding or purely American league or union or association of nations.

"The overwhelming majority of the American people desire a league of the nations of the world for the purpose of securing not alone a limitation of naval armaments but world disarmament and the establishment of such international agencies through which the nations will execute their purposes and promote world fellowship and world peace. This feeling is shared by the people in every country. The world is anxious for peace and for such a league or association as will bring about disarmament and set the nations upon the highway of international amity and good will. Notwithstanding the defects in the covenant of the League of Nations, it constitutes a basis for world union, and if this Nation should unite with the 50 powers now members of the league the conference at Washington would be unnecessary and the small and narrow field which it seeks to cover would be lost in the broad and generous field of comprehensive purpose for which the League of Nations stands and which it is pledged to accomplish.

"If this alleged White House plan is to set up a rival organization of the league, it is doomed to failure, as it should fail. It would be a crime against humanity to seek the destruction of the league formed by the Versailles treaty. If President Harding desires a world union and world peace, he should address himself to the execution of the purposes of the league and to securing such reservations and amendments to its organic law as may be deemed necessary to protect the interests of this and other nations.

"There is no field for two parallel world organizations aimed at securing disarmament and world peace. If they are not parallel but converge, it were better that the convergence should be accomplished before divergence appears. Any attempt to set up another association of nations would provoke suspicions, jealousies, fears, and controversies throughout the world. I believe most nations are willing to recognize the hegemony of the United States in any plan or union which seeks the establishment of peace and the setting up of tribunals for conciliation, arbitration, and adjudication. This Nation could secure such changes in the League of Nations as would satisfy the American people and thus put our Nation in the way of becoming a member of the league, where it would assume an important and, indeed, a preeminent position. Thus there would be secured not only what the Washington conference seeks but much more—not only a limitation of the naval armaments of nations but a reduction in the naval armaments and the military armaments of all nations, even to the point of world disarmament. It is folly to talk of another association of nations while one already exists and is sincerely and with a broad and liberal spirit addressing itself to a mitigation of the sorrows and evils now afflicting the world. No narrow partisanship and no petty jealousies must be projected at this time to compass the destruction of the noble work to which President Wilson gave so generously of his life and of his soul.

"Neither this conference nor this Nation must send forth the word that unless the nations of the earth accept a plan of world union with the brand of this administration upon it, it must be destroyed. This conference can perform a noble and a mighty work if it shall bring itself into apposition with the league, if it shall provide means of contract with the league and its organizations which are now formulating plans for world disarmament, and cooperate with them, if it shall open the way for the United States to sit down at the council table, around which are gathered the members of the League of Nations and shall aid in enlarging that council until Germany and all other nations have membership therein. If that is its purpose and task, then its achievements will be memorable and President Harding and all who contribute to a consummation so glorious and beneficent will be crowned with honor and immorality."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, later I gave another interview, which was published in a number of papers, among them the New York Times, giving my views upon the conference, and expressing certain apprehensions as to results. I ask that it may likewise be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CALLS CONFERENCE LEAGUE'S RIVAL—FEARS EFFECT ON LEAGUE—EXECUTION OF ITS PURPOSE MAY BE BLOCKED BY TREATIES NOW BEING MADE HERE.

(Special cable to The New York Times.)

"Washington, D. C., December 18.—* * * Events transpiring, not only in the United States, but throughout the world, furnish convincing proof that a league of nations or an association of the nations of the world is necessary, not only for the economic and industrial welfare of the world but for its peace. The economic crisis in the United States, as well as in Europe, challenges attention to the fact that the nations of the earth must associate themselves together to prevent universal bankruptcy and restore prosperity.

DEMAND FOR ECONOMIC CONFERENCE.

"From every country appeals are being made for conferences to deal with economic and fiscal affairs. Business men, farmers, and, indeed, all classes of citizens, are asking for a world conference to deal with economic matters, to stabilize exchange, and to provide means of credit so that the products of fields and mills and farms may find markets where they are so imperatively needed.

"It is vital that the world have peace, that the military spirit be dissipated, and that opportunities be afforded for the resuscitation of business activities of the people. If we had ratified the Versailles treaty with the obligations and sanctions of the league, long before this the nations would have been at peace. They would have felt secure in their territorial integrity and their political independence, and would have voluntarily reduced their military and naval armaments far below the point sought by the Washington conference.

"What is needed in the world is trust and confidence. This will result from an association of all the nations of the world to promote peace as well as economic developments. The Washington conference is a belated effort to place the United States in a position which it refused to accept when it rejected the Versailles treaty.

"The purposes of the conference are praiseworthy. Undoubtedly there are some who are interested in having it called who hoped thereby to effectually destroy the League of Nations. They believed that an alliance between the leading powers participating in the Washington conference would set up a rival organization which would so discredit the league as to bring about its early dissolution. Doubtless there were others who believed that the work of the Washington conference would be supplementary to the work of the League of Nations, and that this conference and the league would harmoniously collaborate to secure the same end.

"But to those who believe in an association of the nations of the world to promote international good will and to secure the blessings of international trade and commerce the Washington conference will appear an imperfect instrumentality to accomplish that end. It will provoke criticism which always attends the formation of an alliance between nations, and by some will be regarded as a scheme to give to the four great powers participating in the conference undisputed power and influence in the Pacific and in the Far East.

"It is calculated to arouse jealousy and provoke resentment on the part of nations who have not been invited to participate and who may fear that their interests in regions referred to will be jeopardized and that a strong quadruple alliance will be formed which will seek to project itself into other parts of the world and to influence the economic and political course of other continents and peoples.

"In my opinion, if representatives at the conference from nations that are members of the league had frankly stated at the outset that while they were glad to take part in the conference and would contribute in every possible way to its success, they felt it their duty to announce that their Governments adhered to the League of Nations, believed in its mission, and would consent to no program which would contravene obligations flowing from the ratification of the Versailles treaty or in any manner impair the league or derogate from its authority and power, their sincerity would now be absolutely unquestioned.

CONFERENCE A CAUSE OF DISTRUST.

"Failure to take this course will lead the people of many nations to believe that the alliance here formed seeks not only to discredit the league but to destroy it. The Versailles treaty provides agencies and a comprehensive plan to secure not a mere limitation of naval armaments on the part of the three great naval powers of the world, but to bring about world disarmament. The purposes of the league are more comprehensive and the machinery provided to accomplish the beneficent results for which it was organized is adequate and will be effective.

"To some it may appear that the action of this conference is hostile to the program and actions of the league. Already a commission is at work, appointed by the league, to provide a plan for world disarmament. That plan may, and doubtless will, call for a far greater reduction in the number of war vessels to be maintained by the United States, Great Britain, and Japan. When that plan is announced will Great Britain and Japan adhere to the quadruple alliance program and the 5–5–3 naval ratio or will they conform to the requirements of the League of Nations?

"Obviously the treaty which it is proposed we shall now enter into, ratifying the 5–5–3 ratio, will prove an obstacle to the plans by Great Britain and Japan as recommended by the League of Nations. In other words, this conference may be an impediment not only to a reduction in the naval disarmament of the three contracting parties, but an insuperable obstacle to world disarmament.

"Of course, peace in the Orient is desired, and it may be supposed by many that the quadruple alliance insures peace in the Orient; but I repeat that the compact here suggested may be an obstacle to the execution of the purposes of the league and the completion of a program more comprehensive and bringing within its sphere of influence and operations substantially all of the nations of the world.

"It would be reassuring if the nations now at the Washington conference should declare that they have no purpose to impair the league or to interfere with its activities; that they only seek to supplement the great work to which it is dedicated, and they desire to bring this conference into contact with it to the end that the program of the Washington conference to limit naval armament may be carried out, but that the broader policy of the league may likewise be executed so that all nations will be brought into close and friendly cooperation, that thereby nations may be relieved from the burdens of naval and military armament, and the fountains of peace may perennially flow for the happiness and prosperity of all nations."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President I present a reservation intended to be proposed by me as a part of the resolution of ratification of the treaty under discussion, and I ask that it be printed and lie upon the table.

The proposed reservation was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table, as follows:

Provided further, That if the United States should grant to the Philippine Islands their independence subsequent to the ratification of the four-power treaty, the independent Philippine State shall be admitted to all conferences called under the terms of the said treaty and enjoy the same rights and privileges as the original signatories.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 22, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, whisper to us the language of the eternal that we may be in touch with things of infinite value. Keep us in harmony with Thy plan and enable us to get at the very soul of things. Carry our manhood to its highest point and help it to conform to the best that we know. Give range and vision to the thoughts that we think and to the life that we live, and may they be according to Thy will. Let us understand that obedience to vision means consecration to duty. Allow no cloud to flood it, but let the light of Thy Spirit direct it. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHICAGO, DETROIT & CANADA GRAND TRUNK JUNCTION RAILROAD CO.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a rereference to the bill (S. 3268) to authorize the Chicago, Detroit & Canada Grand Trunk Junction Railroad Co. or its successors or assigns to lease certain of its properties in the State of Michigan. The bill in question was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I am asking that it be rereferred now to the Committee on the Public Lands. The bill involves lands which, when granted to the railroad company 60 years ago, were a portion of a military reserve adjacent to Fort Gratiot. The fort is abandoned and there is no longer any military reserve there. It is not a matter that the military authorities are in any way interested in at all. It is a matter handled by the Interior Department. I have consulted with the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and it is with his consent that I am asking this rereference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan for a rereference of the bill from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on the Public Lands?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with business in order on Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to say that when this request was made yesterday afternoon by the gentleman from Wyoming I made objection. The reason I did so was that I had not received the bulletin giving the program of the business for the week and consequently had no notice of this and no opportunity to confer with the minority members of the committee whose business would be set aside if Calendar Wednesday should be set aside. Therefore, I made the objection at that time. I have since conferred with them, and I have no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the fault was mine in not having conferred with the minority leader. I was under the impression that he knew about it, although I realize now there was no way he could know about it. I should have conferred with him, as I ordinarily do in such cases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9606) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7881. An act to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to ratify the agreements of certain persons made with the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii, and to issue land patents to those eligible under the terms of said agreements.

H. R. 10550. An act making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I also objected to that request yesterday afternoon. My reason for doing so at that time was that I was not advised as to the form which the rule that it is expected will be presented to-morrow would take. There was a rumor that probably two days would be set aside for suspensions. I have since learned that that is incorrect. I now understand the form of the rule and I have no objection to the gentleman's request.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the purpose of this? Is it in order to take up the bonus bill or to permit the consideration of some conference reports?

Mr. MONDELL. In order that we may begin business an hour earlier and conclude the business of the day at a reasonably early hour.

Mr. WALSH. What will be the business?

Mr. MONDELL. I take it for granted that the first business will be the presentation of the rule making to-morrow suspension day, and then to proceed with such suspensions as may be provided for.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not care to venture a prediction as to what might come up under suspension?

Mr. MONDELL. That is a matter for the Speaker to decide.

Mr. WALSH. Well, until we know more definitely——

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman has a fair notion of what may be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman knows what my notion is, and if he will state that my notion is correct I shall not object.

Mr. MONDELL. I am very hopeful that the Speaker will recognize the gentleman from Michigan to call up the bonus bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman say that he is hopeful, or that he fears that he will?

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does not the gentleman think it would be well to meet at 10 o'clock, in order that we might get through the agony a little more quickly?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why should we debate this bill at all, if the rule is going to provide that no amendment shall be permitted and no motion to recommit? Why not simply put it through and let the Members of Congress vote on the proposition.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Florida that there are some of us who want to make a few comments on the report signed by the minority.

Mr. SEARS. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio, I think a few comments on the bill would be quite acceptable.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, permit me to assure the gentleman from Florida that suicides generally leave some written explanation of why they do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEARS. And in reply to that I would suggest that suicides better not leave any explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRIORITY RIGHTS FOR EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9633) to extend the provisions of section 2305, Revised Statutes, and of the act of September 29, 1919, to those discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and subsequently awarded compensation or treated for wounds received or disability incurred in line of duty, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9633, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. SINNOTT, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, and Mr. RAKER.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department, and so forth.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10871, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10871, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the various amendments now pending before the committee when the committee rose yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HILL: Page 17, line 3, strike out the figures "$250,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$981,975."

Substitute offered by Mr. CRAGO to the amendment offered by Mr. HILL: Page 17, line 3, strike out "$250,000" and insert "$1,963,951."

Amendment to the substitute offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 17, line 3, strike out "$250,000" and insert "$3,297,902."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the pending amendment. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment increasing to nearly $4,000,000 the amount provided for training pay for officers of the reserve corps. I rise in support of that amendment. When the committee rose last night three amendments were before us, and I want to make some comment on the whole matter as introductory to my remarks——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VAILE. A brief one.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the amount for pay of officers of the reserve corps is increased, will it not be necessary to change some of the provisos following in amount of appropriation?

Mr. VAILE. I think probably it will.

On page 3880 of the RECORD of March 14, in the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] appears a poem commencing:

"To safeguard peace, prepare for war."
I know that maxim; it was forged in hell.

The maxim thus derided was the solemn warning of George Washington to his countrymen.

I do not concede that even the gentleman from Mississippi is a greater statesman or a wiser patriot.

But I realize that after the votes of yesterday, scarcely a year after the official termination of our part in the World War, it is useless to try to persuade the House to look, even for a moment at the facts of our own history. The gentleman from Mississippi says: "This country can not ignore what is going on in the world." It seems that what we can ignore and what we do ignore is what has gone on in the experience of our own country. That experience is one year of war to six years of peace throughout the whole of our national history. We hope and believe that wars will be less frequent in the future, but no man can guarantee that.

Men still living can recall four of those wars. My own hair is not yet gray, but men of my age have fought in two of them.

But the advice of Washington is useless. According to the gentleman from Mississippi, that advice was forged in hell.

Incredible as it may seem, on the very eve of our action on a bill to provide several billion dollars for some four and a half million soldiers whom we had to train after a war had started, we find representatives of the people who will pay that bill getting up on the floor of the National Legislature and shouting that unpreparedness will keep us out of war. It never yet did keep us out of war. It never in all history kept any other nation out of war.

Our reliance, it seems, is still to be in the maxim—

God takes care of children, fools, drunkards, and the United States.

[Laughter and applause.]

Well, some day even the patience of the Almighty will be exhausted. Some day He will say, "You care nothing for the splendid heritage I have given you. You care nothing for the safety of the country which was won and preserved by the fortitude of your ancestors. I shall take that trust from you and give your country to a race of men."

There are none so blind as those who will not see. Let us take off of our coins the eagle, whose wings can range the sky and who can look at the sun without flinching. Let us substitute for him that peaceful and inoffensive bird, the ostrich, which can, indeed, run on the ground, but which buries its head in the sand, gracefully raising its rear elevation so that its feathers may be plucked at will by all the world. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen of the committee, this House yesterday, by a decisive rising vote, evidenced its most unwise determination that the United States shall have the smallest professional army of any nation in the world in proportion to its size. The question now before us in the Rogers amendment is whether we are willing to afford an opportunity for training to nonprofessional officers who in time of national crisis must furnish by far the greater number of those who will have to lead our sons in any future battles of the Republic.

To me the statement yesterday by the chairman of the subcommittee having this bill in charge was a very significant one. At page 4217 of the RECORD he said:

The War Department did do what the committee thought was a practical thing last summer. They did not have sufficient money available under the appropriation of $250,000 (the amount carried in this bill), so they tried out an experiment at Camp Meade, and they invited the reserve officers in the States contiguous to that camp to report at a certain time for voluntary training.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VAILE. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. VAILE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The gentleman complains that the gentleman from Mississippi quoted George Washington as an authority for his position on yesterday?

Mr. VAILE. No; on the contrary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. On the contrary. Did not George Washington also warn us against entangling alliances with European nations?

Mr. VAILE. That is not the question I am now discussing, although I do not believe we have entangling alliances.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. At the other end of the Capitol to-morrow they will entangle us with Europe.

Mr. VAILE. I do not agree with that statement at all. If there were a threat of entangling alliances, that threat was made in the previous administration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman agree that the four-power treaty entangles us with foreign countries?

Mr. VAILE. I do not.

I want to quote this further from the chairman of the committee. He says:

The result was very satisfactory, and several hundred of the reserve officers answered the call, appeared, and underwent a voluntary period of instruction in a very satisfactory manner.

Now, what does it mean, gentlemen? It means that those young men who have the time and money, or those who can make the sacrifice of time and money necessary to prepare themselves for their country's service, may be allowed to make those sacrifices, but those who would like to be trained, and who are too poor to take the training at their own expense, are to be barred. And the gentlemen who are forcing upon this country this most drastic reduction of our national defense are shouting on this floor that the Army is a caste system; a petty aristocracy.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VAILE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that when you arrange the Officers' Volunteer Corps in such a way that only rich men can go to a training camp you make an aristocratic class?

Mr. VAILE. Absolutely. We go ahead and make our Army a small and exclusive class, its officers regarded with suspicion and distrust, their number confined to the very few whom we are willing to train professionally and to the wealthy amateurs who can afford to take training at their own expense. There you have the real seed of militarism.

The fact is that the bill which is now before us is presented by men who did not believe in the principle of conscription; that is to say, the principle of universal obligation, even in time of war. They are believers in a system which would train only aristocrats for officers and which would take only our best and most willing youths for the ranks.

I wish I had the eloquence to convince you that the defense of the Nation can rest only in the training of a large number of its citizens without regard to their wealth. The reserve officers for whom training would be provided by the Rogers amendment do not constitute the professional establishment to which you so violently object—when their services are not instantly needed for your defense. They are citizens, anxious to keep themselves prepared for the highest and most self-sacrificing service which a man can render to his country. Let us at least give them this chance.

Of course, if war comes, we shall try to train them all, and many more, in a great hurry. We shall revise our opinion of the Army overnight.

Oh, it's "Tommy this," and "Tommy that," and "Tommy, go away";
But it's "Thank you, Mr. Atkins," when the guns begin to play.

Gentlemen, those of us who believe in a degree of preparedness, which our delegates to the arms conference took for granted at the same time that they were endeavoring to cut down the burden of competitive armaments and to lead the minds of the nations to thoughts of peace, still believe that the time to prepare for possible war is before, and not after, we get into it. We believe that a policy of no defense is not the slightest assurance against war but the strongest possible assurance of national extinction.

We believe that the time to prepare our soul for the future is before we are on our deathbed. [Applause.]

I hope the Rogers amendment will carry. [Applause.]

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to everything that has been said here. I disagree entirely with the reduction of officers and of the Army as far as this committee has reduced it. If that is to go through and this committee is sustained on that, you sustain their great reason for reducing the Regular Army, which is that its place can be taken by the reserves and by the National Guard. But the committee does not carry out consistently that viewpoint, because they slash the National Guard and the National Reserves also.

I have in my hand here a statement made before their committee, I assume—at any rate, made before the committee of which I am a member—by the men who, above all others, ought to know from experience what this country needs. Now, you may have a prejudice—it seems to exist here—against the Regular Army officers, but if there is any place in this world where training and education are necessary it is in the art of war; and those men, gentlemen, give up their lives so that in case of need they may go forth and bare their breasts to the enemy, to be shot down for your protection and for mine. It is an honorable profession. But you can have no prejudice against taking the evidence of the young men, not in the Regular Army, who gave up their business and their profession to go out and serve their country in this war. Can you get any better evidence than that? Is this committee as competent as those men who have been through the hell and the fire of war? Of course they are not. They love their country, of course, but when it comes to the kind of evidence that this House and this country should listen to I maintain that the evidence of the men who served in this war should be followed by this House rather than the evidence of a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman, who is so widely versed in military affairs——

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I did not say that. I said that these men were.

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). Who represents so creditably that great State from which the Secretary of War comes tell the reason why in a fortnight or a month he has changed from his advocacy of an army of 150,000 to an army of 130,000?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Why I have changed?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; why the Secretary of War has changed in his advocacy of an army of 150,000 to 130,000?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I have not changed. I did not know that the Secretary of War had changed. If he has changed, it is because he wants to get the best he can out of your recalcitrant committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. He stated when he was in Florida that he was in favor of 130,000.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I did not know that he was in Florida now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. KAHN. The Secretary of War has just had a talk with me over the telephone, and he denies positively that he has stood for an army of 130,000 men.

Mr. STAFFORD. Permit me to ask one further question. Why is it with the authorization of our present appropriation bill, providing for an army of 150,000, he had for three or four months stood for an army of 130,000?

Mr. KAHN. Because he could not get more than the 138,000 he has had; in every instance the War Department has always fallen down 10 or 15 per cent below the number authorized by appropriations, because of the number of men that have failed to volunteer for recruiting.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Permit me to supplement that. The standing ratio in the maintenance of the Army is about 10 per cent of the authorized strength, both in the enlisted and mounted personnel, the year round, because it is both physically impossible and mathematically impossible to keep every man supplied in one place up to the minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. The average here is 125,000. The authorization is 150,000.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thought I had five minutes more. I wish to get something in the RECORD in that time, if I may. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen on the floor yesterday said there was not going to be any war. Nobody hopes more than I that there is not going to be any war, but nobody thought in 1914 that there was going to be any war. It was not thought possible. I was in England just before the war. People did not talk about war. There was no conception that there could be a war, and I went to Germany about 10 days before that dreadful cataclysm broke out, and the people in Germany did not think there was going to be any war. Nobody thought war was possible at this stage of civilization, and they thought if a war were threatened the financial people in each country would be able to prevent it. But the war came. It took us all by surprise, and at that very time people from America were attending a peace conference at Lake Constance, and they had difficulty in getting out and could not get out with their baggage.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman has just stated that the people of Germany did not expect war 10 days before it began. May I make this suggestion: The mere fact that Germany was prepared for war up to the very last shot made it possible for her to start the World War at a moment's notice.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I am speaking of the people of Germany, not the inside clique of the army.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. But Germany was not only prepared, but she was overprepared. She had been prepared for some 40 years, ever since 1870. What I want for this country is a modicum of preparedness, and I say the excuse for a reduced Army is that we may depend more upon the National Guard and the reserve. We ought not to cut the heart out of the National Guard and the reserve. I say that because I do not think there is a man on the floor or in this House that can dispute that fact.

Now, this committee of the Legion, composed of men who served in this war, some of them at the front, some of whom served in the National Guard before the war, and some who served as reserve officers, and none of whom, so far as I know, need be objectionable to this committee, because I do not think they ever served in the Regular Army, came before us and stated that—

It is our opinion that the funds included in the Budget estimates are essential to the development of this program. We are convinced that the recognition given by the War Department estimates to the importance of the National Guard and the Organized Reserves represents minimum appropriations for the proper functioning of these component parts of the Army of the United States. We urge the maintenance of these items in their complete integrity.

The American Legion recognizes the national demand for retrenchment and reduction in governmental expenditures, but as practical men, who have learned the lessons of preparedness by the hard experience of war, we are confident that it would be a great mistake at this time to limit the proper functioning of the national defense act by a reduction in the estimates as submitted by the War Department and approved by the Budget Committee.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to indorse everything that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FROTHINGHAM] said with reference to disregarding the advice of practically every man in this House who has had any experience in the World War. It is rather curious that the Committee on Appropriations, when deciding on the military policy of the country, should feel justified not only in disregarding the advice of every one of its professional advisers as to what is actually necessary to a proper state of military preparedness but should go a step further, and, although there are Members of this body men who within four years had personal experience in actual warfare, they should assume to disregard the advice of those men also.

Yesterday we provided for an insufficient number of Regular officers, and the gentlemen who undertook to defend the position of the committee said we did not need them because we had the National Guard and our reserve officers. To-day we propose to appropriate an amount which is absolutely inadequate to the training of reserve officers—1,656 reserve officers, if you please, for 15 days a year.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] told the House yesterday that the German Army was defeated by the unprepared nations. The German, as a matter of fact, was defeated by the only nation that was properly prepared in the way of officers, and particularly a general staff. The German Army was defeated by the French Army in 1914, and if the French Army had not had a staff of trained officers competent to meet the German staff and trained German officers, the war would have ended in September, 1914.

If this war has taught us anything, it has taught us that the one need to-day in modern warfare is trained officers, trained staff officers. [Applause.]

Study the history of the British armies in France and what do you find, gentlemen? You find the most hideous slaughter and waste of life in 1915, 1916, and 1917; a succession of costly attacks, ending in comparative failures, with losses out of all proportion as compared with those made by the French armies in similar attacks. And then in 1918, what do you find? The British Army carrying on a series of advances on a huge scale, with almost perfect staff work in the way of supplies, transportation, and troop movements, and with a minimum of losses. What was the answer? That in those three years of warfare the British Army had prepared trained staff officers, men competent to handle great bodies of troops.

In modern warfare you do not handle hundreds or thousands of men; you handle millions of men. In this European war you handled them on comparatively narrow fronts. You had a division, say, of 26,000 men, attacking upon a 2-mile front, with two divisions back of them, and in one of these large attacks these two divisions would go through the first division and carry on. You had on a 2-mile front, possibly one road probably destroyed by the attack, on which to supply some 50,000 men and get up guns and ammunition to them. Gentlemen, in the name of common sense, can you carry on that kind of operation without the best kind of professionals? Yet it seems that to-day gentlemen are against the professional, and believe no technical training is necessary to fit men for modern warfare. Take our own experience. There is not a man who served in the Army of the United States who will not tell you that the one great crying need was trained officers. The reserve officers did well enough with their three months' training, but we were deficient in Regular Army officers competent to handle great bodies of men; and if anyone cares to make a careful study of the two major operations carried on by the American Expeditionary Forces, the St. Mihiel operation and the Argonne operation, I venture to state that he will find throughout those operations evidence of mistakes made owing to the fact that we lacked the necessary trained officers and the necessary staff. So, gentlemen, whatever you may do as to the number of men, for heaven's sake do not repeat the great error that you made yesterday. Yesterday you deprived the Army and the country of the needed trained professionals. To-day you propose to deprive the Army and the country of the necessary trained amateur soldiers by not providing sufficient money for their training.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLS. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. All this, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, is being done in the name of economy, if you please, within 24 hours of the time when this House will vote billions of money to pay a bonus. Is it to be the policy of the Republican Party as represented by the House of Representatives to vote millions for seeds and billions for bonuses, but only pennies for national defense? [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I believe the one man who has not learned anything from the last war is the gentleman who has just left the floor. If he is right we should have a standing Army of three or four million men. The gentleman seems to be planning for a possible future European war. I hope the gentleman will live long. He may be assured that neither within his lifetime nor mine will any American troops be sent either to Europe or Asia, or outside of the American Continent. The military participation of the United States in European conflicts is over. We have had one experience. That will be enough for this generation. No President will ever dare again to embroil the United States in European military conflicts. You Republicans would not have a majority of two-thirds in this House if the American people had really indorsed the participation of this country in the European war. Do not make any mistake about that. In your heart of hearts you know that I am telling the truth. You are here 300 strong because the American people did not want the last war.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman knows that it is very easy to stampede a people into a war if the press is put into the right position. When we were stampeded into the late war the gentleman voted against it. If the gentleman had been told that conscription would follow its declaration he would not have believed it. But it did follow.

Mr. LONDON. The President in his address in which he asked us to declare war against Germany suggested conscription. He knew that it was necessary to use coercion and conscription in order to get the people to fight, because the people's hearts were not in the European war. If America will mind its own business it will have no war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We were minding our own business when the Germans were sinking our ships.

Mr. LONDON. Oh, let us not enter into a discussion of the causes of the war. One can not do that in five minutes. It took us a long time to discover that the Lusitania had been sunk and that Belgium had been invaded. You know it was not until April, 1917, that we discovered that Belgium had been attacked in August, 1914. You know that prior to the invasion of Belgium there was a viler and more infamous invasion, and that was the invasion of Serbia by Austria.

Mr. VAILE. Does not the gentleman realize that the party on that side of the aisle had to win an election on the plea that you had been kept out of war?

Mr. LONDON. I know; but you Republicans had half the House. In April, 1917, when war was declared, there were 217 Republicans and 217 Democrats, and if you were honest and consistent and intelligent, as you claimed to be, you could have prevented the declaration of war.

You are in power now because the people voted against the Democratic President. Of course, you know all that. What is the use of telling you all these things? The expenses for the Army of the United States should be reduced to the minimum. You are still suffering from militarism. You can not shake off the language, the terminology of the war, preparing, large armies, large appropriations. Against whom is the gentleman from New York going to conduct military operations? Is he going to try to get Fiume for Italy and send American boys over there to fight for her? Is he going to assert the rights of the Kingdom of Hejaz? Is he going to send American boys to fight so that there may be a larger Serbia? What operations has he in mind when he talks about manipulating big armies?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I do.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] said it was necessary to train officers to be able to handle millions of men instead of hundreds of thousands.

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If that be so, then we must have a standing Army of over a million men to train our officers.

Mr. LONDON. Exactly; and when we have a million men, and the European nations are not in a hurry to pay the debts that they owe us, gentlemen will advise sending our Armies to enforce the collection of those debts by force.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. I ask five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to discuss this bill?

Mr. LONDON. I will. I am coming to that.

Mr. MANN. I do not think we will get along very fast unless we discuss this bill.

Mr. LONDON. What I have said so far has been said as a foundation for the remainder of my remarks.

Armies are conceded to be an evil. The builders of the Constitution knew it when they provided that no appropriation for the Army should be made for more than two years. They were suspicious of the Army and the psychology of the military crowd. Under the present state of society armies are employed principally in the suppression of industrial disturbances, and under present conditions that is probably their principal function. Is it the purpose of gentlemen who advocate large armies in America to settle our industrial problems by the use of armies?

The gentleman made reference to the bonus. The very fact that the bonus will be voted on to-morrow shows how expensive war is. Are you for the bonus in your hearts? I know you are not. Do you want to vote for it? No. You will. Why? Because militarism is in the air. A body of 500,000 organized soldiers is a political force, and every Member of Congress having 300 or 400 men organized in his district and having no jobs and nothing else to do but to work against him in the next election is a pretty serious menace to him. [Applause and laughter.] We will be voting billions of dollars for the pleasure of having established the Kingdom of Hedjaz. This bonus business should be taken in connection with what you are doing now. The less of an Army the less militarism, the less of money is taken from the Treasury of the people for the development of military ideals, the fewer men in uniform the better. Every American can be trained to be physically, intellectually, and spiritually a giant, so that America shall be an invincible force against any country—that is the kind of preparation that I would stand for. We have no ambition or desire for additional territory; the continent is big enough, America is large enough. Let us make it bigger and stronger by raising it to a nobler sphere of endeavor. Every cent uselessly expended for the Army is a criminal waste. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it is often said on this floor by way of a question as to the policy of having any kind of military preparedness at all, "Whom are we going to fight? Where will the next war break out? Who can tell us when we will be called upon to mobilize an army? What is the use of having an army if people can not give the specifications?" And as nobody who has not the gift of a seventh son of a seventh son, born with a caul, can tell where it will break out, so the argument is against us.

I want to relate a little bit of an incident which came to my attention when I was in France following the armistice. I fell in with some officers of the Regular Army in the army of occupation in Germany. In discussing the recent terrible struggle they said, "Do you know there was a curious phase of this war which came to every one of us boys who studied at West Point? We studied tactics and strategy under an old-time instructor at West Point. He used to put out before us maps of France which were related to the Franco-Prussian War, and particularly specialized in regard to a certain part of the French and German borders. I can remember those drowsy schoolboy afternoons at West Point when we pondered over those maps of France and Germany, and nobody dreamed, nobody ever dreamed, but that they were being simply employed for our instruction as models of what other people had done 40 years ago. Nobody dreamed that we young schoolboys at West Point, having grown to be officers in command of armies, some day in the future would be conducting war operations of troops over the very territory covered by those maps. It was surprising how many times I heard my fellow Army officers say, 'Is it possible that the maps that we used in the schoolroom for illustrations and that apparently had no bearing upon the remotest contingency that they would ever be used by the American Army itself are the identical maps of the region where these operations of the American Army are now being conducted?'"

Anyone who would have prophesied to those schoolboy cadets at West Point that they would have used those maps for warfare themselves because they were to fight in the territory of the mapped section would have been said to be one of those dreamers who think that the world will get afire and that we shall have a world war some day. And that is exactly what happened. Mr. Chairman, you never can tell.

I want to say a word in regard to the matter of the maintenance of the enlisted strength of the Army, which is to come before us soon. It is a fact, deduced from years of experience in the Army administration, that the enlisted or commissioned personnel is never up to the authorized strength, no matter if recruiting is being conducted right along under sufficient appropriations from Congress to keep it at the authorized strength.

It simply resolves itself into the same kind of tables that actuaries are familiar with, and which prove that you never can have the 100 per cent perfect in human combinations. With the personnel scattered all over continental United States and in our foreign possessions, with the time of enlistments running out every day, with the usual casualties incident to death, retirement, disability, and so on, which take place, it has been found from long experience that the Army is never closer than 10 per cent to its authorized strength, notwithstanding the fact that recruiting is going on just the same. That is incidental to the normal, peace-time operation of the Army, just as you men can easily appreciate it might be incidental to anything where the personnel has to be kept up in the scale of thousands.

Under the present authorization of 150,000 the Army is now short 16,785, and if you reduce the Army to 115,000 men and go away from here confident that you have provided an Army of 115,000 men, you should bear in mind that you have to reduce it by 10 per cent and figure that you have provided the United States with an Army of only about 100,000 men.

Do not be deceived. The appropriation which you provide will not produce the men you may think your figures order. Experience has shown that the Army will always be about 10 per cent short of the men we provide for in the law.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, this I consider one of the gravest matters likely to come before the House during the present session, with the exception of the measure that will be decided to-morrow. I do not understand how anyone who has heard the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], delivered with a degree of knowledge acquired by actual experience in battle, can hesitate to support the position that he has taken. We have shown, I think, in this House a disposition to treat the question of the military force we are to establish, the numbers that are to compose it, the equipment to be provided for it—very much as gentlemen sometimes treat a matter of political management in a particular district, where it becomes necessary for a candidate to square himself with a tide of popular opinion running counter to a position which his party platform has proclaimed. But the question before us is not one affecting a policy which the country may accept or reject without serious risk to its safety. It is therefore one to be met by comprehensive measures not to be evaded by ingenious expedients. We here in the House are not competent to decide from our own knowledge the size of the Military Establishment necessary to the national defense. We can under the Constitution fix its extent. We must do so. But it does seem to me that in discharging this most important duty we are taking grave risks with the future of this country if we disregard the advice founded upon knowledge and experience of those to whom we ourselves have intrusted the management of the national defense.

The War Department, the General Staff, all elements charged with the duty of guarding the country from foreign assault, have concurred in recommending a certain number of officers. This advice the committee has disregarded. I have not yet heard a single reason for setting aside the advice of our own military chiefs. I do not believe we can ignore it without peril—grave peril—to the country.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who on other occasions made very much the same speech the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] delivered here to-day. That was about 15 or 16 years ago. Perhaps the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] can recall how he and I used to stand down there in that center aisle, on opposite sides of it, but joining in ridicule and denunciation of the idea that there was a possibility of war among the greatest nations of the earth in this stage of civilization on a scale that would engulf in devastation and disaster a large part of the world. We contended then, as the gentleman from New York did a few moments ago, that the close interdependence of all countries in commercial activities rendered anything like a World War absolutely impossible and, indeed, unthinkable. But we have lived to see the nations which had reached the largest measure of commercial prosperity, whose inhabitants had spent their days in accumulating property and their nights in planning how to acquire it, plunging into the wildest, most destructive conflict ever waged on this earth, throwing away and destroying the very wealth which the philosophers insisted they would be so anxious to conserve that the mere possibility of war was inconceivable in a mad struggle of blood and slaughter without being able even to explain the causes that had set them at each other's throats.

I am one of those who have been convinced by recent events that as long as armed forces are maintained by nations you will have war. There is just one way to prevent war, and that is by all nations agreeing to put away arms. For that reason I am in favor of total and immediate disarmament, not partial or future disarmament, but disarmament complete, immediate, and universal. Unless disarmament be universal, it is impracticable—while any one country maintains extensive military forces by land and sea all other countries must establish armaments in self-defense. Under the conditions established by the late conference disarmament is impossible. One great country—the one maintaining the largest land forces—has declared that it will not disarm, and that ended the proposal. The actual result of the agreement reached between this and other countries is to make armaments permanent features of civilized life. At a time when the difficulty of maintaining huge military establishments was so great that their abolition seemed to be inevitable, we entered into a compact by which every country is afforded opportunity to keep such an armament as may be within its means. And that means that armaments will last just as long as human nature remains the same.

The absurity of this position we make apparent when we realize that in effect the three Governments which are going to fight each other on sea, if there is to be any fight at all, have agreed that each one shall fix the size of the armament the other is to maintain. This is about as sensible as if I before engaging in a fight with one of my fellow men should agree with him that neither one should strike the other with over 60 per cent of his full force. That is an agreement which might hold until one blow was landed on the nose of either, but afterwards all provisions of restraint would inevitably be scattered to the winds by both of us. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, we are to have an army. That much is decided. For what purpose is an army established—what purpose is it to fulfill? Is it not to withstand another army—any army that may be brought against us? In the name of God then, why not have the strongest? What are armaments for except to prevail against other armaments? Unless this be their purpose the money spent in maintaining them is a senseless, vicious waste of the public resources. We have before us now a resolution deliberately proposing to become second, or third, or fourth among the armed nations of the world. Could folly go further in the direction of neglecting our most pressing interests? But the Committee on Appropriations is not merely refusing to provide the military forces which the War Department declares necessary. It is actually refusing to provide means by which our unorganized military resources may be made available in a day of peril.

Gentlemen say the arguments in favor of adopting the recommendation of the military chiefs would justify an Army of a million. Without undertaking to analyze this suggestion—my time is already well-nigh exhausted—I will say that I do not think anything less than an Army of overpowering force in this country would be sufficient to force universal disarmament. I believe if we said to all of the world that while other countries maintained extensive armament we will outarm the strongest of them on land and sea; but, on the other hand, we would disband our military and naval forces when all other countries did the same, we would force disarmament immediate and universal. The moment we decide to take first place among the armed nations, second place is the highest that would be open to any of the rest. No nation wants the second strongest armament any more than any gambler wants the second best hand at poker. Possession by a nation of the second strongest armament is absolutely certain to invite disaster, just as the second best hand at poker is certain to entail the heaviest losses on the holder of it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to present this proposition to the House.

You have already reduced the Army to a degree that those in charge of the national defense declare is not safe. If you do not want an Army you can abolish it. This at least would result in an immediate saving of money. But there can be no sense whatever in maintaining an Army with the deliberate purpose of making it inferior to all other armies. I do not believe abolition of our armed force would lead to general disarmament. On the contrary, I believe it would stimulate armaments throughout the world. With us removed from among the armed nations, every country would think that it had a chance to establish the strongest military force. It will enter the game of armaments hoping to establish the strongest; otherwise they would not engage in the game any more than a gambler would enter a poker game, unless he hoped to get the best hand. We have decided that this is to be an armed world. We have, as matter of fact, made provision for permanent armaments. The question remains—it is the only question remaining—Are we to have an Army that is contemptible or one that is formidable? The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] says we will never have another war. I congratulate him on possession of that cheering belief. But suppose he should be in error, suppose that we should have war, what then? Before an invading enemy the assurances of the gentleman would be a very inadequate defense. Even though we put that gentleman in front and offered him as a sacrifice to the folly of his prophecy, it would not save one foot of territory from invasion. [Laughter.] We must deal with the situation of the country as it is. It is a deplorable situation that confronts us, and, indeed, the whole world. The nations have deliberately declared by act, if not by word, that war is possible if not actually probable. If we are liable to be dragged into war, in God's name let us make some kind of preparation for it. If we do not establish a standing army, able always to cope with any force that may assail us, let us at least provide means by which the body of our men in civil life can be quickly organized, promptly armed, and effectively trained to bear our part in war if it comes. There surely can be no sense in assuming war can not come and at the same time making preparations for it.

You are now preparing for it; therefore you are admitting and recognizing the possibility of it. But your preparations are inadequate and ridiculous. The degree of force recommended by the War Department is not sufficient, in my judgment, to meet our requirements. But this number of officers is all the military chiefs believe they can get. I think it is almost an act of treason for any man, either from desire for political advantage or through personal prejudice, to refuse his vote for that measure of force which the War Department, the body charged with our defense, declares to be absolutely the very least that can safely be established. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the question that every Member is asking is as to his duty in the premise. I voted for the Army reorganization bill that provided for a maximum Army of 225,000. I remember the debate on that bill when the Committee on Military Affairs, which is fighting for a larger Army, assured the Congress that there was no Army of 285,000 contemplated in peace times, but it would be the duty of Congress in this bill from year to year to fix the size of the Army dependent upon the circumstances and the conditions in this country and our relations with other countries at the time we pass the bill every year. Now, what are the circumstances? I can not agree with my friend who has just left the floor. I have been here long enough to know that a man from New York, a Republican or Democrat from certain sections of New York, when he takes this floor, speaks for an Army as large as possible to provide for an appropriation bill. My friend from my side of the House, who just preceded the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], said it required experience in war to determine these things. How can I agree with him on that, even though I am such an admirer of his record as a defender of his country? I sat yesterday between two soldiers who went to France and who received stars for their services and who voted in the committee against a big Army, and they stand on the floor of this House with just as good a record as the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS]. What is the condition? Is it possible that the conditions of wealth of a neighborhood prompt the people in that neighborhood in their stand on the question of an army? No. I believe that every Member of this House, regardless of the financial standing of his people, wants to do the right thing under this. Who knows whether we should turn down this committee and agree with the Secretary of War, if it is to be along that line, or whether we should follow the Representatives of this body who have heard testimony for months on this subject? Some men say that they would rather follow the Secretary of War. You would have been in an awful hole if you had tried that before. If you had practiced that the last time this committee was before the House with a bill, you would have gotten yourselves into trouble, when the Secretary of War attempted to ignore Congress and to maintain an Army of over 200,000 men after we had only appropriated for and thereby fixed the size of the Army at 175,000. He met the general rebuke of his own party. No one defended his position in that. The next Secretary of War said that we could not reduce the Army below 150,000 at all, and he went to the Chief Executive of this Nation and begged from him a letter to this Congress telling us that if we reduced the Army there would be more obligations that we must hold ourselves in readiness to appropriate for. What a happy condition a Member of Congress would have been in if he had said, "I do not represent my people, but will let the Secretary of War represent them." Then we would have had an Army of 175,000, when the Secretary of War asks for only 150,000 to-day.

I am for a safe and conservative army, but I believe when this House sends out a committee, and they hear testimony for months, as this committee has heard the testimony, we should not brush it aside. Suppose we should follow the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS]. Suppose some one should read the RECORD to-morrow and take from it his statement and believe it. As I say, I sat between two men, and I am authorized by both of them to tell you that they are voting with this committee, as they do not believe that these highly technically trained officers here in Washington, that you talk so much about winning wars, are necessary. And if you want men to fight these Members will offer their lives. They know what war is. And I am voting with them and the committee of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TINCHER. I will.

Mr. MANN. If we were to blindly follow the recommendations of the Secretary of War, would we not have provided two years ago for a permanent army of over 500,000?

Mr. TINCHER. Five hundred and nine thousand.

Mr. MANN. A few odd thousand does not make any difference. Was anybody whom the gentleman knows in favor at that time in the House of following the recommendations of the Secretary of War on the subject of the size of the Army?

Mr. TINCHER. I am afraid there were.

Mr. MANN. I do not know who they were.

Mr. TINCHER. I am afraid the leader of this fight against this committee was. I am afraid the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, who declared for compulsory training service, was following him.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will yield, it was the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs who brought the Army down to 175,000 men at the very time that the Secretary of War was asking for 500,000. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. MANN. Which is proof, I take it, that it is not wise to simply follow the recommendation of the Secretary of War as to the size of the Army. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, the Secretary of War who recommended an Army of half a million is not the present Secretary?

Mr. TINCHER. It was the gentleman whose policies the present Secretary of War seems to carry out to the best of his ability.

Let me suggest this proposition: I was impressed with the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], because I know him and like him. He suggested that he was in Germany 10 days before the war and the people had no idea there was going to be a war. We are here representing those people of our own country. The Army knew that there was going to be a war. They had in their system of government prepared for that war for 40 years. To-day we will have our choice, and yesterday we had in this House, of either standing for the people who did not know about the war that they were going to have within 10 days in that militaristic, autocratic, Prussianized country or for those who are asking for a big Army. I will go for the people. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman, I know, does not want to misquote me.

Mr. TINCHER. No.

Mr. MILLS. I did not state that I was in Germany when the war broke out.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I stated that.

Mr. TINCHER. Well, I admire one of you as much as I do the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. That is very sweet of you. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes. You are nice-looking men, both of you.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I reciprocate the compliment. When the gentleman said that those who advocated a strong Army, as advocated by the gentleman from New York, come from the East, I beg to be included. I wish to state that in my judgment I was quoting what the military committee of the American Legion wanted, and the gentlemen of that committee included Dr. John Markey, chairman, of Maryland; Edward L. Logan, of Massachusetts; A. G. Thacher, of New York; Hanson E. Ely, of Iowa; George E. Leach, of Minnesota; John McA. Palmer, of the District of Columbia; Arthur F. Cosby, of New York; and E. B. Rickenbacker, of Ohio.

Mr. TINCHER. As I recall, you are speaking of something we voted on yesterday?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. As to the reserve.

Mr. TINCHER. I was answering the attacks that were made on the votes that were cast yesterday. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the debate on the pending amendment be closed in 15 minutes, of which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] shall have 5 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] 5 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SISSON. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Make it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that I do not approve of fixing the time so that people who have not heard the debate can be brought in to outvote people who have heard the debate, and I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on the pending amendment be closed in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in these questions it is absolutely necessary that we fall back on our common sense to meet the eloquent and able arguments of gentlemen who are shrewdly advocating a big Army. But let me say to this House that if the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] proves anything, it proves that we can not train an Army officer to meet the emergencies of the future unless he is accustomed to handle at least a million men, and we can not train him effectively except by having him handle those men in actual warfare, and if that proves anything it proves that America ought to maintain an Army of a million men and ought to engage in wars to train our commanders.

The same argument was gone over by the other gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], who said he was in favor of an Army of a million men, unless we were going to make all the world absolutely disarm. Where does your big Army argument lead you to except the extravagant backbreaking expenditures of maintaining an Army in this country for the purpose of being prepared with men accustomed to drill and fight millions of men, in order to prepare for a war that may or may not come?

The world grows as it marches down the ages. The palmy days of ancient Greece found the military countries engaged in wars perennially, and the whole history of Rome shows that every year brought a war, and the Temple of Janus was closed only twice in 700 years. The ages ran on, and the seventeenth century was full of wars, that came as often as once a year under Louis XIV. The eighteenth century was some better, but ended in a general conflict—the French Revolution. As time advances wars are further and further apart. Every argument made to-day by militarists for increasing the size of our standing Army could have been made after the Napoleonic wars of 1812, to show that that war had imperiled the United States, and that because of that the next war would imperil the United States. The truth is that we were not only drawn into that war but were humiliated by having our capital captured and burned. But the common sense of our fathers enabled them to return to sanity and refuse to keep up vast armies and navies. The truth is that the world grows sicker and sicker of military horrors and military burdens. I think that the man who does not see that the world to-day is sick unto death with militarism is not able to see far.

After the Napoleonic wars we waited until 1870 for another big international war, and that war was brought about by the towering ambition of one single nation seeking to dominate the European Continent. After that war we rested here in our far distant continent, justifiably too, as securely as we did in 1812. If we had followed the argument made here we would have maintained a standing Army from 1812 up to 1870, fearing that we would be led into a European struggle. We would have maintained during those years a standing Army of a million men, or at least half a million men. Yet men like General Grant, when the war between the States was over, cut down the Army of the United States, I think, to less than 50,000 men, and they were right in that course, and this country went along bearing her military burdens at least with little oppression and with a little budget.

Suppose we had followed the argument—and we should either follow it or discard it—of the two gentlemen from New York, of enlisting a standing Army of a million in order to train our generals, how much would it have oppressed our people and checked our industrial growth?

In 1916 it was shown that we were giving the mental training for officers every year to thousands of our young men, not at West Point only but in the military schools all over the United States. In 1916 these ran up into the thousands of trained officers. You can not train them in a college to handle a million men. You have got to train them on the chessboard, as it were, how to handle them in theory, how to handle them on paper. There is some truth, perhaps much truth, in the statement that it takes actual experience on the battle field to develop an officer. I think it does. Alexander, Hannibal, Cæsar, Napoleon, Wellington, Lee, and Grant were not developed into great soldiers in training schools or in the peaceful maneuvers of regiments on dress parade. But to develop a great soldier even in actual warfare the great soldier must be there to develop.

I hope we will not encourage or engage in war in order to develop great American generals, but I trust in full faith that in time of war, if it ever comes to us, America will discover and shortly develop the great commander and great soldiers sufficiently great for our needs.

As I have said, all through this country we are training officers to-day in our military colleges, at West Point and elsewhere. Let us have a little common sense and know that if a war does come the great American people are able in a short while to defend their shores against foreign aggression, and will do it without expending billions of dollars in time of peace for maintaining a useless standing Army. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I want very briefly to call your attention to the amendment that you are about to vote on. It is the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] to provide $3,927,902 to train 65,000 officers now in the Reserve Corps. That means less than $70 per man. It is the cheapest and best preparedness there is in all this bill. If you defeat that amendment, you defeat the very cheapest and most economical preparedness that you have. This Committee on Appropriations have provided $250,000 to train 65,000 men. That means practically $3 a man. These are not officers in the Regular Army. They are reserve officers. I appeal to you, gentlemen of the House, to vote for the $4,000,000 that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] has provided in his amendment, so that they will have a little money, at least $60 apiece to pay the expenses of the camps to train the reserve officers in the Reserve Corps.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, because I happen to be one of these reserve officers and feel it my duty to say something, I ask the attention of the House for just a minute or two in regard to two or three facts.

I went over to France in command of an Infantry company which was the size of a regiment of Civil War times, more than 300 men. I had sappers and bombers. I had trench mortar artillery, I had a one-pounder cannon platoon, and full Infantry rifle equipment besides. I did not have sufficient training. I could not have had sufficient training. Nor did the vast majority of our officers. I had had no military experience until I answered the call to go to Fort Harrison in 1917 and take the military training there, the best military training that they could give inside of three months. It included not only studying a great part of the night but working all day digging trenches, learning the nomenclature of military affairs, and how to handle men, and it also included a great many other things, such as scrubbing floors and cleaning cuspidors, and I did the best I knew how. Last year I attended a camp of instruction at Camp Knox, Ky., for the training of our citizens during the summer months. In 30 days I saw a miracle unfold. I saw how much better they had learned to train men. I saw 1,225 men increase more than a ton in weight. I saw them increase an average of one-half inch in height. I saw them increase more than a third of an inch in chest expansion in 30 days' time, and I say to you that it would be unbelievable if it were not that the facts were determined by a Regular physician and surgeon in charge who made the actual measurements. And the gain in morale, in alertness, in mental independence, is something that I could not describe to you. I say to you that if we do not make adequate provision for the instruction of the men in this country who are willing to meet an emergency we are showing a very shortsighted sort of policy toward the physical training and equipment of our race as well as an unfortunate mental attitude toward the very safety of our country and the preservation of its welfare. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations in its recommendations for the National Guard, appropriating a total of more than $21,000,000, and in the appropriation for the citizens' training camps just referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD], $1,800,000, without regard to the $1,000,000 that will be accredited to them in the way of clothing, trebling the appropriation for this year, in the appropriation for the training of the students at our colleges to become officers in case of emergencies, $2,750,000, have proved that there is no disposition on the part of the subcommittee reporting this bill to restrict or to limit the proper military activities of the Government. As to this item, we have carried the same amount as last year, namely, $250,000. The War Department asked many millions of dollars for the extension of this activity, $4,000,000 in round numbers; but even in that $4,000,000 no estimate was made of the necessary expenses for sustenance and light and clothing, which would involve $3,000,000 more.

It is the sense of the subcommittee reporting this bill that we are accountable not entirely to the military chieftains of this House who have seen Army service or to the military chieftains in the employ of the War Department, but we have a higher responsibility, to reflect the sentiment of the country in favor of economy. [Applause.] We do not in this instance curtail the enlisted reserve officer personnel. Of the 200,000 officers who served in the World War there are 65,000 in the Officers' Reserve Corps.

But we did not think it was essential that we should provide $1,500,000 of this $4,000,000 for railroad transportation of 30,000 of these reserve officers. But we did believe that this $250,000 could be utilized for sending to service schools those who wish to go more than 15 days, which is the limit in the Army reorganization act which reserve officers may be compelled to serve, and where they would receive for three months training that would be of real value if any emergency should call them to the colors. Now, it is merely a question of finance.

These reserve officers, 65,000 all told, to whom high praise should be given, are not going to be reduced in any way. They are not going to resign because of this $250,000. We believe that at the present time it is inadvisable to appropriate $8,000,000, notwithstanding the position taken by the various colonels and captains on this floor who come here by reason of their war service, which is very creditable to them, to echo the views of the Army officers. They seem to be obsessed with the idea that war is impending, and that idea seems to have taken hold of Representatives on the Military Affairs Committee who happen to have arsenals in or near their districts where they wish these activities to be continued.

Great credit should be given to the chairman of the subcommittee who, notwithstanding he has more activities of the War Department in his district than any other member, stands up here as he stood in the subcommittee, in favor of only that which is right. He does not believe in being driven by extreme opinions of the military chieftains which we find so general throughout this Chamber and throughout the War Department. [Applause.] So we say that we present a reasonable proposal. If you want a bill carrying $400,000,000—and I do not think there are many men on this side or on the other side who would want to go to the country in favor of such a large military budget—if you want a bill of that kind you will vote for the pending amendment, but if you are in favor of a reasonable establishment you will vote for the committee's proposal. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that unless we want to write ourselves down in the campaign of both political parties as a lot of liars and hypocrites you will not increase this appropriation, because if there is anything on earth that can wait it is this sort of a proposition. There is not a single one of you but knows that two weeks' training does not fit a man for an official command on staff duty or anything else, and yet here is a proposition cold-bloodedly asking this committee to give $5,000,000 instead of $250,000 provided in the bill. Go ahead and do it if you want to. You have the power, you have the votes to do it; go ahead, but when you spend $4,000,000 for these exploits in the summer time in my judgment you are squandering the people's money gratuitously.

You can tell something about a man by his history or something about his service in the past. When you find a man who has reached the grade of captain or as high as a colonel in any branch of the service, he comes here and poses as a great expert. He tells everybody who has not actually seen service that they have no business passing on military affairs or voting the people's money away for the Army. Why? Because he does not know anything about it. That is his attitude. If it is true, if that is the wise thing to do, why not abrogate the right of Congress to pass on these things at all and let the General Staff of the Army tax the people what they think is necessary to maintain the Army? Now, gentlemen, you ought not to sacrifice your right to think. Every Congressman has a right to think, even after he is elected to Congress and even after he is sworn in down here in front of the Speaker's desk. [Laughter and applause.] Therefore, if he has a right to do it he ought sometimes to think a little. And yet you hear men come before the House, not appealing to reason, not appealing to your judgment, but telling you what the General Staff and Secretary of War want. If we did what the General Staff wants the Army would be composed of 509,000 men and seventy-odd thousand officers.

Mr. MONDELL. That was a Democratic Secretary of War, as I recollect it.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, the gentleman from Wyoming wants to inject politics into the debate. This is the first time I have heard it. The gentleman knows as well as he knows anything, as well as he knows that he is the leader of the majority, that it was the General Staff and not the Secretary of War. I do not think that the former Secretary of War ought to be held responsible for that. I know that the General Staff to-day controls a great many votes in this House. By the way, they are great on propaganda. I did not believe that they were until the last few years. I thought that the Army was out of politics, but they are in politics up to their ears. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired, all time has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the various amendments be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL: Page 17, line 3, strike out "$250,000" and insert "$981,975."

Substitute offered by Mr. CRAGO for the amendment offered by Mr. HILL: Page 17, line 3, strike out "$250,000" and insert "$1,963,951."

Amendment to the substitute offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 17, line 3, strike out "$250,000" and insert "$3,927,902."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HULL) there were—ayes 28, noes 85.

So the amendment to the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered for the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAGO) there were—ayes 37, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 3, strike out "$250,000" and insert "$981,975."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HILL) there were—ayes 40, noes 75.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of enlisted men: For pay of enlisted men of the line and staff, $48,863,088. The Secretary of War is directed, under such reasonable directions as he may prescribe, to grant applications for discharge of enlisted men serving in the continental United States without regard to the provisions of existing law respecting discharges until the number in the Army has been reduced to 115,000 enlisted men, not including the Philippine Scouts. The provisions of this paragraph shall take effect immediately upon the approval of this act.

Mr. KAHN, Mr. SISSON, and Mr. KNUTSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi, a member of the committee.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: Page 18, line 16, strike out "$48,863,088" and insert "$42,665,583," and on page 18, line 21, strike out "115,000" and insert "100,000."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this matter was discussed at length when we discussed the item fixing the number of officers. I then made the statement that I thought that 100,000 men were sufficient. I stated then that 9,000 officers would be sufficient in the event you reduce the number of men down to 100,000. However, I agree with the chairman of the subcommittee that it does not necessarily follow that a reduction in the number of men means a reduction in the number of officers, because the officers are used for so many other purposes than officering the actual number of men within the service.

I want to state at the outset that in the event of war no one believes that 115,000 men would be enough, nor does anyone believe that 150,000 men would be enough. If it were a war that amounted to anything, a half million men would not be enough. In the last war we enlisted 4,500,000 men. One hundred thousand men in my judgment will serve the same purpose as the 115,000 men, because if it is for the purpose of doing police duty we must not forget that the officers of the National Guard say that at the end of the next fiscal year they expect to have 190,000 men in the National Guard. They expect to get 160,000 men by the 1st of July, and if they do, we will begin the fiscal year with 260,000 soldiers. If the Secretary of War and the President will do what the Secretary of War desires, namely, abolish all of these interior posts that are serving no good purpose at the present time, except to spend money upon, then you can take the 100,000 men and perform better duty in the United States than you can now with the 130,000, because now more than 30,000 are not in the United States. If those 100,000 men are stationed about where they would be most needed, you could divide them into five equal parts of 20,000 each, or of 15,000 each, and you would never use them, in my judgment, except for peace purposes—that is, aiding and assisting the governors in keeping the peace in the various States. One hundred thousand men are ample for that, and you will save not only the amount of money that would be carried in this amendment, which is the difference between $48,000,000 and $42,000,000, or over $6,000,000, but in many other items you would be able to save millions of dollars, in feeding the Army and clothing the Army, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. If you gentlemen agree with me, I think you can save twelve or fifteen million dollars in this item alone by reducing the Army 15,000 men. If I thought the 15,000 men would add anything to the service of the Army, I would not object to their remaining.

There is one thing I hope you will not lose sight of. Let us be practical in this House, let us do the practical thing. We know that we are going to have a contest on this item with the Senate, and if you agree on 100,000 men you will come nearer to getting 115,000 men in conference than you would otherwise. In other words, they will demand, in my judgment, the present law and the present number of men. If you want to reduce the number of men in the Army the way to do it most easily, in my judgment, is by agreeing to this amendment of 100,000 men. Personally I would not agree with the Senate to go over 100,000 men. I think that number is ample, because if I believed that the uniform and army expenses added to the strength of a nation I would agree to it, but I do not believe they do. I do not believe the Nation is made stronger by it. I believe the Nation is made weaker by a great number of uniforms. If you go into a country and find a uniform on every street corner, if you find the uniform on the streets in great numbers it is the greatest evidence that that country is in bad shape, because it needs an army to support the government; but it also means that the people are bearing on their backs a burden which they ought not to bear.

If the lessons of the past mean anything, big armies and big navies do not bring about peace, but they produce war. It was urged until this last war that it could not be otherwise than that we would have peace, because every nation was prepared for war. On the contrary, I do not believe that that is the true philosophy. I do not believe that human nature acts in that way. Germany was the best-armed country in the world and she sought to get to Constantinople in a few days and obtain the right to build a railroad from Berlin to Constantinople. If she could have gone across the Balkan States in a few days that would have ended the war, provided the nations would have agreed that she might have held some right over the territories through which her armies had gone. Now, we find the Government of Germany gone, we find it helpless. The head of the Government is a refugee from the wrath of his own people and is afraid to return to his own country. There is a monument to militarism and what militarism has done for a people. You find also that the next military despotism is also gone—Russia. Will men never learn anything? Will you not learn that you can not make nations strong with armies and navies? Will you not learn that the best thing to make a nation strong is to have well-filled corncribs and smokehouses, is to have a happy people everywhere, with everyone contented?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman really afraid of a military despotism in this country?

Mr. SISSON. Indeed there is nothing that I fear more unless it is the fear of the fancied security of the people who imagine that there is no danger of militarism in this country. The history of the past shows that nations never grow less militaristic, that they grow more so. We find on this floor that those men who served in the Army are the very ones who are championing big armies and are infatuated with militarism.

There are a few men——

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SISSON. I will yield.

Mr. HILL. In talking to men who served in the Army and who advocate a proper national defense, they have all said to me they had advocated that because they did not want to serve in the Army any more in the future.

Mr. SISSON. If I thought that sort of philosophy was the proper sort of philosophy, and if there was any sense in that, of course, I would want to have a big Army, but I doubt extremely whether any of those men are intelligent enough to talk to my friend about it——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. And I hope he answered it. But, as I say, gentlemen, that the war has taught this lesson, that the principle has finally been determined by great armies. Our fathers thought that when they provided that this national defense should be preserved in the first instance by State Militia, as they called it in those days, and up until a few years ago—that is, up until the passage of the Dick bill a few years ago—the United States for its police power relied upon the State Militia. We have not had a great centralized standing Army until within the last few years. The more you multiply the uniform of the standing Army of the United States you get that much farther away from that principle of freedom that our fathers intended for us. No, gentlemen of the committee; I do not fear anything so much as I do the lack of affection for this Government which will be caused by virtue of oppressive taxation, and when men realize that what they have earned in the factory or on the farm will be taken from them and given to these people who serve in the Army or Navy, or who occupy favorite places in the Government, that moment those people who are producing the wealth lose confidence in the Government. Taxes now are staggering; they are so staggering that both the great parties went before the people of the country and advocated a reduction of taxation. Not only went before the country and said that you not only did not believe in increasing taxes but said you believed in and would reduce taxation. Whether you vote for it or not, that is what you are going to say, and if people will look at this record you will vote in consonance with their wishes and their desires. Those men who vote for large permanent armies and navies are men who believe in the heavy expenditures of the Government. The only place you can greatly reduce expenditures is in the Army and the Navy. That is where you can, in my judgment, take off some $250,000,000 entirely, and if you mean what you say, you can without any danger to this country reduce this Army to 100,000 men.

You, my Republican friends, have the power, you have a large power in this body and in the Senate. You have an overwhelming majority here. Your majority is greater than our membership, and if you want to make good your pledges that you made to the people in order to get their votes—you did not say anything to them about big armies and navies. You said that you would reduce the Army and the Navy and thereby taxation, not a little bit, but you would reduce it very much, and have a radical reduction in taxation. Now, men may smile satirically here at these things, but I tell you it is serious. Now, do you mean it? In the course of a few minutes or perhaps within the next hour you will be called upon to vote. Now, will you vote like you promised? Will you vote like your platform pledged you to vote or will you not? Will you make good and save over $6,000,000 for pay of the Army and in the other items that follow where probably you can save that much money additional? Not only that, but if the provisions of this law under which we are now operating, this Prussianized army law under which we are operating, this army law that is as bad as anything Von Hindenberg ever asked, this law that is as bad as any Prussian militarism which we opposed and cursed so much before we got into war—under that law, as bad as it is, some features of it that are extremely bad by which when men got in the longer they served the more they get, the longer they live the worse it is, so the best thing this Congress could do would be to repeal that Prussian army law that is upon the statute books so that we could control some of the expenditures under the law without having to fill the bill with all sorts of provisos to control the expenditures. Now, gentlemen, in closing let me say that my position is one which is sincerely honest. I do not feel anything at all against those who may differ with me. On the contrary, when men have honest differences, if they are honest in their positions, they do not fall out with other men whom they believe to be equally as honest in their opinions. I know I am honest in my convictions, and I tell you I believe this is your opportunity to serve your country, to reduce the expenditures of your country, and that will not do any harm to the Army in the least. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, there is no question in the world that this is the crucial point in this bill. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi reducing the personnel of the Army from 115,000 men in the bill to 100,000 is in keeping with his position on yesterday in offering his amendment to reduce the commissioned personnel of the force. Now, as I look at it, there are three possible positions to take in this situation. As I understand it the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will shortly offer an amendment as to whether we will have an Army or will not have an Army.

If we are going to have an army, we must have an army that comes under the provisions of the recommendations that have been offered by the General Staff and are in keeping with the provisions of the act of 1920. Now, if we are not to have an army, but a mere police force or a fire department, then the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], as mentioned yesterday, of having a force of 55,000 men is——

Mr. QUIN. I said 50,000 men.

Mr. McCORMICK. Then the gentleman is coming nearer to a fire and police department than I thought was possible under the terms of the gentleman's amendment. As the bill now stands, as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, you neither have a fire department, nor a police department, nor an army. And in my estimation, gentlemen of the committee, we should not only vote down this amendment just offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] but we should receive favorably the amendment which later on will be offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], which will add respectability to our land forces.

Now, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is apprehensive lest we see uniforms here and there upon the streets of our country. There was a time not so long ago when the sight of a uniform, either of the Army or the Navy, was very welcome, not only to that gentleman but to 108,000,000 people of this country. Has it come to pass that the sight of a uniform in the United States has become repellent? Gentlemen may talk of disarmament, they may entertain the fancy that we do not fear any armed intervention or invasion of our country from any source, but let me impress upon gentlemen that international disarmament is not an accomplished fact. All we have before us is a treaty pending in the Senate at this time which is a mere proposition to disarm, but so far as the Army of the United States is concerned we went through a practical disarmament conference when we reduced the size of the Army last year from 175,000 to below 150,000. The only reasonable attitude to adopt, in my view, is that we should keep the Army to a size where it will be an army and not where it will be something else. It has occurred to me, Mr. Chairman, that we have fallen on evil days. We have forgotten the lessons of the recent past, when it was abhorrent to the ears of an American to hear the old song, "I did not raise my boy to be a soldier." We went through a period when that sentiment was ridiculed by the people of this country, and justly so, but I fear we are coming back, and at the present time have come, to a situation where that little old ditty is being revived right here in the Halls of Congress. And I wish to register my solemn protest, at least, against a revival of that sentiment. [Applause.]

Congress having had devolved upon it by the Constitution the duty of providing for an army and navy, should provide for a real army and navy, and I trust it will never be necessary, either when it comes to discussing this bill or the naval bill, which will later be brought before this House, to bring our quota below our agreement or below a reasonable margin of safety for the people of this country.

An army is a diversified thing. There are different lines of activity which an army indulges in at the present time which were unknown to armies in former times. Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to have a complete army if you are going to have any army at all. And so in the consideration of this bill we have got to determine among ourselves whether we want an Army or whether we want something else. And I assume that we do want an Army, as it is our duty under the Constitution to provide for an Army. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi the amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I have an amendment that I desire to offer. Would it be proper to offer it now or after the amendments of the gentleman from California?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TINCHER in the chair). The Clerk will first report the amendments of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. KAHN as a substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. SISSON:

On page 18, line 16, after the word "staff" strike out "$48,863,088" and insert in lieu thereof "$61,306,375."

And in line 21, after the words "reduced to" strike out "115,000" and insert in lieu thereof "143,000."

Mr. KAHN. What is it the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] wished to know?

Mr. QUIN. I wanted to know, in view of this amendment of mine, striking out "$42,000,000" and inserting "$25,000,000" and striking out "100,000" and inserting "50,000"——

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman can offer that after we dispose of these other things.

I have no desire to take up unnecessarily the time of the House; I simply want to say that the country ought to have an Army that can begin to function immediately if anything should happen. One hundred and fifty thousand men can not win a war. They can not begin to do anything of that kind. The only thing that that number of men can do is to train the citizen army in case it should be called upon to serve during a war.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield to the gentleman. I have just a few moments. I do not want to take up the time of the committee.

But I want to call to the attention of the committee that several years ago the Secretary of War made a proposition for an Army of 507,000 men after the armistice had been signed. Not only did he offer it once, but he offered it on a subsequent occasion when the Military Committee was considering the number of men that we ought to have in the Army of this country. The overwhelming opinion of the members of that committee was that 175,000 men could do what was required at that period of time, and this House properly voted for that number of men. We got along very well indeed during the peace period that ensued immediately after the war. However, as I said yesterday, no man can tell when troubles are coming. We have not recognized Mexico. We may have trouble down there overnight. We have a situation in the West which may lead to trouble. We hope not, but it may lead to trouble, and the best thing to do and the cheapest thing to do is to have a moderate sized Army that can go to work immediately in case a war should come.

I do not desire to take up the time of the House any longer. I hope the amendment which I have offered will be adopted.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. QUIN to the amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: In lieu of the matter proposed in the amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: Page 18, lines 16 and 21: Strike out "$42,665,583" and insert "$25,000,000." Strike out "100,000" and insert "50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, it appears that some gentlemen believe that an Army of 50,000 men is simply a police force. Do they forget that we had only 25,000 men authorized before the Spanish-American War? The United States of America, from the date of the unfortunate engagement between the forces of the Confederacy and the Federal Government, saw fit to have less than what some of you call a fire department for an Army, and the United States got along all right. All the people realize at this time that taxation is an onerous burden and that if we have such a large Army as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] desires we must have an irreparable and continuing burden imposed on us.

I desire to refresh the gentleman's mind about the size of this Army after the armistice, which the gentleman from California and all of the others except Mr. LaGuardia, of New York, and Judge WISE and myself, of the committee, reported out to this House an Army of 509,000 enlisted men and 28,244 commissioned officers. We whipped them on the floor of this House by the aid of gentlemen on both sides of the House going in with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] and myself. The Senate failed to pass on it at all, and a concurrent resolution was passed for the support of the Army, before final adjournment, March 4, 1919. Then, after the gentleman from California became chairman, at the special session called in May, 1919, he brought out a bill for 400,000 enlisted men and 22,000 officers, asking the people of the United States to stand up under that great burden of a standing Army. Again the Members of this House stood by me and other members of the committee and cut it out.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it does not seem that the gentleman from California was so much opposed to a big Army. I want you further to understand that I was not much taken up with the then Secretary of War, a so-called Democrat, at that time; and I will say this, that the gentleman from California did not agree to the big Army at that time in the committee, as he wanted 100,000 in the Regular Army and compulsory military training in time of peace and place all the young men in the reserve army, which would have made in a few years an army of 9,000,000 men. If he could not get compulsory military training in peace times, then he wanted a big Regular Army. I am giving to the committee now what happened in committee and on the floor of this House. The last time we had up the Army appropriation bill the gentleman from California said when you reduced the size of the Army to 175,000 men you ruined the Army. He said when you put down the number of officers to 17,000 that you ruined the Army; when we reduced the Army to 150,000 men and 14,000 officers he thought we were ruining the Army. Now, when the Committee on Appropriations brings in a bill and recommends an Army of 115,000 men and 11,000 officers, he offers his amendment here raising it up, and he still says you are ruining the Army.

I think the proper thing to do is to adopt my amendment, cutting the amount down to $25,000,000, with 50,000 enlisted men. Surely it will not take more than 7,000 officers, including second lieutenants, to handle an Army of that size. You have 142,000 men in the National Guard of the United States, according to the figures supplied by the General Staff. Then why should we have over 50,000 men in the Regular Army?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Will you give me three or four minutes more?

Mr. KNUTSON. Unless the gentleman gets down in front I shall object.

Mr. QUIN. I will get down, then. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. QUIN. Make it five minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more. He has complied with the requirement. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIN. I ask again, Why should we have more than 50,000 men in the Army? Eleven hundred officers is too large a number to keep in the city of Washington. You have a population here of 400,000 people in the city of Washington. I want to say to the gentleman from California that you have enough officers in this city to handle an earthquake. Now, then, if you propose, my friends, to go back to fundamentals, why can we not reduce this army to 50,000? If 25,000 was ample and sufficient in 1897, why is not twice that number sufficient for this country to-day, with a splendid National Guard provided for, and when you have actually in existence to-day 142,000 men in the National Guard located well in every State of this Union, well drilled and qualified to take care of the situation locally? With that 142,000 enlisted men in the army of the National Guard and 50,000 enlisted men in the Regular Army you have 192,000 enlisted men under arms in the United States. Does this Republic need any more army than that? In all sincerity I reply to the gentleman who talks about 50,000 men being a fire department, What kind of a fire department is he used to? My goodness alive, think of a fire department with 50,000 men and 11,000 officers in it! I am afraid the gentleman indulges in hyperbole and does not respect the pocketbooks of the taxpayers of the United States. [Laughter.]

They are the people who need to have some attention paid to them by the Congress of this Republic. Congress has gone as a body too far afield. Some of you have forgotten the man who actually produces the wealth of this country. Congress is laying on him burdens here through all forms of taxation that will make it so that somebody must answer, and that answer will be at the ballot box of an outraged public.

You Republicans know some of you gentlemen have a discriminating constituency. [Laughter.] They will understand the difference between a great standing Army in peace time and a legitimate Army that they understand will be the proper safeguard for the United States as a Republic. They understand the difference between 7,000 officers and 13,000 officers. They understand what it means to carry on their backs 13,000 officers, with an Army, such as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] desires, of 150,000 enlisted men, with 67 general officers, brigadier generals, major generals, lieutenant generals, and a general. These people look to Congress to act as a board of supervisors in a county toward saving their pocketbooks. If a Republican Congress goes wild on every kind of extravagance it must meet its Waterloo, because the people will repudiate such conduct and actions under stress at the proper time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to speak against the amendments of the two gentlemen from Mississippi and also against the amendment of the gentleman from California. I simply want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we are carrying in this bill appropriations of about $224,000,000 for military purposes. For the agriculture of the United States and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor we are carrying total appropriations of $70,000,000. Now, I do not wish to be placed in the position of thinking that in this year of the world it is possible to reduce the Army to an ultimate minimum of cost; but I do want to call the attention of this committee to the fact that if there is to be any criticism of our appropriations for the Army it seems to me that criticism should be against the number of officers, and that it is in that direction that we are not getting 100 cents worth of value for every dollar that we spend. I know that the men responsible for the framing of the Army bill believe I am wrong in my philosophy; but I do not believe it is good policy, I do not believe it is the way to get the most out of every dollar expended to have 11,000 officers and only 115,000 men. I do not believe you can train an officer to fight a battle by keeping him at a desk in Washington. I do not believe you can teach an officer strategy by keeping him down in the War Department or in the War College. I have only to point your attention to the fact that in the late war the English Army and the French Army went up against a kind of warfare that they had never dreamed of before they went onto the battle field to meet the German Army. How are you going to develop that kind of military knowledge? You either have to advance on a program of military preparedness to the extreme or else you have to take the other of the two roads, namely, to have just an Army large enough to do police duty in this country.

I want to say again that I believe we could save $4,000,000 on Army officers and not damage the police powers of the United States one whit. I do not believe you can cut the enlisted personnel down below 115,000 and have very much of a police force. I had rather take the amount of money that would be saved by cutting off 4,000 high-priced Army officers and put that same amount of money into the enlisted personnel, and then the 7,000 or 6,000 Army officers that we would have would have something with which to work, to practice and experiment upon, and to develop in our Army tactics.

I want to call your attention to another thing. I do not believe there is any serious danger of this country growing militaristic at all. I do not believe it is necessary or wise to do that. Let us read history. I do not believe my friend from California [Mr. KAHN] is any more militaristic than I am.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I will yield briefly.

Mr. KAHN. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that when the then Secretary of the Treasury and the Chief of Staff were recommending an Army of 507,000 men, I voted to cut it to 175,000 men.

Mr. BEGG. I agree with the gentleman. I do not think he is a bit more militaristic than I am, as I said. He does not quite agree with me on the number of the personnel, but he has just as good a right to his belief as I have to mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BEGG. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEGG. I simply want to point out this thing in history, and I want you to observe it: During the past 50 years the militaristic powers of the world produced the poison gas and the tank with which to meet the enemy. As an offset to that the United States, having her small Army of 85,000 men, produced the reaper for the farmer. We produced the tractor to offset the tank. We produced 75 per cent of the inventions that are used by the civilized world to-day everywhere. We contributed to the happiness and prosperity of the human family. Now, if that is true, if in the past 50 years we made progress in the implements of peace rather than in the implements of war, I believe it is a safe guidepost by which we may go for the next few years and cut the Army to the very minimum, to the very bone if you please. I wish the committee had cut the Army officers to a smaller number than they did, although I am willing to follow their suggestion. But I can see no use for having an Army of 140,000 or 150,000 enlisted personnel instead of 115,000.

If there comes any fighting within the next 15 years, within the life of the Army enlisted personnel, that will be enlisted up to 125,000 or 140,000, there are the reserve officers all now trained who can be called upon if danger comes from Mexico, as suggested by the gentleman from California. We have not only the Army officers already trained, out in civil life now, but we have that great army of soldiers whom we can call to the colors in short order; and if trouble comes from Japan, which I think is a mere nightmare since the disarmament conference, and after to-morrow, when I prophesy that at the other end of this Capitol that treaty will be ratified, we can call upon those men who have seen service; but I believe that through the treaty which has been negotiated as a result of the armament conference the possibility of any danger coming to the western part of this country has been postponed 25 or 50 years. And if that is true, the finances of our country need trimming to the bone. We want to save a thousand dollars wherever we can, to say nothing of saving $1,000,000, and if we can save it on the enlisted personnel and get along without the great office force of Army officers, I believe, in common fairness and justice, we ought to save that amount of money.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, with the idea of limiting the debate on the paragraph and any pending amendments, I would like to ask the gentlemen who want to talk if a limitation of 25 minutes will be sufficient?

Mr. KNUTSON. I should like to say that I have an amendment here that I wish to offer, not on this particular matter but on the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. ANTHONY. There seem to be five gentlemen who desire to talk. Will it be satisfactory to have 30 minutes, 5 to be consumed by the committee?

Mr. SISSON. I should like to reserve five minutes for the committee on this side.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then let us make it 35 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] desires five minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I should like to have it understood that I be given an opportunity to offer my amendment.

Mr. SISSON. If I may have the attention of the subcommittee, I imagine that this will comprise all the debate on the Army proper, because after you have fixed the number of men the rest will be almost a matter of course. I do not want myself but five minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] wants five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that all debate on the paragraph be limited to 45 minutes, 10 minutes to the two gentlemen from Mississippi on the other side of the House and 10 minutes to the committee, and the balance to these other five gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 45 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know if I am included, as there seems to be more than five other gentlemen on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, General Pershing and every officer of our Army ask for some continuity of policy. They can not organize an Army if its number changes from year to year, and they have to diminish the number of divisions, scrap them, and send them into other divisions, changing corps areas and changing your posts. They have to have some fixed organization, and what we are doing now is not fair. In 1920 we fixed the Army at 175,000. In 1921 we fixed the Army at 150,000 men, and now it is proposed to reduce it still more. It is not fair to the patriotic officers and men who want an organization, and have a small Army, but a good one. We can not have an Army if we are continually changing our forces. That is my first point. I think the action taken last year was intended to be a finality, and it ought to be treated as such, and it is not fair to go back and say we will do something else.

The other point I want to bring forward is the one indicated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], who served in the Argonne. We must have a staff of officers who know something about moving large bodies of men. This can not be learned in a war staff college; it can not be learned at summer maneuvers. Our commanders and officers can not learn how to move a corps of 50,000 or an Army of 100,000 unless these officers have actually tried it and learned how; otherwise we go into war unprepared. It was for that reason that the War Department once asked for an Army of 500,000 men. We thought that was too much, but it was for that reason that we gave them 175,000; it was for that reason that we did not reduce the number below 150,000. I appeal to you not to go below that number, because we must have an Army of sufficient size to train our officers to learn how to make war.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, there are pending before the House three propositions which demand most serious consideration: 100,000, 115,000, and 143,000. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] urges 100,000 as an economy measure. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] urges 143,000, representing that element in the House that in all the years I have been here have been constantly for the biggest Army they could get the House to stand for. The gentleman from California takes much credit because at one time he did reduce the number to 175,000 as a limit. The gentleman urged an Army of 175,000 under a suspension of the rules when no amendment was possible, and when, if the House had a chance to vote its judgment, it would have voted for 150,000. The gentleman did it in order to save the biggest Army he knew it was possible to save. So to-day, when he advocates reducing it to 143,000, we have no reason to think that he feels that 143,000 is sufficient, but it is with the idea that that is the most the big Army people can get out of the House at this time.

The other proposition of 115,000 is urged by the subcommittee, and with my judgment of the committee and my admiration for their ability, I am forced to the conclusion that it was an effort to meet the differing views in the House and is a compromise; it is a compromise that is not appreciated by the big Army men. This is a time when we need to economize. It is the supreme need. We ought not to spend one dollar more for enlisted personnel than is absolutely necessary. Before the war we never had 100,000, and there is no need existing now that did not exist then. In addition to the enlisted personnel, we have the federalized National Guard, the civilian training camps, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps for preparedness for possible war. If we have to fight Japan, as gentlemen claim, an Army of 143,000 will not be any better than an Army of 100,000. It is simply a matter of police force, and if we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi we will accomplish that and save from $6,000,000 to $12,000,000. We should make that saving for the taxpayers. Besides that, the United States would appear before the world as the leader in the movement for disarmament. There are four great nations, four great powers, that must lead in the rejuvenation of the world—the United States, France, Great Britain, and Italy. We stand with France as one of the powers that do not want to go back to a prewar figure in the size of its standing army, but lack the excuse that France has. Italy has gone below its prewar figure, and England is going to its prewar figure. The only argument there is whether she shall reduce below the prewar figure. The Geddes report advocates a reduction of 20,000 below the prewar figure and the war office agrees to leave it at the prewar figure. It is urged by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that we increase our prewar figure by over 50 per cent, and the subcommittee recommends an increase of 15 or 20 per cent. Let us stand before the world not only as leading in the work of naval disarmament, but also as leading in the more necessary work now of land disarmament and not provide an Army 50 per cent larger than we have any need for at this time. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman of the subcommittee kindly inform me what proportion of the $224,000,000 consists of nonmilitary appropriations? For instance, I notice one here on page 114, an item in the interest of commerce and navigation, amounting to $27,635,000. Does anyone know what the total is that we are spending for real military purposes?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will find that information on page 11 of the report. For military purposes it amounts to two hundred and twenty-four million seven hundred and twenty-two thousand and odd dollars and for nonmilitary purposes, including the Panama Canal, rivers and harbors, and other activities exclusively nonmilitary, $45,630,000.

Mr. CROWTHER. Then, the $224,000,000 is specifically for military purposes?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; for military purposes proper.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, there has developed during the last two years, dating one year from the signing of the armistice, a remarkable change of sentiment in the minds of Members of Congress regarding preparedness that I do not believe touches a responsive chord deep in the hearts of the American people. During the war everyone, of course, was for preparedness, and there was a great deal of talk at that time that we were never going to be caught unprepared again. During the war, due to our success abroad, following the wonderful strides we made in this country in the preparation of an army, we became in a sense a sort of swashbuckling nation, parading around with a chip on each shoulder and suggesting that we could lick anybody in all the world. The pendulum had swung away over to the side marked "militarism"—not the Prussianized militarism that my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is afraid of, because there is a vast difference between that and the militarism which I have in mind. The Prussian Army as it existed on the other side was hated by the people. The people feared their army. The Prussian soldier on the street and in public places was rude and overbearing to civilians. In the United States we learned during the war to love and respect our soldiers. That is the difference, and that is the reason we shall never develop a Prussianized militarism in this country.

We love and respect the men who went to the front and made sacrifices that the imputation "Too proud to fight" might be disproved. And I for one am going to help them to secure a bonus, which has been so much talked of lately. [Applause.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] says, "Are you for it?" "Yes," I answered, "I am for it." "Do you want to vote for it?" he asks. "Yes," I answered, "I want to vote for it because I believe that we owe them for the magnificent service they rendered more than we shall ever be able to pay them."

Mr. Chairman, the pendulumn has now swung back the other way, and in the last Congress when we were talking along the line of having universal military training, suddenly this great revulsion of feeling became manifest, and we discovered we did not want it. Many Members of the House immediately got "freezerina pedallus," which is hog latin for cold feet, and wanted all legislation that pertained to militarism in any way, shape, or manner put on a high shelf. That is the condition in which we find ourselves to-day. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the committee members have been repeatedly humiliated on the floor when they have brought in bills during the last few months. To-day speeches were made on this floor which in war time or shortly after the armistice was signed would have invoked thunders of applause.

The gentlemen from New York [Mr. MILLS and Mr. COCKRAN] and several other Members made speeches of that character. To-day they were hardly given attention, the ordinary attention that would be demanded by courtesy. That is evidence of our lack of interest in this matter. I hope we have a decent sized Army maintained here, and I hope that my country will never again be caught in the trap of unpreparedness, baited with the cheese of pacifism. I never want to see her in that position again. Fear not the militaristic bugaboo of my friends from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON and Mr. QUIN]; they have been seeing bear tracks and hearing noises in the canebrake. Then, once in a while, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] comes down here and shakes the Wall Street bugaboo and says that New York Members, Democrats and Republicans alike, come down here and sing the same song in the well of the House, asking for a big Army because they are prompted to do so by the conditions of wealth that prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I understand that the time has been fixed and has been virtually parceled out. Therefore to grant the gentleman from New York additional time would be to encroach upon the time of others. If the time were not fixed, I would have no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more, the five minutes time to be added to the time fixed by the committee, giving notice that I shall not consent to anything of that sort hereafter during this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time fixed heretofore be prolonged for five minutes and that that time be granted to the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his kind intervention. It appears to me that the gentleman from the Middle West [Mr. TINCHER] has an idea that Wall Street is a sort of wicked hobgoblin that sits at the foot of his bed and keeps him from sleeping at night and steals his breakfast from him in the morning. Wall Street is the West and the West is Wall Street, and my friend from Kansas knows perfectly well that every man who is a bondholder, every man who has a considerable competence to invest, and there are a good many of them in his State and in every other State in the Union, is interested in Wall Street and keeps in as close touch with it as he can. It is the center of finance in this country and is as helpful to the interests in the West as any agency I know of. Let us quit these sectional references for all time. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the Regular Army has been reduced to considerably less than the strength required to fulfill the various missions it will be called upon to perform in accordance with the amended national defense act.

I hope that the good judgment of the House will prevail and that you will not be carried away by this flood of pacifism or allow yourselves to be influenced by the harsh criticism that has been hurled at the General Staff, the officers, and enlisted personnel of the Army.

Give us your support for an Army of 150,000; you have already reduced the officer personnel, which I believe is a mistake.

Help us to maintain our National Guard divisions and aid us in securing an appropriation that will enable our National Guard units to secure some measure of proper training; otherwise all interest in that splendid organization will die out.

The National Guard under our present plan is to become a most important factor in the national defense scheme, and any reduction in these appropriations which would curb their activities would be most unwise.

The National Guard has become about as much of an educational institution as it is a fighting force.

In the regiment that is made up of companies located in my immediate neighborhood there are now something over 1,400 officers and men who spend a considerable portion of their time learning many things that are extremely useful to them in their various occupations.

There are splendidly equipped armories maintained by the State without cost to the Federal Government at Schenectady, Troy, Cohoes, Saratoga Springs, Glens Falls, Whitehall, Hoosic Falls, Saranac Lake, Malone, Amsterdam, and Gloversville, and I know that our folks at home are all interested in and proud of having a well-trained company of militia.

We have had reason to be very proud of our soldiers on very many occasions, modest and unassuming in times of peace, but in the stress of war the finest fighting man the world has ever known. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph directs the Secretary of War to discharge under such reasonable regulations as he may prescribe any soldier making application for discharge who is serving in the continental United States. Doubtless a great many Members of Congress have endeavored to secure the discharge of boys serving in Hawaii, in the Philippines, Guam, and other insular possessions of the United States and have been turned down by the War Department by reason of the fact that the existing law prohibits their discharge. I can not see why boys who have been virtually exiled from their country by being compelled to serve in our outlying possessions under trying conditions for one, two, and three years should not have the same opportunity to secure their release from the service as those who have been serving within the borders of continental United States surrounded by all the luxuries and other things that make for civiligation. When the time comes I am going to offer an amendment to strike out the words "serving in the continental United States," so as to place all the boys serving in the American Army upon the same level, giving to all the same opportunity to secure their release from the service, and I am going to ask that you gentlemen on both sides of the aisle support this amendment, because it is conferring upon those who are serving overseas a mere act of justice. Gentlemen, I thank you.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with much that was said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER]. I agree with him that we want to avoid all sectional suggestions and thrusts and with his suggestion as to blocs. By the way, those gentlemen who claim not to know what a bloc is should study the part of their anatomy above their necks.

But both the dominant parties are pledged to economy and to cut down taxes. And that is not simply the old low-pressure cry; we all know the general situation. We all know something of the terrific expense that our Government has had in the last few years, and how it seems to accumulate. We are all pledged to the idea of cutting down expenses at every possible point, and it seems to me that the sensible way in which to do this is to do it in the way that the farmer does. For instance, when he has had a hard year and had a heavy expense and made a poor crop and sold at a low price, he puts off certain improvements a year or two until things get better. Now, if there is any one thing we can put off in this country, it seems to me, without any danger of any hurt, it is the matter of enlarging our Army—the whole matter of the Military Establishment. We have some two or three million men already trained, and some man in the War Department has recently said there were enough men already trained in actual war, the very best military training men can get to supply any reasonable demand that may be expected for the next 10 years. We have thousands of officers already trained, trained in actual war. Now, I do not claim we will not need to train any more officers, but we have them for any present emergency. We have all that we will need at an early date, and it is one thing that can be put off. It seems to me the one thing we can most easily put off and wait until a later date. I am for the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi and in favor of cutting down the Army to 100,000 and would vote lower than that if I had the opportunity. Why should we go on at millions of expense training large numbers of enlisted men and officers now when we have all we need and more.

Now, one other suggestion has been made here several times, and that is that we are showing disrespect to the opinions of our General Staff and of the Secretary of War when we disregard their recommendations. But all safe and sane legislation is a matter of compromise. It is a matter of getting together the views of the various people from various sections and compromising generally on the sane views of the majority. To say we must take all the opinions of the people who have put their lives into any one thing is unsafe. You take a man who has put his life study and his life efforts into anything, and it generally means that he has become an enthusiast on that one thing, and if left to his way absolutely would cherish that one thing even to the neglect of other things quite as important. This is aptly illustrated in the negro fable:

Ole Mistah Billy William Goat
Had all de whiskers he could tote,
And when he tuck and shaved 'em off
He got pneumony and a cough.

He sent for Doctah Rambo Sheep,
Who said, "Dat cold am mighty deep,
But," says he, "maybe you kin pull
Thru if you wrap yo'self in wool."

Then Doctah Gander come along
And say, "Dat cold am mighty strong;
My 'pinion is you sho' is dead
Ef you don't git a feader bed."

And den old Doctah Turtle come
And say, "You gwine to yo' long home;
You sho'ly never kin get well,
Ef you don't git yo'sef a shell."

And den ole Billy William cuss
And say he don't know who to trus',
But dey's all dead an' gone an' quit
And ole man William's livin' yit.

Every fellow thinks his wares are indispensable. Whatever else you have or do not have you must have his specialty, and so he is not a safe and sane guide. But there is reason why the Army people come to have this common human trait to a peculiar degree. They live in the Army, or we might almost say the Army is their life. They are subject to its laws rather than to civil law. Its stately decorum, its exact discipline, its absolute demands become more and more their ideal. They are not to be blamed for this; they are to be honored for it. Yet often, it seems to me, a big, a magnificent, a perfect army becomes, to their thinking, an end rather than a means.

But really our Army should be a means to national defense and nothing else. And it should be maintained, developed, and enlarged only in so far as is necessary to meet that demand. I claim that under present conditions 100,000 men is an ample army. Should demand arise for more, we have them in the walks of civil life—millions of men and thousands of officers ready at call.

Why spend even the money for 115,000 when 100,000 will do as well? And no man has showed that we need the other 15,000. If the extra millions required to pay and maintain the 15,000 is to be spent in any military line, we need it to care for the disabled soldiers of the World War and to pay the bonus which is evidently coming. And we need the 15,000 men in productive industry rather than as nonproductive consumers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a word first in reply to the suggested amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

The reason why last year and this year we did not extend the privilege to enlisted men beyond seas to be discharged on their own motion was because of the unwarranted expense that would be entailed upon the Government if such a policy was pursued. The enlisted personnel has the privilege of enlisting for one year or three years, and, after the termination of their first enlistment, of reenlisting for three years more. There are other reasons why it should not be adopted, such as the ill effects of destroying the tactical units in these foreign possessions, where it is so necessary to keep the men and where they are trained to the minute as to their organizations.

As to the justification for the committee's recommendation of 115,000 men, for six months or more the Army, including the Philippine Scouts, that number 6,900, aggregated 138,000, or, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts, 131,000. The War Department all this time has had the privilege of increasing that number from 131,000 to 150,000, but if I understand the testimony of officers and the action of the Secretary of War—and he is to be commended in that particular, and our committee is following out his policy—he was actuated by a desire for economy to curtail the appropriations this year by $50,000,000 in various activities, and he has not seen fit to have a wholesale campaign of reenlistment going on, but has confined reinlistment work only to the posts throughout the country, and thereby has saved the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars in that particular.

There has not been a time during the past year when, if the Secretary of War wanted to have the full complement of men in this time of industrial depression, he could not have secured the maximum number. But he has not seen fit to do so, and I applaud him for his effort toward economy in not going to the maximum and having an Army of only 131,000 men.

In December last we had more than 10,000 troops in Germany. It was the policy, until two days ago, to withdraw them all except 2,000 by May 1. Certain negotiations have come up recently which may have prompted the administration to withdraw the entire Army from the Rhine, for be it remembered, as the Secretary of War stated, that the German Government approved of our army of occupation and desired them to remain for helpful purposes. Ten thousand of those troops will return, which can properly be deducted from the other existing forces of the Government, making but 120,500 men in the Army in the United States proper. Where are the militarists in the face of those figures who say that we are wrecking the present Military Establishment by reducing the Army by but 5,000 men? It is conceded by the Chief of Staff that we have more men in the Philippines than are needed since the four-power treaty has been agreed to. I am not in sympathy with the provision of the bill which seeks to limit the policy of the administration as to where these troops may be assigned. I dissented from it in the committee, and I dissent from it now. Take these figures which I have presented, which represent the action of the War Department, with an Army to-day of 130,000, with 10,000 withdrawn from Germany, with more men to be withdrawn from the Philippines, with a greater number than is needed at Panama, and how can anyone fail to agree, no matter how strong may be their militaristic policy, that with an Army of 115,000 men, which we provide for here, that it reduces the strength of the skeleton Army that is in the United States to-day and has been for the last six months.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I have taken occasion to look up the records regarding the time when we reduced the Army to 175,000 men. We had provided for such a reduction in the appropriation bill. However, as a matter of fact, the then Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, paid no attention to the action of the House. He kept on recruiting and expanding the Army to over 200,000 men. Thereupon, under the instruction of the Military Affairs Committee, I brought a joint resolution to this House fixing the number at 175,000 men. It was passed here and was passed in the Senate. It was sent up to Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, who very promptly vetoed the measure, because it was too low. The veto came before the two Houses of Congress, and they promptly passed the measure over the President's veto. That is the history of that matter. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I will consume even five minutes. But I do want to say before the vote is taken that I have not heard a single argument advanced by anybody that ought to convince any Member of this House that 100,000 men will not be just as effective as the 115,000 men for peace times, and I do not see any necessity for throwing away the $6,000,000 of the people's money. I feel, therefore, that while it is proper for men to vote as they please in reference to every matter, on this one I do feel that it is a man's duty, unless there is a real, positive reason in his mind as to why he would rather have 115,000 than 100,000, to save the $6,000,000, and the $1,000,000 that will follow if you adopt the 100,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know whether I understand the situation correctly or not. The Army at present has how many enlisted men? About 130,000?

Mr. MADDEN. One hundred and thirty-nine thousand.

Mr. CRAGO. Including the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. STAFFORD. One hundred and thirty-two thousand. One hundred and thirty-one thousand on December 31.

Mr. MANN. With some of those in Germany, who will be brought home, I hope and believe, in the neighborhood of 7,000 in the Philippines, a large portion of which probably will be withdrawn in view of recent occurrences, I say if that is correct—and I do not hear it challenged by those who desire a much larger enlisted force—I do not see where there is any special objection to the size of the Army as fixed in the bill—115,000 for the enlisted men.

I am not in favor of making a reduction in the size of the Army which would make it so low that it is unable efficiently to operate in the country, either directly or indirectly, in the matter of instruction to officers.

Now, as a practical proposition, I am inclined to think, speaking of secrets publicly, that whatever the House does, the Senate is likely to increase the number of enlisted men by Senate amendment, and if we would make it 150,000, probably they would make it 175,000. If we would make it 115,000, I do not know what they will make it, but it will be something over that. I think in the end probably, in the necessary compromise that comes with legislation, we will have an enlisted force authorized in the neighborhood of 125,000 or 130,000—practically all that they have now in the Army.

If these troops are drawn from abroad, when they have power to have more, that ought to satisfy all on this side of the House. Of course, there is no way of satisfying some of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, who, when they had the power, refused to reduce the Army to 150,000. When they were making the appropriations and doing the legislating they felt their responsibility, and instead of using time mostly in buncombe they made the appropriations for a larger Army; but as soon as we had the power they talk about an Army of 25,000 or 50,000, or something of that sort. We can not afford to be guided by them, when we know they are not sincere about it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes on the substitute offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 84.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I call for a division.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 98.

So the amendment ws rejected.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KNUTSON: Page 18, line 19, strike out all of line 19 up to and including the words "United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, is there any time remaining for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. There is some time remaining.

Mr. ANTHONY. I simply want to make the statement that there are reasons why that amendment should not be adopted, the principal one being the great expense involved in bringing men home from the Philippines and our other outlying possessions, and the next the wisdom of not interfering with the tactical organization of those commands in outlying countries.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the chairman of the subcommittee has given a sufficient reason for opposing this amendment. I have a constituent, a boy who has a dependent mother, on the Canal Zone in the service. The boy has been informed that he can buy his way out. They are not interfering with the tactical organization when they permit that boy to buy his way out.

Mr. ANTHONY. If he could make proper proof of the dependency of his mother, could he not get his discharge?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then there is something the matter with his proofs.

Mr. NOLAN. Whether it is dependency or the possibility of his purchasing his way out of the Army that interferes, the fact is that he can not get out any more than if you would refuse to let him out under ordinary conditions. The boys in our outlying possessions ought to have the same consideration shown them at least as the men stationed in this country. There ought not to be any distinction between them and there ought not to be any penalty attached to the foreign service. Instead of penalizing them regarding their pay, they give them 20 per cent additional. If they are entitled to 20 per cent additional pay, they should have the same right to get out of the service as if they were in the United States.

I will say in passing that as to the Philippines I have never availed myself of the opportunity of going to the Philippine Islands, which I understand can be done at an expense of $1.25 or $1.50 a day, when one can take his family with him. It surely does not take more to transport a soldier to and from the Philippines than it does a Member of Congress, so that it can not involve any great expense to bring those boys back. The same thing applies to the boys located on the Panama Canal Zone. I do not think we should discriminate against those boys. We ought to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. KNUTSON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, $100.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL: Page 19, line 3, strike out "$100" and insert "$250,000."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this item as reported in the bill provides for the pay of men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, $100. In other words, it wipes out the Enlisted Reserve Corps for training purposes. The War Department asked for $3,927,902 for pay for officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps. This committee has just voted to appropriate $250,000 for that purpose. The War Department asked for $517,465 for pay of enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps. This bill appropriates only $100. This amendment provides an increase of this $100 to $250,000 in order that the men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, noncommissioned officers, may be paid as much as the officers of the Reserve Corps. Will you give to the enlisted men of the Reserve Corps less than you give to the officers of the Reserve Corps? Unless you pass this amendment you will give the officers $250,000 and to the enlisted men only $100.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman knows that if we provided for the training of the enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps it would actually take about 30 cents.

Mr. HILL. No; because I know that the War Department ascertained that there will be 20,000 in the Enlisted Reserve Corps by summer when the training camps are to be held.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman knows that in answer to my question as to the number of men in the Enlisted Reserve Corps the War Department replied that the number was negligible, which means that we have not any enlisted men for the Reserve Corps.

Mr. HILL. I can say to the gentlemen that there are hundreds of men coming in every month into the Enlisted Reserve Corps in order that the tactical units which are being created may have noncommissioned officers.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman can find any enlisted men in the Reserve Corps, he has a better spy glass than the War Department has.

Mr. HILL. In the Sixty-second Cavalry Division there are a lot of them. The War Department has asked for $517,465 for this purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. The War Department never hesitates to ask for anything it thinks it needs.

Mr. HILL. I am merely asking that this committee give to the enlisted men of the Reserve Corps as much as they give to the officers.

Mr. ANTHONY. But there are no enlisted men in the Reserve Corps—possibly two or three hundred.

Mr. HILL. The War Department states that there will be men in the Enlisted Reserve Corps by the time this bill becames available.

Mr. ANTHONY. But there are not now.

Mr. HILL. There certainly will not be unless this $100 is increased. I want to say one word more about that to the committee. It is necessary that you have an enlisted personnel. It is hard enough to get officers or noncommissioned officers to come back into the Reserve Corps, and if you cut out the enlisted men you kill that element of the Reserve Corps. You can not have tactical reserve units unless you have both reserve officers and reserve noncommissioned officers. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For aviation increase, to enlisted men of the Army, $150,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be available for increased pay on flying status to more than 500 enlisted men.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Gentlemen, while we are under the head of aviation, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a recent decision of the Court of Claims of the United States. It is the case of Rider against The United States, decided February 27, 1922. A decision was rendered by the court in favor of Rider, an ex-Air Service cadet of the United States Army. The court decided that he was entitled to increased pay of 50 per cent. The judgment rendered gave him $306 as such additional pay.

The Government contended that the provisions of the act of June 15, 1917, which established the pay of the plaintiff at $100 per month expired with the appropriations set forth in the act, but the court did not so hold.

The court said:

We are of the opinion that this contention is not tenable because of the provisions of the act of July 24, 1917, and of the act of July 9, 1918, which later act makes available the appropriations of the act of May 12, 1917, until June 30, 1919. Nor does it anywhere appear that there was any intention to repeal the provisions fixing the pay of enlisted men in training for officers of the Reserve Corps. It is hardly possible to conceive that Congress would at the height of the emergency, while the war was going on, reduce the pay which had been held forth as an inducement to the young men of the country to enter into training for officers in the Reserve Corps.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not alone to this phase of the case that I would direct the attention of the committee.

It is my purpose to bring to the attention of the House a letter which purports to have been written by Mr. Henry W. Driscoll, an attorney at law in Washington City, to an ex-Air Service cadet of the United States Army. I understand many other such letters have been written and, it may be assumed, to all men who were connected with our service in such capacity during the World War. Omitting name and address of party to whom letter is written, it is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have been able, after some time, to win a favorable decision of the Court of Claims of the United States involving pay and flying increase of Air Service cadets, United States Army.

As I am informed that you were formerly a cadet, I believe that I shall be able likewise to secure for you their pay at $100 per month for your entire cadet service plus $50 per month flying increase for your cadet flight duty, whether before or after June 30, 1918.

I send you therefore a power of attorney to be executed by you and returned to me promptly, together with fee agreement, so that I may proceed in the court in time for judgment.

I inclose an extract of the decision and opinion of the Court of Claims of the United States which I have been able to win after being rejected in the departments.

I would be very pleased to present your case before the court and serve you in the matter. Return the power of attorney to me duly executed.

Respectfully yours,

H. W. DRISCOLL,
Attorney and Counselor at Law,
714 McGill Building.

The question of ethics which may be involved does not directly or greatly concern the ex-service man, and I will not dwell upon this phase of the matter.

The fee agreement to which the letter refers provides that the attorney shall receive one-third of the amount collected. Authorities in the War Department advise me that the total amount of all such claims, to which reference is made in the letter, is estimated to be from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000. Should the attorney collect these fees under terms of the contract as set out he would receive for his services from $1,000,000 to $1,600,000. Section 13 of the amendment to the war-risk insurance act, approved May 22, 1918, provides that a fee of more than $3 shall not be charged. This legislation has saved many million dollars to ex-service men and their dependents and has prevented unholy grafters from collecting and demanding excessive fees from them.

If the provisions which Congress has heretofore adopted regulating fees to be charged for the collection of insurance, compensation, and so forth, is not applicable to the class of cases to which this letter refers, I believe it is the duty of Congress at this time to pass appropriate legislation to regulate and prevent the collection of such fees as Mr. Driscoll seems inclined to do, and such as he and others undoubtedly will do if the opportunity be afforded them.

I invite special attention to the paragraph of the letter which says:

I send you therefore a power of attorney to be executed by you and returned to me promptly, together with fee agreement, so that I may proceed in the court in time for judgment.

And again:

I would be very pleased to present your case before the court and serve you in the matter. Return the power of attorney to me duly executed.

Necessity for prompt action is implied in order that the attorney may proceed in the court before the claims are barred by the statute of limitations.

The writer must have known that the claims would not be barred until expiration of six years after the accrual of the right of action. Why such prompt action and why representation before the court, when in all probability the claims will be passed upon by the War Department without litigation? If all the litigation which the letter implies should be necessary, one naturally wonders if its author is not skating on very thin ice. Barratry is defined as the practice of exciting and encouraging lawsuits. Many of our States have such laws. A letter mailed in the District of Columbia and delivered in such a State would come within the rule. The postal authorities would be the agent of the sender and not the party receiving the letter, hence the crime, if any, would be committed in the State where delivery was made.

For one, I believe we have made enough millionaires from one war. The ex-service man has been subjected to enough hardships. He received about one-third the salary that was paid to those of similar capacity in civil employment. He was exposed to every hardship of climate and weather, to the ravages of disease, to gas, bullets, and bombs of the enemy. With him the war is not over yet, for 700,000 of his ranks walk the streets and beg for work while others are employed. I do not know whether the author of the letter remained at home during the war and profiteered. If he did, he has profiteered enough and should not be permitted to continue. If he were an ex-service man, he should not now be permitted to make a fortune out of his comrades in arms in the manner which his letter indicates.

If these ex-service men have valid claims against the Government since the legal principle involved has been settled, I am quite sure they will be able to collect their claims without the service of an attorney. No Member of Congress is unwilling to aid them, and I believe they can and will be glad to make the collection without any expense to these deserving heroes. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any amendment to offer?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I do not think such an amendment could be made to this bill, as its purpose is to make appropriation for the support of the Army for the next fiscal year and not to pay for services performed in the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. I fully agree with the gentleman that there should be general legislation covering an abuse of that kind, so as to prevent claim agents that hover in the city of Washington in large number taking money away from the ex-service men by these contracts.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin and trust that others share the same view. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of retired enlisted men, $4,500,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have received a short document which I am requested to read to the House. It is as follows:

MAHNOMEN, MINN., February 10, 1922.

To United States Representatives in Congress for the State of Minnesota:

We, the undersigned, representing the business men and farmers of the village of Mahnomen and vicinity, do hereby express our hearty indorsement of the fourfold plan of adjusted compensation for ex-service men of the World War, believing that it in a measure will adjust the difference between the men who served in the defense of our country and those who enjoyed the increased prosperity then existing while the service men were in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States.

And we respectfully urge our Representatives in the Senate and House of Representatives to do all in their power to carry this measure to a successful conclusion.

(Signed by 250 persons.)

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

The bill before the House makes an appropriation of $27,635,260 for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works and for the prosecution of projects heretofore authorized.

I dare say there is not a Representative of the people in this Chamber who does not realize that one of the greatest questions confronting the American people to-day is transportation. Rivers and harbors and the railway systems of the country constitute practically all the means of transportation, especially interstate and foreign commerce.

Undoubtedly much prejudice was at one time aroused against the expenditure of large sums on rivers and harbors largely because of efforts of the railroad companies in their publicity campaign wherein they denominated appropriations for rivers and harbors as "pork-barrel" legislation. They succeeded in their efforts to cut down the appropriations for rivers and harbors, and as a result drove most of the ships off the rivers and destroyed a large percentage of the lakes and coastwise shipping in the United States, and then immediately increased railroad freight rates.

To-day we find 80 per cent of the entire foreign trade of the United States passing through the New York Harbor. With a country 3,000 miles wide and a little more than 2,000 miles long, with every section of the country contributing to the foreign commerce, this commerce has to be hauled thousands of miles by railroads into the worst congested outlet and inlet on the North Atlantic coast. There is a reason for that situation, and that is the railroads of the country have been able to exert such influence with legislators and the Interstate Commerce Commission as to divert traffic to the North Atlantic coast to the great injury of all other harbors of the country and to the shipping public generally, and while other harbors have suffered greatly for want of proper maintenance New York's harbor has had millions upon millions of dollars spent on it.

The Board of Engineers, upon whose judgment Congress has until recently depended for advice regarding appropriations for rivers and harbors, estimated that it would take $63,000,000 to properly carry on the works for rivers and harbors of the United States. The annual report of the Chief of Engineers recommended an appropriation of $63,000,000 for carrying out projects authorized by Congress, but General Taylor cut that down to a little more than $42,000,000—in fact, $42,800,000. He based his estimate upon information received after having considered the necessary amount for each specific project. It is his opinion that the rivers and harbors of this country can not be properly maintained with an appropriation less than $43,000,000.

The Secretary of War recommended $13,000,000. Later on, after further investigation, he recommended $27,600,000. This recommendation is not based upon anything except an arbitrary wish to reduce estimates, thereby indicating to the public that there is an effort to practice economy.

The Secretary of War, while pretending to be economical in the spending of the Government's money in improvement of rivers and harbors generally of the United States, came before the committee of which I am a member, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, at a time when we were considering the bill to purchase Cape Cod Canal in Massachusetts and recommended that Congress pay $11,000,000 to a private corporation for a canal 8 miles long, which canal is at this time unfinished and not suited to heavy navigation. He recommended $13,000,000 at first for all the rivers and harbors of the United States, yet in his own State he recommended an expenditure of $11,000,000 on an 8-mile canal.

It is shown by the report of the Army engineers that the rivers and harbors of this country will suffer immensely and, instead of encouraging and promoting shipping by water, an insufficient appropriation will discourage the use of water for transportation. When we passed the bill in 1921 appropriating $15,000,000 for rivers and harbors there was an unexpended balance for river and harbor works of $37,565,230.11, which, added to the $15,000,000 appropriated, made a total appropriation of $52,565,230.11 for 1921 work, all of which is spent or will be spent by June 1 this year. The bill before the House provides for the year 1922 just 50 per cent of the money spent for rivers and harbors last year.

It has been shown at the hearings held by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of this House that business in many sections of the country is paralyzed because of the excessive railroad freight rates. Witnesses before the committee have painted pictures of business demoralization in many western States on account of transportation rates. They say it is impossible to ship farm products, live stock, coal, and many other necessities of life with the prevailing rates in force. They have pleaded with the committee to grant relief. The same witnesses have been before the Interstate Commerce Commission, as have hundreds of others lately, pleading for relief from the oppressive transportation rates, but so far little has come of their efforts. The voice of the people counts for little. The railroads seem to have their way with the commission. How long will this Congress sit supinely by and permit such shameful conditions to exist?

During the war practically all improvements on rivers and harbors were suspended largely on account of the inability of engineers to employ labor, and then it was necessary for the country to mobilize all its assets for the purpose of winning the war. To-day, with between five and six million people idle in the United States, with labor cheap, with hundreds of factories and mills shut down, and with transportation rates unreasonably high—never could there be a better time when money could be used to more advantage on rivers and harbors than now.

It is admitted by every well-informed man that the railroad facilities for transportation in this country are now and have been for several years inadequate, and since the enactment of the Cummins-Esch bill railroad building in this country has been suspended. In numerous cases railroads have been abandoned with the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

No greater economy could be practiced in this country by the Federal Government than to improve its rivers and harbors so that they could be utilized to the fullest extent by the shipping public. If this country returns to a normal condition, or even a prewar state, there will be a repetition of the congested conditions that obtained with the railroads in 1917. I know of no one thing that can contribute so much toward the solution of the transportation question in the Mississippi Valley than the improvement of the Mississippi River. Congress has on several occasions indicated, and even expressed itself, in favor of improvement of this river.

The State of Illinois appropriated $20,000,000 to open up an 8-foot canal from the Great Lakes to Utica on the Illinois River, but they never built the canal for the reason that as soon as the money was available the railroad companies, realizing that they would have such competition in transportation, reduced the rates on railroads, and, as I am informed, succeeded in preventing the building of the canal. Their action was with the permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Wherever there is water competition with the railroads the railroad companies have reduced their rates for the purpose of destroying water competition, but where there is no water competition the freight rates have been increased instead of diminished. How long must the people of the country bear such burdens?

It is shown that the rate on 100 pounds of hardware from St. Louis to New Orleans, 700 miles by railroad lines paralleling the river, was 44 cents prior to January last, while the rate on 100 pounds of hardware from St. Louis to Wiggins, Miss., in my congressional district, which is off the river, was 87 cents—almost twice as much. Under the new rates on the railroads paralleling the river they charge $1.73 for 100 pounds of hardware from St. Louis to New Orleans instead of 44 cents, and charge a rate of $2.08 from St. Louis to Wiggins, Miss., instead of 87 cents under the old rates; yet, with all the discrimination against those engaged in water transportation and in favor of the railroads, the water companies have been able to make money transporting freight. Does not this of itself make the best argument to this Congress for the development of water transportation? Many ports of the country are in imperative need of improvement. Commerce is increasing daily as the business of the country revives.

In my own district the city of Biloxi has a harbor that has been so badly neglected by the Government for the past few years that it is almost impossible for boats to come into the harbor on account of its condition. Recently many boats with valuable cargoes have been foundered in the harbor and were unable to deliver their cargoes in the usual way.

Gulfport (Miss.) Harbor, the natural outlet for the products of the great Mississippi Valley, which amount to untold millions, is to-day unable to handle the commerce offered it. In the year 1921, $4,063,800 worth of commerce passed through the Gulfport Harbor, and 435,277 net tons of commerce. There would have been many more large vessels coming into the harbor had the facilities for receiving them been sufficient. The commerce going through the Gulfport Harbor is increasing yearly. If the harbor can be properly equipped for the handling of the commerce offered it from the great timber and farming regions adjacent to it, the harbor will develop into one of the greatest in the South.

Pascagoula, Miss., one of the natural harbors of the South, has been shamefully neglected on account of the niggardly policy of Congress. Engineers can not improve these harbors unless we give them the money.

Mr. Chairman, Congress has voted millions upon millions of dollars to the railroad companies—in fact, between two and three billion dollars—but it has been niggardly toward the rivers and harbors. It fails to provide for the present conditions and refuses to look into the future, as men of vision should. A few days ago the President of the United States came into this House urging his ship subsidy bill, recommending the granting of a ship subsidy of $30,000,000. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been paid out to war contractors who profiteered and systematically robbed the people during the most crucial time of this Government's existence, and yet when a bill providing for that which tends to the upbuilding of the country and that which would do as much toward preparedness as anything else is presented the Congress pursues a short-sighted policy.

On account of the Federal Government's failure to provide for the Gulfport Harbor, it has become necessary, in order to maintain the harbor, to tax the people of the State of Mississippi to the extent of $80,000. It is not the duty of the State to maintain the harbors. It is the duty of the Federal Government. It is a Government project, and the people of the State ought not to have to bear burdens of this kind.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for an amendment to increase the appropriation to $43,000,000, the least amount for necessary improvements and maintenance of the rivers and harbors of this country, and I trust the amendment will have the support of a majority of this House. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay and allowances of retired enlisted men on active duty, $2,904.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a few questions regarding the difference between the appropriations recommended by the department in these different items beginning on line 13, page 19, "pay of persons with retired status." Five million dollars is appropriated for that item. I understand that the recommendation of the department in that case was $6,000,000. Is there any reason why that can not be cut down to $5,000,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is based on the expenditures for last year. We thought it could be cut down. I think the department anticipates the placing of a considerable number of officers on the retired list.

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman is satisfied, in his judgment, that this will not necessitate a deficiency appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. ANTHONY. That was our judgment. We always aim to appropriate enough to prevent a deficiency appropriation. The retired list has been growing very fast in recent years.

Mr. CRAGO. I notice in line 19 that for pay of retired enlisted men there is appropriated $4,500,000. As I understand it, the estimate of the department was for $5,000,000. It ought to be very easy to ascertain the exact amount necessary in those cases.

Mr. ANTHONY. We appropriated last year $4,180,167 for that purpose.

Mr. CRAGO. Then, this appropriation is an increase over what was carried last year?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is an increase over the current year of nearly $400,000.

Mr. CRAGO. The next item, for pay and allowances of retired enlisted men on active duty, carries an appropriation of $2,904. I notice the department asked for $16,896, which is almost seven times what is appropriated in the bill. Does that mean that they will have to take these retired enlisted men off the active list?

Mr. ANTHONY. That may be the case, but most of the deductions are made in the pay items because of the fact that the temporary increase authorized two years ago is taken out in the amounts named by the committee, which in the case of the noncommissioned officers amounts to about 20 per cent of their pay.

Mr. CRAGO. I should think that is quite a change. Those are usually noncommissioned officers who have been put on the retired list, but who are physically and mentally able to continue in the service. It is hardly fair to them to separate them from the service.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the difference between the active and the retired pay, and it is proposed, as the gentleman states, that a good many of those men shall not be kept on active duty.

Mr. CRAGO. Is there any reason given why they should not be kept on active duty?

Mr. ANTHONY. During the war a large number of men who were on the retired list were given active duty status, and it has been the purpose of the committee to gradually get back to normal conditions.

Mr. CRAGO. It is a part of economy I think to keep those men on the active duty if they take the place of a man who is really necessary in the service, because all he would be paid would be the difference between his retired pay, which he would get anyway, and his active pay, which is elsewhere appropriated.

Mr. ANTHONY. I agree with the gentleman that it is economy to keep retired men on active duty, such as school duty, and so forth.

Mr. CRAGO. All I wanted to ascertain is whether the committee has appropriated sufficient sums so as to prevent the inevitable deficiency appropriation.

Mr. ANTHONY. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in this item the original amount asked was $16,896. I am now advised that $13,000 of that was for temporary increase. It is rather hard to understand how there should be that amount in the temporary increase, but these are nearly all high-ranking officers.

Mr. CRAGO. In view of the fact that there is likely to be a new pay bill, would that make any difference in the items?

Mr. ANTHONY. Our pay items are based on the pay bill of 1908. Of course, our items will be changed to be in complete accord with any action Congress may take changing the rate of pay.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of Army field clerks and civil-service messengers at headquarters of the several territorial departments, corps areas, Army and corps headquarters, territorial districts, tactical divisions and brigades, service schools, camps and ports of embarkation and debarkation: Army field clerks—5 at $2,000 each, 25 at $1,800 each, 44 at $1,600 each, 61 at $1,400 each, 95 at $1,200 each; 80 messengers, at $720 each; in all, $382,400.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I hesitate to take up the time of the committee, because I realize this is a very important bill and should be passed as rapidly as possible. However, I am being placed in a false attitude in my State. Some of my constituents do not know me personally, having moved into the district in the last few years, as my district is rapidly growing, and they have been led to believe that I am opposed to education. For that purpose I have asked for these few minutes. As you know, for six years I was on the Committee on Education and for two years I was chairman of that committee. House bill 7 was first introduced May 19, 1919, and was reported out by the committee January 17, 1921, but was not considered by the House, although the Republicans were in control. At that time I reserved the right to oppose the bill, because I was not permitted to offer any amendments to the bill while the committee was considering same, although I was the ranking member on the Democratic side. The bill was reintroduced April 11, 1921, and contains practically the amendment that I wanted to offer in the committee, to wit, reserves to the State the right to control its educational system. I believed in that principle then and I believe in it now. The farther you get away from home the less efficient is the service rendered, and such service as is rendered costs a great deal more. I believe the people back home, who are competent to select Members of Congress, can better control their policies relating solely to the State than we can up here at Washington. I simply make these few brief remarks in order that I may, if possible, show to those who do not know me that I am not opposed to assisting the children of our country in securing an education, but I reserve the right to vote for only such bills as will benefit them and to oppose such bills as may be harmful.

In this connection, let me state that I taught school and that for 10 years I devoted my life to the educational work in my State, and I think it comes with poor taste for anyone to say I am not deeply interested in the welfare of the young men and young women of my country. Although the Sterling-Towner bill has been before the committee for nearly a year to date it has not been reported, although the Republicans have been and are in complete control of said committee and have a majority of approximately 165 in the House. It may also be of interest to my constituents to know that H. R. 7, as reintroduced, is different in many respects from the bill reported by the committee during the Sixty-sixth Congress. As my colleagues know, I have not been a member of the committee during this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, in order to save time and also that my constituents may know my interest in education and all matters pertaining thereto, I request to have printed as a part of my remarks my statement before the Committee on Education relative to my bill, H. R. 553, which I believe will be of interest to the Committee on Military Affairs, and may be of some assistance to the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I also ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SEARS. No lobby was behind my bill perchance because no high-salaried positions were created, but I still believe some day, at least, the objects and principles of the bill will be enacted into law.

TO PROVIDE SCHOLARSHIPS AND TO PROMOTE MILITARY TRAINING.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, August 26, 1919.

The committee met at 10 o'clock a. m., Hon. SIMEON D. FESS (chairman) presiding.

Present: Hon. Simeon D. Fess, chairman; and Messrs. Towner, Platt, Dallinger, Robsion, Sears, Brand, Blanton, and Nelson.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen of the committee, if there is no objection to proceeding with the hearing on H. R. 553, we will open the hearing at once. Mr. SEARS, we will hear you.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I have served on the Committee on Education for about four years and a half. Two years of that time my colleagues were kind enough to make me chairman of the committee. I appreciated that honor more than any honor they could have conferred on me, the more so because I served one term as a teacher and for 10 years was actively engaged in school work in Osceola County, Fla., where I have lived practically all of my life, as county superintendent of schools. I think I can say without egotism that during those 10 years I raised the standard of the schools, not because I changed teachers but because I paid salaries sufficient to permit the teachers to secure training during the summer months. I have always fought for and with the teachers. During those 10 years we found many a stumblingblock, and chief among these was the question of what to do with the boys of the county. Each year a certain number of boys would drop out of the grammar and high schools. I spent many, many sleepless nights and also hours trying to find a solution whereby we might keep the boys in at least the high schools of the county.

I despaired of ever finding a solution. There is no discredit to the boys of a certain high school that I know and now have in mind, because they were bright boys, but at the close of the last school term only one boy passed from the eleventh grade into the twelfth grade and therefore there will be only one boy graduate next year. I forget the number in the tenth and eleventh grades, but only two boys—my son being one of these—passed from the ninth grade to the tenth grade. I have gone to those boys and urged them to continue their school work and they would reply, "Mr. SEARS, what is the use of my going to school longer when I know I can not go any higher than the high school? Besides, I am offered a job at $50 or $75 a month, and each year I stay in the high school I am depriving myself of that much experience in a business that I will be forced to follow, because I can never have a college or technical training." You can not answer that argument; it is unanswerable. I know the parents of those boys. They are willing to send them to college, but financially unable to do so. I urged each boy to look on the bright side and finish his high-school course and cross the other bridge when he came to it, but I was unable to impress that idea upon him.

It might have been argued a few years ago that the poor boy, with ability and ambition, could find the opportunity to work his way through college without State or Government aid. Many of them did. But, Mr. Chairman, their number was few, indeed, compared with the great army of deserving boys who would make themselves, their families, and their country incomparably better and stronger could they have had the further mental and physical training that under present conditions is denied them.

I hesitate to make a personal reference, but, as I stated to the President in an interview, I am proud of the boys who have worked their way through college, the more so because I was one of them and because I know the hardships involved. My father was a practicing physician of the old school. He left me a heritage that no money can buy, no wealth replace; a heritage that lives to-day in the memory of all who knew him and knew that his life was chiefly devoted to serving sufferers not always able to pay in worldly goods—often to the exclusion of more profitable work which was offered him. Neither am I unmindful nor shall I ever forget the labor and privations which my mother underwent to assist me. But that heritage, Mr. Chairman, priceless as it was and is, would not buy a college training. Fortunately, an absence of false pride and hard manual labor—sometimes menial labor—did buy it for me. But the opportunities of gaining a college training in that way are growing fewer each year as compared with the number of our growing boys. Many a brighter boy than I was is being deprived of a college training because there is no such opportunity open to him. Mr. Chairman, one of the chief reasons which led me to run for Congress was the hope that some day I might aid in relieving this situation.

Let me say in passing that I never spent more pleasant years than I did when I was chairman of this committee. If there was any friction I failed to see it; if there was any hard feeling between the members it was not shown in the committee meetings; if there was any politics it never appeared while the Committee on Education was in session or when we had a measure before the House. When our beloved Mr. Hughes, who was chairman of the committee, had up for consideration before the House the great vocational bill, I point with pride to the fact that while we on the majority side fought for the passage of the bill, among the leaders on the other side were those also fighting for it, because it was a great educational advancement, and, as I said, no politics was permitted in this committee.

When the rehabilitation bill for the benefit of the disabled soldier came up last year your present chairman and myself conferred on the measure and the honor fell to me to introduce same, and by a unanimous vote of the committee a favorable report was made and the bill was passed by the House.

When your present chairman this year fought to make that bill broader, after the strenuous fight that the Committee on Education has not forgotten, may I say with a little pride and a good deal of pleasure, as ex-chairman of the committee, I assisted the chairman in securing the passage of the bill, as did also the other Democratic members. I trust, and perhaps you will admit, we were of some small assistance.

We have heard about clashes. Sometimes they are bitter, the lines are drawn; and this is perfectly proper and will always be the case. But I trust the day will never come when we shall play politics before the Committee on Education or on the floor of the House when a great educational bill is up for consideration. This statement is made with all the sincerity that is in me and with no degree of flattery, and I believe the committee is in strict accord with the sentiments just expressed.

I am glad, furthermore, to have this bill before this committee for consideration. Last year I introduced a similar bill, and I will say to you frankly I did not urge its passage for several reasons. First, I was chairman of the committee and somebody might say I was taking advantage of the chairmanship to report out a bill because the members did not want to oppose the chairman. Second, I did not believe the time was ripe for the pressing for passage of the bill. So the bill simply stayed before the committee, and in my humble way I endeavored to create a sentiment for it. I am glad the bill has again been referred to this committee, because in looking over the names of the members I find that SIMEON D. FESS, of Ohio; HORACE M. TOWNER, of Iowa; Edmund Platt, of New York; ALBERT H. VESTAL, of Indiana; JOHN M. ROBSION, of Kentucky; William L. Nelson, of Missouri; and myself have made a life study of school work. They should be on the Committee of Education. And I would not overlook the other members of the committee, to wit: SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, of New Hampshire; EDWARD J. KING, of Illinois; FREDERICK W. DALLINGER, of Massachusetts; DANIEL A. REED, of New York; WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, of Alabama; CHARLES H. BRAND, of Georgia; THOMAS L. BLANTON, of Texas; and Jerome F. Donovan, of New York; because a committee composed solely of those who have studied educational matters might have become so warped that it would be impossible for them to see except the one side. The last-named members have been very active; their counsel has been wise and timely; and many times they have helped us to perfect a bill which otherwise, due to the condition which I have just referred to, we might have overlooked.

I believe now, Mr. Chairman, the time is ripe for the passage of this bill. May I say in the beginning it is immaterial to me to whom the credit is given. If the Committee on Education, when they consider the bill, think it best, think it is wise, if it will assist in the passage of the bill, to strike out the name of the introducer and suggest the name of any other member of this committee or any other Member of Congress, I want to say to you in all frankness that you will never hear me claiming to be the author of the measure. I am not wedded to a single section of the bill except the general principle of aiding the boys. That sounds strange coming from a man who has given 15 years' or more thought to a measure and 2 years of careful thought and study in drawing the bill, but I again assure you it is results and not honor I am after. As stated, I am only wedded to the one idea or thought, and that is this Government owes something to the young men of the country; I am only wedded to the one great idea that it is time for our country to wake up and realize that the boys of our country are worth as much as the pigs of the country; that we owe them something along educational lines.

Now, with this brief explanation, let me call attention to the bill, and I will do this briefly, because I think the bill speaks for itself. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be published as a part of my remarks.

(The request was granted, and the bill is printed in full, as follows:)

"A bill to promote military training by providing scholarships for students enrolled in public institutions of higher learning, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of cooperating with the States and the District of Columbia in providing military training for young men within their borders there shall be appropriated the sum of $50,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and a like sum annually, or so much thereof as may be necessary, thereafter to be apportioned among the States and the District of Columbia in the proportion that the number of males of the ages of 16 to 20, inclusive, bears to the total number of males of said ages in the territory defined in this section.

"SEC. 2. That not more than 250,000 students at any one time shall be granted scholarships as provided for in this act, and no student holding a scholarship shall be permitted to enter any class except the freshman class. Said students shall be apportioned by the Federal Board for Military Training to the States and the District of Columbia in the proportion that the number of males of the ages 16 to 20, inclusive, bears to the total number of males of said ages in the States or District of Columbia, and the Federal Board for Military Training shall, on or before the 1st day of August of each year, certify to each State and the District of Columbia the number of scholarships allowed, as shown by the said apportionment: Provided, That for any one year the Federal Board for Military Training shall only certify one-fourth of the number of scholarships as provided for in this act, except in the case of resignation, death, or expulsion of any student the said board shall make an additional certification, and said additional scholarship or scholarships shall be apportioned in the States as provided for in section 3 of this act: Provided further, That the said Federal board may, during the first year this act is in force, issue to students in the sophomore, junior, or senior year scholarships, provided said students sign the obligations as provided for in section 11 of this act, and any student accepting said scholarships shall be subject to all the terms and conditions of this act.

"SEC. 3. That upon receipt of certification from the Federal Board for Military Training of the number of scholarships apportioned to said State, the authority designated under section 10 (1) shall apportion said scholarships to the several counties of the State in the proportion that the number of males of the ages 16 to 20, inclusive, bears to the total number of males of said ages in the State: Provided, That if the allotment to any county exceeds the number of graduates from high schools in that county, said excess of scholarships may be apportioned to the other counties. Graduates from high schools shall be entitled to scholarships in the order in which they pass their final examinations, and the county school superintendent shall immediately upon the graduation of any pupil from a regular high school of his county certify to the authority designated under section 10 (1) the name of said pupil, his age, and address, together with final marks made: Provided further, That in the case of the District of Columbia the authority designated to carry out the terms of this act shall see that the scholarships are equitably distributed throughout said District.

"SEC. 4. That after the passage of this act and before any State or the District of Columbia shall receive any appropriation as provided in this act the legislature or lawmaking body of said State or District shall by resolution or other enactment designate such educational institution or institutions already established or which may be established to receive the benefits of this act, and shall also pass such other legislation or laws as may be necessary to comply with the requirements of this act.

"SEC. 5. That the institution or institutions designated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act must meet the following conditions:

"(a) They must be under public support and control.

"(b) No pupil shall be eligible for admission to any institution except the one in the State in which he resides, and he shall be 16 and not over 20 years of age, must be a graduate of a high school, and physically able to take military training.

"(c) Said institution or institutions shall, as near as practicable without interfering with the literary course, conform with the rules and regulations prescribed for West Point, but in no event shall the military drill and instruction at said institution or institutions be less than 7 hours per week for 4 years of not less than 36 weeks each.

"(d) The President of the United States shall detail from the officers of the United States Army or the National Army or the National Guard or from officers on the retired list 1 officer for each 500 students or fractional part thereof, and the military control, instruction, and discipline shall at all times be under the direction and control of the officer or officers designated for said duty. The ranking officer shall be in charge and have full control. The limitation of the number of officers which may be detailed to military schools under section 1225 of the Revised Statutes is hereby abrogated. Officers detailed for said duty shall retain their rank and pay the same as if they were in the active service.

"(e) The general discipline and control of the nonmilitary functions of the institutions shall be at all times under the presidents of the institutions: Provided, That any student may have the right to appeal to the president of the institution in case he feels he has been unjustly dealt with: Provided further, That no student shall be expelled from any institution except by those who now have authority or to whom authority may be given to do so in the future.

"(f) The president of the institution shall, on or before October 15 and April 15 of each year, certify or cause to be certified to the State or district treasurer and the Federal Board for Military Training, the names of students entitled to receive installments on scholarships. He shall also immediately certify to the above-named official and the above-mentioned board the name of any student who has left said institution and is no longer entitled to said installments.

"(g) The president of the institution shall within 15 days after the close of any school year register or cause to be registered to the State or district treasurer and the Federal Board for Military Training, as provided for in section 16 of this act, a complete list of all students who have received six months' training or more, as provided for in this act, which said list shall contain the full name, home address, age, and rank of each student.

"SEC. 6. That the sum hereby appropriated to the States and District of Columbia shall be paid in semiannual installments on or before the 1st day of November and May of each year by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the certification by the majority of the members of the Federal Board for Military Training of the number of students entitled to receive same, out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to the State or District of Columbia treasurer, who shall pay the same in quarterly installments upon warrants of the treasurer of duly accredited and designated public institutions of higher learning. The treasurer of the institution shall pay the same, on or before the 5th of each month, to holders of scholarships certified by the president of said institution, as provided for in this act.

"SEC. 7. That the funds allotted annually under section 1 of this act shall be distributed in sums of $200 per annum to holders of scholarships, which said amount shall be used by the student in part payment of board, clothing, and incidental expenses.

"SEC. 8. That for the purpose of assisting public institutions of higher learning and to carry out the provisions of this act, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $25,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and a like sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, annually thereafter to be apportioned among the States and the District of Columbia in the proportion that the number of males of the ages 16 to 20, inclusive, bears to the total number of males of said ages in the territory defined in this section.

"SEC. 9. That from the funds appropriated under section 8 of this act there shall be paid to each institution qualified to participate in the benefits of this act the sum of $100 for each student actually enrolled and receiving instructions and holding a scholarship as provided for in this act, which said sum shall be used for the sole purpose of aiding the States or the District of Columbia in (a) payment of salaries of teachers, (b) providing quarters, (c) providing adequate drill grounds, (d) upkeep of buildings and grounds, which may be made necessary by the passage of this act: Provided, That not more than 70 per cent of said amount shall be used for expenses under (a) of this section, and not more than 25 per cent shall be used for expenses under (b), (c), and (d) of this section.

"SEC. 10. That before any State or the District of Columbia shall participate in the benefits of this act it shall be necessary for the legislature, or in the case of the District of Columbia the proper legal body, to take the following actions:

"(a) Accept the provisions of this act.

"(b) Designate the institution or institutions which are to receive the benefits of this act and to carry out the provisions of same.

"(c) Authorize the State or District treasurer to receive and pay out the funds appropriated by the act.

"(d) Authorize the treasurer of the institution receiving the benefits of this act to pay out the same according to the provisions of said act.

"(e) Appropriate funds sufficient to provide the sum of $50 for each student holding a scholarship as provided in this act, and authorize the State or District treasurer to pay the same to holders of scholarships upon certification of the president of the institution: Provided, That the said sum of $50 shall be used by the student in part payment of board, clothing, and incidental expenses: Provided, That no tuition shall be charged any student holding a scholarship.

"(f) Appropriate funds sufficient to provide facilities for well-rounded courses of instruction and to properly house and care of said students.

"(g) Provide for adequate drill grounds for said students.

"(h) Provide for such reports as may be required from time to time by the Federal Board for Military Training.

"(i) Designate the branch of the government of the State or District of Columbia which shall see that the provisions of this act are carried out.

"SEC. 11. That before any person shall receive a scholarship to any institution provided in this act he shall sign obligations in triplicate which shall be furnished by the Federal Board for Military Training stating in case the United States is at war he shall be liable for services and subject to the call of the President of the United States, and that he will serve the United States subject to the laws now in force or which may be hereafter enacted, as follows: (a) Two years for the first six months or year, (b) two years for the second year or fractional part thereof in excess of six months, (c) one year each for the third and fourth years or fractional part thereof in excess of six months, which said obligations shall be filed with the president of the institution, who shall cause one to be filed with the treasurer of the institution, and he shall immediately forward one to the State treasurer and one to the Federal Board for Military Training: Provided, That no student shall be subject to call who is actually attending any institution or after he has attained the age of 31.

"SEC. 12. That after leaving said institution if any person having availed himself of the benefits of this act shall change his address at any time prior to attaining the age of 31 years, he shall immediately forward to the Federal Board for Military Training the name of the place to which he has moved.

"SEC. 13. That anyone violating any of the provisions of this act shall upon conviction be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months.

"SEC. 14. That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal any laws which have been passed or may be passed affecting educational matters in any State or the District of Columbia, and there is specifically reserved to each State and the District of Columbia the right to regulate their public institutions, and the board hereinafter provided shall only have the right to prescribe rules and regulations governing the military feature of said institution.

"SEC. 15. That the uniforms, shoes, and other equipment of students holding scholarships shall be the same as those in use in the Regular Army, except there shall be worn on the left arm an insignia to be selected by the Federal Board for Military Training, and letters denoting the institution to which the student belongs shall be placed on the hat or cap. No person shall wear said uniform who is not a student of the institution.

"SEC. 16. That the Quartermaster Department of the United States Army, upon receipt of requisition from the Federal Board for Military Training, is hereby instructed and directed to furnish to the students through the treasurers of said institutions, uniforms, shoes, and clothing, as provided for the Regular Army, at cost, and further directed upon requisition received from the Federal Board for Military Training hereinafter provided to furnish to said institutions the necessary arms and equipment which may be necessary to properly train said students.

"SEC. 17. That the treasurer of the institution shall collect from the students the amount due for uniforms, shoes, and clothing and shall every 30 days remit same to the Quartermaster General of the United States Army. The Quartermaster General shall, upon receipt of payment from the treasurer of the institution, turn same over to the Treasurer of the United States, and said amounts shall be placed to the credit of the general fund of the Government.

"SEC. 18. That the Federal Board for Military Training is hereby created, to consist of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the United States Commissioner of Education. The board shall elect annually one of its members as chairman and shall adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary to properly carry out the provisions of this act. The sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and a like sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, thereafter for the necessary expenses, including salaries in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, rent, printing, reports, traveling expenses, and incidentals.

"SEC. 19. That said board, as authorized under section 18 of this act, shall cause to be made by a Regular Army officer at least once during each school year a thorough inspection of each institution receiving any assistance under the terms of this act, and shall keep on file, indexed, a complete list of those attending the several institutions as herein provided for and also a full and complete list of those who are subject to service under this act in case of war.

"SEC. 20. That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized to purchase from any State or the District of Columbia any bonds which may be issued for the sole purpose of complying with the provisions of this act. Said bonds shall be due and payable in not exceeding 20 years and shall bear a rate of interest not in excess of the maximum rate of interest the United States Government pays on any of its bonds: Provided, That the State shall pay all expenses in connection with the issuance of said bonds and also all expenses that may be incurred in examining into the legality of said bonds.

"SEC. 21. That all laws or parts of laws in so far as they are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed."

The first section of the bill simply provides an appropriation. The entrance ages are based practically on the ages for entrance to West Point and Annapolis, one being 17 to 21 years and the other 16 to 20 years, and this bill provides for 16 to 20 years.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. SEARS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. TOWNER. I know from our experience with the Committee on Appropriations that they will not allow this committee to present any further bills for appropriations and they will ask that it be transferred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that the Speaker will grant the request. So I suggest to the gentleman, in order to prevent that, that he should change the language of the first section so that there shall be authorized to be appropriated, instead of that there shall be appropriated.

Mr. SEARS. Perhaps that suggestion is wise, and you will notice that I say "There shall be appropriated."

Mr. BLANTON. In that connection, wouldn't the old precedent still prevail whatever agreements may have been entered into between the Speaker and the Appropriations Committee? I am heartily in favor of their contention that the appropriations, if an appropriation measure, should go to their committee; but there is no rule that has been adhered to that after a bill has gone to a committee and had a hearing on it and wasted the time of the members that it will not be interfered with. Isn't there such a precedent.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; we have had a precedent of that kind in this committee, but that is by sufferance, and they do not allow that sufferance to continue.

Mr. SEARS. I am glad Judge TOWNER called my attention to the wording of the bill as above. This bill was first referred to the Committee on Appropriations; they were very busy and it was then referred, at my request, to the Military Committee. I want to say to you that it is an educational bill and should be considered by the Committee on Education, but I stated to the chairman of the Military Committee at the last session that as it was my bill and as I was chairman of the Committee on Education I did not care to have myself and the committee pass on it, because I wanted the bill to pass, and if the Military Committee would report it I thought I could assure him each member of the Committee on Education would be back of it and that we would work just as hard for its passage. However, the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee stated that they could not reach the bill at all and that he thought it should properly come before the Committee on Education. This year, therefore, I asked that the bill be referred to this committee. The appropriation in the first section is $50,000,000. It seems large, but we have voted away about $32,000,000,000, I think, to kill young men and to teach men to destroy men and property; $50,000,000 is just about one public building bill. By this I trust I may not be construed as opposed to such a bill. It is about the usual rivers and harbors bill. I hope we will have them; we must have them. So you see, Mr. Chairman, it is not such a large appropriation after all. I have yet to find the first man or woman who pays taxes, directly or indirectly, to complain against any taxation that has for its purpose the betterment of the children of our land.

They may complain about their road tax, because they think the road is good enough; they may complain about the tax which pays the current expenses of the Government; they may complain about every other tax; but even the bachelor, educated, or deprived of an education because he did not have the funds to secure one, never complains of any tax he pays for the purpose of helping the young men of the country secure an education. So I think the amount of the appropriation is a mere bagatelle and should not and will not frighten Members of Congress into voting against it.

Now, the second section provides for division among the States. The scholarships provided for in this bill will be 250,000. These shall be divided amongst the States pro rata in proportion to the number of youths between the ages of 16 to 20 years. New York will get the number she is entitled to—no more, no less. Iowa will get the number she is entitled to—no more, no less. The same with Ohio, Florida, Georgia, and Missouri, and every other State in the Union.

Then the question comes up as to the division in the States—as to how to divide them among the districts and counties of the State. I have provided in this bill that they shall be divided in each State pro rata in proportion to the representation in the House of Representatives. In other words, if my State should be entitled to a thousand under this bill my district would get 250 and the other three districts would get 250 each. Then this number would be divided again between the counties of the district in proportion to the number of youths in each county between the ages of 16 to 20 years. And the above would apply to every State and the District of Columbia. Therefore you see there is an absolutely fair division among the States, the districts of the States, and each county of the State, and there will be no chance for politics to enter into the division.

I realize that many bills are passed for political effect. I have seen the disadvantages of political influence in educational matters. If you will read this bill you will find there are in it specific provisions that will make it impossible to play politics or favoritism in its administration. That it might not be charged that the Committee on Education was trying to build up a great political machine and that the Members were trying to place themselves in perpetual power (because that is what it would be if you were permitted to appoint, without safeguards and the merit system, 250,000 young men to collegiate courses each year), I have provided that graduates of high schools from each district shall be certified to by the authorities in the State on educational matters, giving the rating of each. In other words, Mr. Chairman, it is a system of merit. If Jim Jones, son of a day laborer, who, under the present cost of living, is hardly making enough to sustain his family, should graduate from a high school in my State with the highest mark, or with a mark that would place him among the list of eligibles that county was entitled to, that boy would get a certificate entitling him to a scholarship in the University of Florida. Exactly the same would apply to the son of a man of means, and that is why I have provided that it be certified in that way.

Let me say here it is impossible for me to cover this just like I would like to at one hearing without imposing on your patience, but I want to get it before you and let you study it. I believe that not a single boy will fail to strive to secure one of the scholarships provided for in this bill, unless physical disability or sickness prevents him from doing so. If this bill could be placed on the statute books it would be the greatest incentive possible for him to finish high school. Why? I just explained in my opening statement that the boys quit high school because there is no chance of their going to college. Until the last day of the high-school course the boy will be digging and hoping, if there are 15 boys to go from that high school, that he will be one of them, and if he should be the sixteenth and fail, this committee would have done much for that boy in the future years of his life by having caused him in part to prepare himself for the battle to follow.

Mr. PLATT. May I interrupt?

Mr. SEARS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. Isn't it true that on account of the high wages the boys are considerably less in number demanding appointments to West Point and Annapolis?

Mr. SEARS. It may be, but I am flooded with them. As I said before, it is not a question of wages. Ninety-nine boys out of a hundred who get in the tenth grade of the high school have an ambition to go higher and to finish their education, but they can not go higher because they have not the financial ability to do so. I have had the pleasure of sending two or three through school, but they owe me nothing, because since then they have a hundred times more than paid me; paid me what I advanced in money; paid me in friendship which would overwhelm any man. I have in mind to-day a young man who graduated from the high school; he had the nerve to stick; he was a born mathematician; had a wonderful mathematical mind. Because of financial conditions that boy is working now behind a counter; he has been there for two years and will be there perhaps the balance of his life. By the above, far be it from me, even in the slightest, to reflect on the young man behind the counter, for his occupation is an honorable one.

Mr. PLATT. Let me say, the last time I was at home a boy that took the competitive examination last year for appointment to Annapolis by me is now working for $3.50 a day.

Mr. SEARS. That may not last always.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps not, but it is interfering now.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up too much of your time, but my whole heart is in this question. This bill provides that the nonmilitary functions of the institutions shall at all times be under the supervision of the president of the institution. Let me call attention to the fact that H. R. 553 provides that the commandant of cadets shall be in charge of the discipline of the institution, because he is the only one who can be in charge of the discipline, and if you are going to have military training that provision must be in the bill. It is specifically provided, however, that the commandant can not expel a boy, but expulsion must be referred to the president of the institution and the proper authorities must act before a boy can be expelled from the institution. It is further specifically provided that any student may appeal to the president of the institution if he believes he is receiving unfair treatment.

I want further to call your attention to the fact that under section 9 of the bill it is provided that not more than 70 per cent of the amount appropriated by said section shall be used for expenses under "A" of said section, and not more than 25 per cent shall be used for expenses under "B," "C," and "D" of said section. You will see that 5 per cent is left out; but this is only a typographical error. The committee should correct that error and also make such division of the appropriation as they think best. I have added this section because I believe both the Government and the State should do its part. I would not vote for any bill where the Government should do it all. Unless the State assumes some of the liability and responsibility in connection with the carrying out of this act, the State will lose interest. Therefore should this bill become a law I insist that the State must do its part. I would not vote for a bill, to be frank with you, that did not leave with the State the right to control the institution or did not require the State to assume a part of the burden. These institutions have fundamental rights, and I do not think the committee should or would take them away. I would put every safeguard around the appropriations, so that the money would not be wasted. Every dollar appropriated under this bill goes for the benefit of the young men of this country.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a clipping on "Army schools offer educational chances." This article clearly shows the importance of the bill you are now considering, and I ask that same be printed as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no objections, it may be printed.

(No objections were offered.)

ARMY SCHOOLS OFFER EDUCATIONAL ADVANTAGES—SCHOOLS ARE EQUAL TO COLLEGES IN THEIR LINES—UNITED STATES ARMY DOES MORE FOR ITS SOLDIERS THAN ANY OTHER NATION—OFFERS BEST ADVANTAGES.

The United States Army of to-day is doing more for the training of its soldiers, either for military or civilian life, than that of any other nation on earth. The World War proved that educated soldiers in every respect were just as important as the educated banker or any other business men, and for that reason young men will find some of the best schools in the United States Army to-day. For a young man who can not avail himself of a college education after completing his high-school course, he can find no place that offers him a chance like the Army does in the way of training, physically, morally, and mentally. And besides, he is getting paid for it. At the pay of a private, he is making much more than $100 at the present price of everyday necessities.

"We must have an Army of trained men in every respect, and we are going to get it, and the best way to get it is to train it," said an Army official recently. "Some people ask the question, 'Why take a young man at an expense for one or three years, and when that time is up he will go on the outside at a much larger salary?' That is possible, and that is the beauty of it. But about two-thirds of the men, at the expiration of one or three years, reenlist at better salary and much better chances for promotion.

"For a young man who is seeking the outdoor life, which is absolutely esential to the future health of anyone, he can find nothing that gets so near to nature's front door as some branches of the service.

"There are not any of our leading business men of to-day but will tell that when they started out in life they considered the future in preference to salary or conditions. There are a good many young men who may think that our leading business men just happened with good luck. They had a good start or some other financial backing, but no man can get that kind of backing unless he has the ability, and in the Army is a good place to get that kind of ability.

"The Army is run like a large business, with hours for work and hours for freedom. The soldier off duty writes letters, smokes, plays basket ball, pool, football, or most any other healthful game he likes; goes to the movies or theaters; calls on his girl if he has one; in fact, he does about as he likes. Being in uniform, his self-respect, as well as the rules of the service, demand that he conduct himself as a soldier and a gentleman. It is just as important, and more so, that the United States soldier be a gentleman in every respect as anyone. He is representing a people—the best people—and the people are of the best nation on earth; the people of the United States have always been aware of that fact, but it has been proven to nations—nations that were in doubt—by the part accomplished in the World War. The United States soldier is a soldier of renown for bravery and achievements.

"The War Department has recently authorized one-year enlistment periods in some branches, regardless of whether the recruits have had previous service or not, namely, the Quartermaster Corps and the Medical Department. This should be an inducement to young men to have a try out and see for themselves just what the United States Army is offering to young men.

"Young men who can not avail themselves of the necessary funds for a college education should not fail to consider just what they can obtain from one enlistment, in the Aviation or Motor Transport Corps schools.

"Pay in the Army runs from $30 per month to $121.50 per month, with all necessary living expenses paid by the Government."

Mr. SEARS. I also ask to have printed a part of "The Army policy," wherein the Secretary of War states that the Army has no policy; that the future must unfold it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, it may be printed.

(No objections were offered.)

THE ARMY POLICY.

"The action of the Senate in voting appropriations upon the basis of a contemplated army with an average strength of 400,000 men during the next fiscal year has no bearing upon a national permanent military policy. The House made its appropriation upon a basis of a contemplated average of 300,000 men, while the War Department recommended an average of 509,000 men. Consequently, it is evident that in conference the Army appropriation bill will be drafted upon either the House or Senate figures or upon a compromise between the two.

"The national defense act provides for a standing Army of 175,000 fighting men, with Quartermaster Corps, Medical Corps, and other branches which bring the total number up to 250,000 or 300,000. Before the expiration of the next fiscal year it is anticipated that the Army will be down to the maximum strength authorized in this law.

"After that, what? Neither Congress nor the War Department is ready at this time to take the responsibility of recommending a permanent military policy for the United States. There is talk of a comparatively small standing Army with universal military training which would keep the youth of the land in readiness for an emergency call to the colors, and it is generally realized that universal training as a policy is stronger now among the people than it was before the war. But even if this policy is adopted, the country must maintain a standing Army sufficient to meet the requirements placed upon the Government and to serve as the nucleus of a large Army in the event of another war."

Mr. SEARS. I contend this bill is the best policy and will meet every requirement set out by the Secretary of War and at much less cost than any other plan. I will undertake to show that. Since the above was published in the paper the Secretary of War and the General Staff have recommended a bill providing that each boy when he reaches the age of 18, I believe—if I am wrong, correct me—shall be drafted or conscripted and forced to give three months of his time to military training. I say as a man who has had experience in school work that a boy who has been studying his books for 9 months, and if your term is 10 months, should not be required to take up this extra work; besides, you practically cause him to lose one year of school work. I say without fear of contradiction that you can not train a boy in military tactics in three months, and that the money so spent will be practically wasted. I do not say that without thought. I went to a military school for four years; I served under West Pointers; and

I know the value of military training. My father urged me to go there in preference to a nonmilitary school because of my physical condition.

When I entered the Florida State College I only weighed 95 pounds, and, as stated, my health was poor. When I graduated four years later I weighed 145 pounds and my health was perfect, and I am satisfied this was due entirely to the military training I received, and there were many similar cases to mine. I owe, I believe, as I told the President, my present position in life to the military training I received at school. To my obedience to commands; to my power to think as an officer; to the strict military discipline which was in force; to the training in handling men while at college; I think I owe in a large part my way through life.

It may be charged that you should not do this because it will create a military caste; it will make a war party. I want to say that of all my schoolmates I do not believe there was one but who abhorred war. They had been taught that the weapon was deadly. While they had been taught to shoot straight, they had also been taught not to shoot until it was absolutely necessary, and while that spirit was instilled in those young men at the same time a spirit of patriotism and respect for the flag was also instilled and many of them during the present war received commissions because of that training, although received many years ago I have one personal friend, Lieutenant Johnson, who was at the head of an electrical department in some electrical works at San Francisco. He had formerly been on the ocean, but had given it up and gone back to land work. When the President called for volunteers he resigned his position and entered the service for the purpose of helping to transport food and supplies. He dodged the submarines, and he with many others did splendid service during the present war. I have another college mate here in the city connected with the Quartermaster Corps. Many of those boys responded and all made good. Many more wanted to respond but were prevented from doing so because of the age limit.

It is charged, Mr. Chairman, that this bill will cost $75,000,000 annually. That is true, but I want to say to you that of all the moneys spent by the Government none will be more wisely spent or used for a better purpose.

May I relate here briefly what General McAndrews told the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate? He told the committee that in his opinion a military peace strength of 300,000 officers and men is sufficient under the plan for universal military training.

In view of the facts, however, that the universal military service plan could not begin functioning for two or three years hence, he said a large Army might be required to afford protection during that time. He certainly has lost sight of the three or four million brave, patriotic, thoroughly trained young men who have just been or will shortly be discharged. General McAndrews also told the committee that the three months' training proposed in the bill was insufficient to turn out a valuable soldier and asserted that contrary to general belief the average training time of soldiers composing the American combat divisions abroad had been not less than six months.

General Bullard told the committee that in his opinion three months was the minimum training period, and that even then three experienced soldiers would be required to train one inexperienced man. If this is true, I will let you figure out the cost of training under the universal plan and ask that you compare same with the cost under this bill. May I call the committee's attention to this fact: That under that system it will take three commissioned officers, first sergeant, sergeants, and so on, after they are partially trained, and all of these must be paid. As I have said, all these officers, the general, the colonel, and the lieutenant colonel, will have to be paid for this universal training of three months, which, according to some of the officers, is at its best only inefficient training. Under my system it will only be necessary to furnish one officer to 300 men. The cadets themselves become the officers. They take a pride in it, they study it, and they will receive thorough training. I began as a private and finished with the rank of captain. All take the greatest pride in their work. The officers will love the boys and the boys will love the officers, because each one understands the other. So you will see the immense expense saved by teaching the boys in public owned or controlled colleges.

Now, some people will object to this bill because they will say they do not want their boy to go to a military school. If the parent does not want his boy to go to a military school there are many colleges of the highest standard where he can go without taking the military feature. The bill covers only military colleges and schools under State control. If one boy does not finish he drops out and another boy gets his chance to make good. The other colleges will not suffer, for there will be a sufficient number of boys able to pay their way who will attend same.

I also ask that this article on "Military training" from the Washington Post, May 30, 1919, be printed as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, it may be done.

(No objections were offered, and the article referred to is here printed, as follows:)

"MILITARY TRAINING.

"An important step toward universal military training was taken when Secretary of War Baker recommended to the House Military Affairs Committee the establishment of a system of military training in high schools, colleges, and universities throughout the country. He stated that the Army had already demonstrated its educational value to the youth of the Nation, which formed a very strong argument in favor of including military training in the curriculum of educational institutions.

"Members of Congress who have visited Europe since the war have learned many things in favor of training the young men for military service. They have visited schools where the fundamentals of tactics are taught, resulting in the physical improvement of the young men and strengthening the protection of their country. The legislators have returned to this country convinced that some plan can be worked out which will permit of the adoption of military training in a form which will meet with general approval.

"Secretary Baker in appearing before the House committee was careful to state that he did not wish to advocate any permanent military policy at this time while the League of Nations covenant was pending. It is assumed from this statement that the adoption of the league would make a difference in the character of recommendation which otherwise he would make to Congress.

"That view, however, does not prevail with the Congressmen who have studied the question in Europe. There are potent reasons why the young men of the Nation should be trained in the rudiments of military tactics, even if the league were in effect. The physical benefits which they themselves reap from this training is one of the best arguments in favor of it. Even if there were no prospects of war for many years to come, there would be nothing inconsistent in teaching the young men the fundamentals of military training.

"Universal training is the real object aimed at, and it is believed by many Members of Congress that the prejudice which existed against it before the war has now largely disappeared since parents have had an opportunity to witness the wonderful benefits their sons have had from military training. In the near future it will be incumbent upon Congress to adopt a permanent military policy for the Nation, and this will be one of the important phases to be considered."

Mr. SEARS. As I said, the bill is one which provides efficient military training at a minimum cost and at the same time prepares the boy for his duties in life. The bill provides, Mr. Chairman, that for a certain length of time served by the boy, only in case of war, that boy shall respond to the country and give a certain length of time to serving in the defense of his Government. Some parent may say he does not like that feature. I am aware they would not want anything that would force them into war. But why should that system not stand? Congress has adopted a system of conscription and the boy has to serve whether he wants to or not. I would say that the nation is indeed small which would make a boy go out and fight for the nation—not ask him, but make him, glad to do it though he may be, but the "make" is still there—and then not be willing to give that boy an equal chance with the boys who have been more fortunate; who have had the silver spoon in their mouths and secured an education. As I have said in some of my letters that I have written to those who are devoting their lives to the betterment of the young men, any nation that is worth living in is worth fighting for, but the nation that makes it possible for the young men of the country, for the boys of the country, to secure an equal chance to fight their way through life, to secure that training which will aid them in fighting the battle which is always extreme, as you gentlemen know, is not only worth fighting for but worth dying for, and the boy will gladly, if necessary, die for that nation.

We make annual appropriations in the millions for the Agriculture bill; we make appropriations for the rivers and harbors bill; we make appropriations for public buildings bill; and many others. These appropriations are necessary and Congress should make them. You appropriated for my State $500,000 for investigation and eradication of the citrus canker. I want to say that Congress saved the orange industry of Florida and California and perhaps of the United States. But you required my State to meet it with an equal amount, and I told you Florida would meet it, and Florida, as usual, made good that promise. It was a worthy appropriation. You have appropriated thousands of dollars for the investigation and eradication or destruction of the boll weevil. Congress appropriates annually large sums for the eradication of cholera and the protection of the little pig, so that he may be nourished to where he will be raised to the size of pork that the "hog" might get him and make the people pay more for pork. These appropriations should be made, but I want to say if the hog is worth protecting, if the citrus canker should be eradicated, and if the boll weevil should be controlled, how much more important is it that people should finally realize the importance and the necessity of assisting the young men of the country? I believe that the time is coming; I believe the time will be here, if not this year, later; if not by the aid of this committee by the aid of some other committee; that some similar bill like this one will be introduced and passed through Congress, and until then we can not expect to take our real stand as leaders of the nations of the world.

But you say this is a State proposition. Is it a State proposition when the Government demands of your boy to fight and die for the country? Is it a State proposition when the boy owes all to the Government and the Government owes all to the boy? Yes; the State should do a part of it, and the State is doing a part of it. You say that the free educational system, the grammar school and the high school and the rural school is enough. It is the most popular one, because that appeals to the boys, but unfortunately is all the average boy can ever expect. There are more grammar-school boys, more high-school boys, but that should not make it paramount, because I believe this committee and the Members of Congress should rise above a mere local or political question. The question is whether you are going to help these boys get a higher education.

Why does the bill name State institutions? Let me just call attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that in 1917 the value of buildings of the publicly owned and controlled institutions was $7,252,848. Let me also call your attention to the fact that there was appropriated by Congress in 1918 for the agricultural colleges, where there are about 30,000 boys taking military training, $5,359,077. The value of the grounds of the State institutions owned by the States at the present time is $28,905,709. I thought it was best to start with these colleges as a nucleus and thereby save the enormous expense necessary to establish new colleges. That money has been spent, and there is no use going out and building new ones when you can add to these and let the work go on without interfering with it.

Do the people of this country realize that there was in 1917 but a few more than 70,000 boys in public controlled and owned institutions in all of the United States? When I found it out it was appalling to me. Out of 100,000,000 people only 70,000 boys taking advantage of our public-controlled institutions.

Mr. ROBINSON. You mean colleges?

Mr. SEARS. Colleges; yes. Just think, the great State of New York has less than 4,500 in her public institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you include in public institutions?

Mr. SEARS. Those owned and controlled by the State.

Mr. TOWNER. Those aided by State funds?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. This would not prevent a boy going to Columbia.

Mr. SEARS. It would not prevent him.

Mr. PLATT. Are there any State institutions in New Jersey?

Mr. SEARS. I have not looked that question up, and therefore can not give you the desired information at present. My recollection is there are 52 public owned or controlled institutions in the United States and that each State has at least one, and if not there should certainly be at least one such institution.

The CHAIRMAN. We have three in Ohio.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank you for that information, and may I add that is perhaps at least in some degree the reason why Ohio ranks so high among the States.

Mr. PLATT. What, in competition with Yale?

Mr. SEARS. Not in competition; Yale has won her laurels and nothing can take them from her. The University of Florida is not in competition with Stetson. No institution of learning should be in competition with any other, but all should work together.

I said in the beginning of my remarks that there are plenty of institutions of the highest standing—Princeton, Yale, and Stetson and Rollins in Florida, and others too numerous to mention—where the boys who are able to pay can go if they want to.

Mr. PLATT. Those colleges all have a large number of scholarship men—Yale, Princeton, and Harvard.

Mr. SEARS. There are less than 200,000 out of the 100,000,000 in all the colleges in the United States.

Mr. PLATT. What do you mean—scholarship men?

Mr. SEARS. No; pupils. There are 1,000,000 young men, according to the War Department statistics, who become 16 years of age annually. There ought to be at least 500,000 men in the colleges. Of course, I know that the 1,000,000 men could not all go to colleges, but it looks like we could increase the enrollment to 250,000 besides those who will attend the private institutions.

I want to mention this situation which was called to my attention by one of the presidents I wrote to. In the New England States the president of one college called my attention to the fact that the bill provides that the county superintendent shall certify eligibles and that they have no county superintendents in New England. Frankly, I was not aware of that fact, and I trust some member of the committee who is familiar with the laws of the New England States will find out who is at the head of the high schools in the county or district and that he will offer an amendment which will meet the requirements of those States.

Mr. DALLINGER. We haven't any county organization at all; each city and town is independent.

Mr. SEARS. I trust you will prepare an amendment covering such cases. I was going by the States that I knew of. There was no desire on my part to name any particular person, and I thought the provisions of the bill would cover all States. But I find such is not the case, but that can be easily remedied.

I desire now, Mr. Chairman, to call your attention to a newspaper clipping showing the amount necessary to be appropriated for the Army and Navy, as an indication of what will be necessary in the way of additional taxes, unless H. R. 553 or some bill along the lines suggested therein becomes a law. I also want to have printed as part of my remarks two editorials, one from the Florida Times-Union of March 20, 1918, written by A. S. Hough, a gentleman of mature thought and years; and one from the Palm Beach Post, indorsing the bill, written by Joe Hugh Reese, now with the Savannah Morning News. The ability of both these gentlemen is too well known to the press of the country to need any encomium at my hands.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? If not, these clippings and editorials may be printed.

(No objections were offered, and the clippings and editorials referred to are printed in full, as follows:)

ARMY AND NAVY BILLS FINISHED—MEASURES CARRYING $900,000,000 AND $627,000,000 TO GO TO SENATE.

America's defense during its first year under the League of Nations—assuming that the covenant is accepted—probably will consist of:

An Army of 400,000 men; a Navy of 29 battleships and 191,000 men. This defensive strength will cost $1,527,000,000 for the year beginning next Tuesday.

These figures will go before the Senate next week for final approval. No changes are expected except in minor details.

After working feverishly this week, often staying until midnight, the Senate Naval Affairs Committee last night had finished the two big appropriation bills for the Nation's defense. They will be voted on in the Senate early next week.

The Army bill carries $900,000,000, provides for an Army averaging 400,000 men, and allows $55,000,000 for aviation.

The Navy bill carries approximately $627,000,000, provides for abolition of the 8,000 yeowomen, authorizes a personnel of 191,000 men, and allows $35,000,000 for naval aviation.

Both bills show increases over House appropriations, the Army about $150,000,000 and the Navy about $25,000,000. The Army was increased in size by 100,000 men and the Navy about 20,000.

A GOOD BILL.

Chairman SEARS, of the Committee on Education, has introduced in the House a bill proposing an appropriation of $50,000,000 a year to establish for graduates of high schools scholarships in institutions that teach military training. The scholarships are to be given as a result of competitive examinations so there will be no chance of favoritism. The fund is to be divided between the States in proportion to their male population between the ages of 16 and 20, inclusive.

It is proposed that each holder of a scholarship be given from this fund $200 a year to be used in paying board and incidental expenses, the tuition to be free.

The educational advantages of this plan are apparent. There is need to consider only its military advantages. A great many people in this country favor compulsory military training. This would take at least a million of our population a year from industry. If their earnings if employed on an average would amount to only $500 a year, this would mean a loss to the country of a half billion dollars a year. It would make every man in the United States a soldier, and there is no need for every man in the United States to be a soldier.

On the other hand, there are those who would increase the strength of our Regular Army, which cost us in time of peace nearly $1,000 per man. If the number were increased to half a million men, the cost of the Army would be half a billion dollars a year.

Now, let's see what Mr. SEARS's plan would do. It would furnish about 62,500 trained soldiers a year, and this would amount to 625,000 trained men between the ages of 21 and 30, inclusive. These men in time of peace would be engaged in their regular work, adding to the productive power of the country, but in case of war they would furnish a ready trained Army of 625,000 men at a cost in time of peace of $50,000,000 a year, which is about half as much as our Regular Army, only one-sixth as large, has been costing in time of peace. If we continue to employ a Regular Army of 100,000 men at the old cost the cost for the 725,000 would be only $150,000,000 a year and the 625,000 ready but not in service would be adding to the wealth of the Nation as much as a billion dollars a year instead of being merely a consumer of wealth.

We are having some experience in sending men across the ocean, and as it would be as difficult for an enemy to send them across as it is for us to send them all who think now know that an army of 725,000 men ready for service could capture any invaders as fast as they could get across. If we were fighting across the ocean we could not send more than 60,000 men across in a month. This means we would have ready on the declaration of war 725,000—as many as we could send across the ocean in a year. If more were needed we could train in a year as many more as we wished, and they would be ready in every way by the time our trained soldiers were across.

This is by far the best military bill we have seen, and we hope Congress will prove its wisdom by enacting it. It would give us for $150,000,000 as large a number of trained men as we could employ under our old method for $700,000,000, and it would not take our most active and energetic young men from production.

SEARS BILL FOR MILITARY TRAINING.

"To a Florida Representative belongs the credit of introducing a measure in Congress designed to provide the general military training which this Nation will unquestionably find expedient if not absolutely necessary by reason of the circumstances which have forced upon it the desirability of having ready for call at all times an army drilled and at least in some measures equipped for prompt service.

"While it serves no purpose which is not readily apparent to direct attention to the certain rejection which would have greeted such a bill three years ago, it is nevertheless appropriate at such a time as this to indicate what a vast change has taken place in the attitude of the public toward such matters by venturing the prediction that the bill which WILLIAM J. SEARS has presented will not only have serious consideration but will probably be passed. When subjected to the critical inspection of a Congress even now schooled as to the needs of the future, based upon recent experience of unpreparedness, it is not to be doubted that amendments to the original text of the bill will be written into it, but as a basis upon which to build and as an outline to follow, the Sears bill will likely be adopted; either this or some similar measure, and Mr. SEARS will be accorded his due in thinking out the solution of a problem which demands the greatest and gravest consideration.

"In brief the bill provides an annual appropriation of $50,000,000 for establishing a system of military training in the institutions of higher learning in each State, scholarships to be granted to boys graduating from the high schools upon certain conditions guaranteeing an equitable distribution and insuring a sufficient amount to each to bear the expense of the student through four years of training, which is to be under the tutelage of an Army officer. Certain obligations are imposed upon the State to meet the terms of the bill, such as providing drill grounds and barracks and the keeping of accounts, which shall be reported to a Federal board. Whether this Nation continues to keep up a large Military Establishment after the war or not, the advisability of military training in the higher institutions can scarcely be questioned. Frequently it has been remarked since this country entered the war that the training in military camps would be well worth the price to the physical well-being of the Nation's manhood if the other and more urgent question of national defense were eliminated. There will be few to dispute the truth of this statement, though some may demur at the extravagant cost which hurried preparation and utter lack of preparedness made necessary. When the benefits of such training as that proposed in the Sears bill are considered solely from a health viewpoint the cost as estimated is not too great."

Mr. SEARS. I want to say to the committee, frankly, that I have mailed to every president of a public-owned and public-controlled institution a copy of the bill, but many of them are off on their summer vacations, and their secretaries have written me that as soon as they return their attention will be called to same. I would like to ask the committee for authority to have published in this hearing, or a hearing to be held at a subsequent date, the replies I receive. I will not withhold anything from the committee just because it happens to be adverse to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection from members of the committee, that permission will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, at this time I will only print extracts taken from an article which was published in Everybody's Magazine of February, 1915, as follows:

PRESIDENT SCHURMAN, OF CORNELL UNIVERSITY, BELIEVES EVERY COLLEGE SHOULD INTRODUCE MILITARY TRAINING.

"It would be self-deception of the grossest character if Americans made their love of peace the criterion of the military policy and preparedness of their country. It would be madness to enfeeble and imperil the United States because we believe peace the chief blessing of the nations.

"America will never equip herself for aggressive wars. She will never set up a large standing army or require military service of all the young men of the country. Historic policy and the abiding sentiments of her people forbid.

"I am a firm believer in the intrinsic value of military training, even apart from its utility to the public in time of war. Cornell University is one of the 65 universities and colleges in the United States which prescribes military training for the students, and in 1914 it was included in the group of 10 distinguished colleges selected by the War Department for excellence in military training, while at the same time it was first in the country in marksmanship. I have long felt that this military training is one of the best things the undergraduate receives at the university.

"Military training teaches the young man how to stand and walk and hold himself; it gives him vigorous out-of-door exercise, so that gradually his chest expands and his muscles grow firm; it inures him to physical hardships; it disciplines him in orderliness, punctuality, accuracy, and alertness; it endows the senses and the intellect with quickness, precision, and the habit of concentrated attention; it develops self-control as well as obedience to proper authority and resistance to improper; it accustoms the individual to cooperation and teamwork, while fostering comradeship, thus facilitating community life and lubricating social intercourse, and it prepares youth for better citizenship by constantly emphasizing the conceptions of duty and service.

"If wars were banished from our planet I would retain military training side by side with athletics as an instrument of physical education in our universities; and not only for its physical advantages, great as they are, but also for its moral, mental, social, and civic effects and reactions.

"Now, since the great Federal land-grant act of 1862 in the interest of agriculture and the mechanic arts there has been one college or university (often the State University) in each State of the Union which prescribes for its students a certain amount of military training. This at the present time extends over two years, and occupies three separate periods a week of not less than an hour each period; and this military training, which is prescribed for freshmen and sophomores, may be continued as an elective by the upper classmen for two years longer.

"Counting Hawaii and Porto Rico there are now 52 land-grant colleges and universities, and in 1913 they had enrolled in their military departments 23,864 students. Besides these there must be added 16 similar institutions for the colored race, in which in 1913 there were 2,426 students enrolled for military drill. And in all these institutions the military training is in charge of an officer of the Regular Army; and in detailing him the War Department instructs him that it is his duty to qualify students who enter the military department to be company officers of Infantry, volunteers, or militia.

"Here, then, under the auspices of the National Government we have our colleges and universities already engaged in the military education of young men with a view to qualifying them to become company officers of Infantry, volunteers, or militia. And this is a reservoir from which the Nation might draw, almost indefinitely, officers to train our reserve army of volunteers.

"Hitherto the Government has paid little attention to the military work done in these colleges and universities. Yet there is no other way in which officers for reserves can be secured so easily and so economically—officers, too, of superior mental endowments and scholastic and scientific attainments. All that is needed is that the Government shall adopt the policy of utilizing them.

"In his report as Chief of Staff in 1913 General Wood made one recommendation which if acted on would constitute an important first step in this direction. He recommended that there be selected from the graduating classes of the institutions at which officers are detailed as military instructors 400 men each year who should be commissioned as provisional second lieutenants in the Regular Army for a period of one year with full pay and allowances, to be discharged at the end of the year with a certificate of proficiency if they merit it as company, troop, or battery officers of militia, volunteers, and the Regular Establishment in war.

"Let the Government then offer such commissions in the Regular Army to the best-trained men in the military departments of our colleges and universities, on the understanding that after a year they may return to civil life, retaining their commissions as officers of the reserve.

"I believe the young men would generously respond to the offer. And in my belief there is no better general qualification for success in civil life than a college education, with four years of incidental military training, followed by a year of service as an officer in the Regular Army.

"But it is possible for the land-grant universities (if not the colleges) to go further in this matter. Just as they now have departments of agriculture, civil and mechanical and electrical engineering, architecture, and, in many cases, law and medicine, which train men for definite vocations and professions—so they might establish military departments or colleges in which those desiring to fit themselves for the military profession might study the theoretical branches underlying that profession, as is now done at West Point, while at the same time undergoing a more extensive and intensive practical military training than that now required of other students.

"This would not involve any considerable addition to the existing departments of the large land-grant universities. When one compares their announcements of courses with that of West Point, it appears that most of them already have all the subjects covered by the latter except military engineering, ordnance and gunnery, and military hygiene. Special Federal appropriations to establish these departments would be necessary, but the cost should not exceed $15,000 or $20,000 a year for each fully organized and equipped military college of a land-grant university. And probably less than a score of institutions could undertake the establishment of such a military college.

"If such a course is to furnish officers for the reserve, it would entail some military obligations later—say, camp service for a week or two annually for a limited number of years; and therefore some financial recognition should be given to undergraduates, not, however, for the whole course, but only during the last two years, when the study of the specific military subjects had begun.

"The pay of a cadet at West Point is $600 per year for four years and one ration per day, or $709.50 if commutation be allowed therefor. If a student in the system of military colleges which I am imagining were to receive that amount during his entire course, I should consider it sufficient. The expense to the Government would be slight, a little over $700,000 a year for every thousand students.

"Nor does this exhaust the possibilities of cooperation between our universities and the Government in this great cause of national defense. I have spoken so far only of that group of colleges and universities which have received Federal aid and which are under legal obligation to maintain military tactics in their curriculum. But the privately endowed universities and large colleges or many of them would, I believe, if the Government authorized the necessary detail of officers, be quite willing to organize voluntary classes for military training. This is a resource which the Government should by all means utilize and develop. The system of military training now in operation in the land-grant colleges and universities might be at once extended to these sister institutions, and as new experiments were tried out in the former they could be established in the latter.

"It is quite conceivable that we may see the athletic excesses from which American colleges and universities still suffer find an effective corrective in military drill, with results highly beneficial to the individual and immensely serviceable and helpful to the Republic. Such students, if our Government only has the wit to utilize existing institutions and develop well-established practices, could be prepared before graduation to qualify as military officers competent to train in time of war our volunteer armies, which in a last resort form the military bulwark of the Republic."

I also desire to call your attention to a copy of the letter which I sent to each president. I include this copy because it briefly outlines the purposes of the bill.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 23, 1919.

DEAR ———: I am herein inclosing you H. R. 553, which I trust will receive your careful consideration. This is the same bill I introduced in the last Congress, but on account of war measures I was unable to get consideration.

I have had a conference with the President on this bill and the main objection he offered to the same was the lack of guns, etc., and the cost of same. This objection, as you know, has been removed, because the boys are being discharged and the Government is seeking a place to store arms and equipment. I desire especially to call your attention to section 3, methods of appointing the young men to scholarships. You will notice it is absolutely on merit and the poor boy is given the same chance as the rich boy. I had one term of teaching school and was for 10 years county superintendent of public instruction. The main trouble which worried me was how to keep the boy in high school. When I would go to him he would say, "What is the use? I can not hope to go through college as my parents are not able to send me, and as I have a good position offered me and it is the best I can do, I think it best for me to stop now." My bill will overcome, I believe, this trouble and will be a spur to each boy to try his best to secure the scholarship.

Of course this bill will have to be approved by each State and therefore it will take several years to get it into full operation. However, I estimate that in 10 years under my bill, if adopted, there will be one million and a half or two million young men, not with a meager six months' training but with a thorough military training and mentally and physically prepared to support this great country. Certainly, if we expect our boys under the draft system, which our Government has adopted, to fight for and many to die for our country, we should be at least liberal enough to give him an equal chance to make a good living. A country worth living in is worth fighting for, but a country which will make it possible for a boy to secure a collegiate education and at the same time teach him to intelligently care and fight for his country is doubly worth dying for.

Some may suggest that this will create a military caste and system, but I assure you such is not the case. I went through a military college and I owe my present health and I think I can say my present position to the training which I received. It puts everyone on an equal footing, removes the caste, and does anything except create a military spirit. However, I am proud to say that many of my classmates were able to materially assist in making possible our present great victory.

You will also note that I specifically reserve for each State the right to control the institution in that State. I am frank to state that I would object to surrendering this right. I am not wedded to a single section in this bill except the one to make it possible for our boys to secure a thorough education. It may be appalling to you to state that only about 83,000 boys annually attend our colleges.

I do not desire to weary you, but some have raised the objection that they do not care to send their boys to military schools. This is not and should not be an objection, for there are many private colleges of the highest standing where the boy with means can secure his education without having to undergo military training.

I am herein inclosing you editorial from the Palm Beach Post and the Jacksonville Times-Union on my bill. I sincerely trust you will give this bill your most careful consideration, and if it meets with your approval I trust you may see your way clear to bring it to the attention of those with whom you are associated, and I will more than appreciate a letter relative to same, and such suggestions as you care to make.

Yours very truly, ——— ———, M. C.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, in connection with one of the editorials that I offered and asked to have printed in the hearing—the editorial from the Florida Times-Union, I believe—it is clearly shown that the necessity for a large Army will be practically eliminated if this bill becomes a law. I sincerely trust that we may never have another war. Why? I say it without hesitancy—I said it during my last campaign and at other places where I have spoken—that the citizens of the United States will never appreciate what Members of Congress have gone through since the great World War began. I have said that the percentage of fatality in Congress was greater than that on the battle field. The figures will bear me out. I have said that that fatality was among men in the prime of life, and I think that fact will also be borne out; men who have worked hard, because we were up against a hard proposition. This bill, in part, is offered to relieve that condition in the future.

Why will it take the place of a large standing Army and make a large standing Army unnecessary? This bill provides for 250,000 scholarships in certain institutions. If the General Staff is correct, and I want to be just as fair to the committee as I am to the House, they drafted 18-year-old boys, and some of them were sent across, certainly with only a meager training. Under the terms of this bill such could not be the case, but on the contrary at the end of the first year you would have 250,000 boys who will have had one year of military training instead of three months. If we should not have a war in 10 years, and as I said, I sincerely trust that neither we nor our children may live to see another war, you will have in the United States, if you adopt this bill, between 700,000 and more than 1,000,000 men with one year, and more up to four years, of thorough military training. In addition to that, you will not have practically a million men, in round figures, who will have to be taught to read and write, as was the case with some of the recent Army that was called out to fight for us. It is no reflection on them, they fought bravely.

Therefore at the end of the second year, or at the end of the third year, after the law has been in operation—these figures are necessarily estimates because it is impossible to give them exact—you would have 250,000 young men 19 years of age with one year or more of military training. They pledge that in the case of war against the Government, defensive or offensive, and upon a proclamation of the President they will respond to the call and fight for the country. You can readily see you can reduce your standing Army in proportion. There is no question about that. After the bill has been in force for about five years, outside of a mere nucleus, the necessity of a standing Army in this country would be practically naught, and the expense saved in maintaining the necessary Army and that standing Army of 500,000 or 300,000, unless this bill becomes a law, would more than pay for keeping the boys in colleges and at the same time give them military training.

At the expense of repetition let me say again concerning the hesitancy of some boys to take advantage of the bill that they need not oppose it; they need not fear the result of the bill because of the compulsory clause, because unless Congress reverses itself if you have a war you are going to draft them and they will have to fight. Therefore he is not giving away any of his rights but is gaining all—an education.

Mr. DALLINGER. Why not enlarge the scope of your bill and take 500,000 boys?

Mr. SEARS. My answer to that, Mr. DALLINGER, is, as I answered the educators of the New England, Northern, Western, and Southern States, the difficulty of getting schoolmen to agree. If the rehabilitation bill, reported by this committee two years ago, had gone as far as Doctor FESS's bill went this year, there would have been no rehabilitation bill. Congress would have voted it down, because of its advanced ideas. So I had to fix upon some figure that would appeal to the people. I would like to make it a million, because if there should be only 200,000 boys who can qualify mentally and physically, then it follows you would only appropriate for that number. According to your suggestion, if you had 500,000 it would cost the Government $150,000,000, and, to be absolutely frank with you, I doubt if you could secure the passage of such a bill. Further, I know you could not secure that number of high-school graduates at present and you will not be able to do so until they fully appreciate the advantages of the bill.

Mr. DALLINGER. You do not think to-day that there would be 500,000?

Mr. SEARS. I regret to admit it, but I doubt it very seriously, and that is why I put it at 250,000. I put a provision in the bill that during the first year same is in force boys who are now in college shall be accredited with a scholarship. In other words, you take the Williams College that you referred to, and, while I forget the number, those who are already in there will get one year of military training or more, depending upon whether they are in the sophomore, junior, or senior year, and they agree to serve the Government for two years in case of war.

Mr. DALLINGER. Have you figured up what the capacity of these State-controlled and State-aided institutions is?

Mr. SEARS. I have to some extent.

Mr. DALLINGER. And you say that there are only 250,000 boys in all the schools of this country, Government-controlled and private, who would be qualified to take advantage of the provisions of this bill?

Mr. SEARS. You take my college—not my college, it is my alma mater—you take the University of Florida. It is never filled to its capacity; there are not enough boys to go there who can pay their way, but Florida will meet the requirements. Of course, now, to be equally frank with you, perhaps every institution will have to enlarge, but may I ask by way of answer, What State will be less generous to her boys than she has been for good roads? You must not forget the $78,000,000 already spent for grounds.

Mr. DALLINGER. I thought it was a hundred.

Mr. SEARS. No; $28,000,000 in buildings and $78,000,000 for grounds. As has already been said, there are seventy some odd thousand in those institutions to-day, and we are paying five million a year for certain of those institutions to run, and this amount perhaps could be reduced.

Mr. DALLINGER. This bill gives each student $200?

Mr. SEARS. Yes; and the State shall not give less than $50.

Mr. DALLINGER. Of course, that means each student will have to pay a considerable part of his expenses out of his own pocket.

Mr. SEARS. True, they will have to pay something, but I take it that the boy who is ambitious can find a way to earn $125 a year if he finds his finances running short by that amount. It cost me that much when I went to school, but I found a way to assist my parents in making it up, and I think that any boy who is given $300 or $400, if that much is necessary, to send him through school can find a way to make up the other hundred; if he can not, then he does not want an education very badly. I am glad you brought that question up, as it is right to the point. I am not in favor of the Government paying all the cost; the State ought to be interested. I am not in favor of the State paying all the cost; the boy ought to be interested. Let him appreciate some of his hardships; let him work. I have in mind a young friend of mine. If this bill had been in effect at the time he was going to school there is no telling the amount of good he might have done. He did much as it was. He started teaching for me in Osceola County with only a third-grade teacher's certificate—the teacher's examination in Florida is very strict. He taught one or two terms and then went to Stetson and spent the money he had saved. He came back and received a second-grade teacher's certificate. Of course, that increased his salary. He taught one term and then went back to Stetson; taught another term and went back to college at Lake City, Fla.; came back and received a first-grade certificate. He then taught one or two terms, and, as I remember, received his diploma. He came back and was again without money, but under his first-grade certificate he was appointed principal and taught another term. He then went before the State superintendent, who holds special examinations, and received a State certificate. Of course, what follows might have happened if my bill had been in effect. Before he could take advantage of his State certificate he was stricken with typhoid pneumonia and died. I will not say his time was wasted, for no doubt his struggle made him broader; but think how much more he could have accomplished if this bill had been a part of the law. Mr. Chairman, there are thousands of similar cases, no doubt, and you could possibly find them in your own district.

As I said, in 10 or 11 years after this bill becomes a law and the States have complied with its requirements you will have nearly a million young men in this country who, within an hour's time after the proclamation of the President, will be ready to take up arms and ready to fight; not only ready to fight, but trained to fight. Trained to the highest efficiency.

When I had my conference with the President he said he doubted the advisability of the bill at present, because of the cost. He said the cost of 250,000 guns and equipment would be enormous and at that time almost out of the question. With that statement I was in hearty accord, for we were at our wit's end to secure funds for our Army, but the committee realizes now that we will have a million guns—perhaps a couple of million or more—that could be placed in these colleges at practically no cost. If I had my way, Mr. Chairman, every time a new gun or cannon was invented at least one of said guns would be sent to each one of the colleges, in order that the boys there might keep pace with the advancement along these lines and know how to operate those instruments of warfare.

Mr. DALLINGER. As a matter of fact, it has always been the custom to give these schools the old discarded guns.

Mr. SEARS. I think Columbus must have used the gun I had, but I got so I could shoot fairly well with it, and I could hit four bull's-eyes out of five at 600 yards. I do not know what I would have done if somebody had been shooting at me. I doubt if I could have fired as accurately under fire, but there is no necessity of sending old guns now, because we have up-to-date guns to-day. I hear they are selling the Army blankets. I provide in this bill—and that will cut down the expense you are talking about—specifically that the Government shall furnish these and other necessities at cost; that is, a uniform at actual cost, blankets at actual cost, shoes at actual cost, etc., the student paying for them out of the $250 that the State and the Government provide. Certainly the Government, by buying these articles in large quantities, ought to be able, when we get back to a real peace-time basis, to buy these at a very low figure, and therefore sell them to the students at a minimum. I believe you will agree with me that the above is, or at least should be, true.

There is another great argument for the passage of this bill. I can appreciate it, because I went through it myself. When you put a boy in one of these colleges and put on him the uniform of the Government, even though he may not have a nickel in his pocket, even though it takes $100, as suggested by my good friend, more than given him by the Government and the State, and he has to borrow that from a friend; even though he has not a nickel to spend on ice cream or luxury, if he is neat and clean he can go down the streets of any city in the United States and hold his head up just as proudly and just as erect as the son of any millionaire, and I have seen it done. I have seen the rich boy—not the millionaire, because there were none of them in my school—but I have seen the boy, the son of the man with plenty and the boy who was working his way through college take the same standing in society and in their debating societies, just because everyone was on an equal footing and merit alone counted. I have gone to other schools, and I want to say that in the case of the boy who goes there and works his way through, many and many is the time at night, when he is down digging over his studies, tears will course down his cheeks because of some rebuff that was directed at him the day before because he did not, perchance, have on clothes as good as the other boy. It is only the strongest character that can stand those taunts and go on through college and prepare himself to fight the battles of life.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I have always been for constructive measures and, frankly, I do not believe that the universal system, as suggested by some—but I am not going into that at present, for I haven't the time. I will content myself with saying a great propaganda for it has been carried on. Why, I do not know. I do not care much for propaganda, as I have tried to make my constituents know I want to do right and, at least, that I believe I am in the right when I take up a fight. I hope that the day will never come—I doubt if it is wise to place these words in the record—when I shall cast a selfish vote. I have made this statement on the floor of the House repeatedly and have also made the same statement during my campaigns. I have never voted for a proposition for New York simply and solely because it affected New York, nor have I voted against a proposition because it affected New York and did not affect my district and State. I have never voted for a proposition that affected my district solely because it affected my district; but, on the contrary, I have taken stands against propositions for my district because I did not believe they were entitled to it or because I did not believe same was for the best, and I take that stand to-day. I sincerely trust I will never be forced to cast a selfish vote.

I have but one child. He is the idol of my heart and the apple of my eye; each heartbeat of his is a heartbeat of mine, and before I would vote to place him at the age of 18 or 19 or any age, under the age of 21, after trying for all these years to instill into him patriotism, love of his country, the importance of high moral standing, the importance of efficiency, and the confidence of his fellow man; if I should have to vote on a proposition to have him dragged out and placed among a million, indiscriminately gathered together, to be ruled over—and this with no reflection, because they are good men—and controlled by officers that did not know him, where there can be no personal touch, where they would not have a chance or opportunity to get in touch with him, I would vote against that proposition simply and solely from a selfish motive. I do not want to undo in three months what I have been all these years trying to do. However, if you take that boy and send him to the school under the control of the State, under the control of the people elected, where the reputation of the school is at stake, you get far better results, and, at the same time, you help to broaden him, you help mold him, and you help build up the character of the young man. Instead of perchance tearing down you add to what the parents have done. I am for these constructive measures. Let us look to the future and not just grasp something that is very temporary and which we will have to banish to-morrow. Let me urge upon this committee in the strongest possible terms the necessity of doing something to instill into the boys of this country a hope for the future and give them a chance to better their condition.

I have found it hard to create a lobby for a proposition where no interests are at stake. Parents love their children and you think they would take to this. I have had many parents tell me they wanted the bill to pass and some have also written me, but the large majority are busy making a living most of the time, and the boy has no one to represent him. I believe if you could go out before the country to-day and let the young men who are in the high schools appreciate the advantages of this bill Congress would be flooded with letters from the boys urging and requesting the passage of the bill. While they can not vote now, in a few years they will be the leading citizens of our country, and in a very few years more will be filling our places in the Halls of Congress. However, I want to state frankly I have many times doubted the advisability of a lobby and believe better results would many times be secured if we simply followed our judgment.

Mr. DALLINGER. Just one question, Mr. SEARS, before we adjourn. Had you thought of the advisability of taking advantage of all the educational institutions, private as well as public, just as the Government did during the war? As I understand it, the bill applies to public-owned and State-aided institutions.

Mr. SEARS. I have thought of that, but I doubt if they would agree to it. For instance, there are many conflicts—Baptist institutions priding themselves on being Baptist institutions, and so on.

Mr. DALLINGER. Do they exclude boys that are not Baptists?

Mr. SEARS. No, sir; but generally Baptist boys go to Baptist institutions, and to the Presbyterian schools it is principally Presbyterians who go, and so with other denominational schools the same condition exists.

Mr. DALLINGER. Why could not some arrangements be made in the apportionment of the number of pupils that should be assigned to each school, and let the boys choose their colleges?

Mr. SEARS. I have no fight to make against those institutions, as I said before.

Mr. DALLINGER. And if he wants to go to a Baptist college, let him go?

Mr. SEARS. In many of those institutions there are boys who can not qualify and boys who do not want to take the military training. You are going to find that there are many of them. It is not a one-sided proposition. I have talked to them, and, as I said, I have had personal experience. There are thousands of boys that can not qualify under this law that will want to go to these other institutions, and they would not go to the public institutions because of the strict military training, unless "father" should make them go. A great many boys do not like to submit to this training. Personally, I did not like it. I wanted to go to another institution, but my father had more sense than I did—I did not believe it at the time, but I have found it out since. So I do not think you will find any trouble in having the other institutions filled up. I would not object to such an amendment, except the system of checking up would be intricate. I would like to get one bill through Congress—and I do not say there have not been many—where every dollar appropriated, as far as possible, goes for the purpose for which it is appropriated. Do you get the point? I am trying to make it as near as possible so that if you appropriate $75,000,000, $50,000,000 of it will not be spent for a clerical force in Washington and useless purposes in checking up to see that the $25,000,000 was also spent. This is all arranged very simply in this bill, because the State colleges have to report to the State authorities and send a duplicate to the Secretary of War and to the board named in the bill. The expense is practically naught. The State superintendent or the head of the State institutions in the New England States would check up same and send a copy to the board at Washington, and you have it checked up.

The appropriations are paid quarterly and should not be paid more frequently.

Unless the privately controlled institutions will agree to make military training a real factor, there will be a great deal of conflict. For instance, take the University of Florida, and I am only speaking of that one because I am naturally more familiar with conditions and know more about the military training there. The military training at that institution, not because of the commandant, because he is a very efficient man and a perfect gentleman, has become practically nothing during the past few years. They only require the students to take a two, I believe, or perhaps a three, year course. You will find a large body of students walking around in civilian clothes, and they stand off and laugh while the other fellow is drilling. Naturally this condition creates a spirit of discontent among the boys who are compelled to drill. If these private schools will make it strictly military—that is, every student physically able must drill, must wear the uniform, must salute the flag, and the institution will enforce military discipline—it perhaps would be all right.

Mr. DALLINGER. You do not quite understand me. What I meant to say was that I do not see why, for instance, a college like Harvard University might not institute a course of military training such as they did during the war, and which, I understand, they intend to continue for such of the student body as desire to avail themselves of it.

Mr. SEARS. There is no objection to that.

I want to sincerely thank the committee for their attention and to apologize for my rambling remarks. But the bill is so long and so important it is impossible to cover it in any reasonable time. There are members of the committee who could have presented it in a stronger and more favorable light than myself, and I only trust something I have said may cause you to become interested.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. TOWNER). The committee desires to thank Mr. SEARS for his very exhaustive and enlightening exposition of his bill, and I may add that it is not necessary for him to apologize for taking the time of the committee. He is entitled to it on his own account, because of his long and distinguished service as a member of this committee, and he is also entitled to it because of the intrinsic interest of the subject. If other hearings are desired for the further consideration of the bill, arrangements will be made, of which the committee will be notified.

Mr. SEARS. I want to thank the gentleman for those kind words. They are appreciated to the fullest extent.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is now adjourned.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, military commissions, retiring boards, and compensation of reporters and witnesses attending same, and expenses of taking depositions and securing other evidence for use before the same, $70,000.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 5, strike out "$70,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$87,500."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, this is the item which provides the necessary funds for the expenses of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and other judicial processes of that character which are carried on in the War Department. The sum of $87,500, which I propose in my amendment, is carried in the current law for this purpose, and the estimate of the War Department for 1923 calls for $88,415 for this purpose. I assume we should be in complete agreement, whether we believe in a large Army or a small Army; that we should have an ample sum of money available at all times for the administration of justice; and when I speak of the administration of justice I include also the granting of clemency to those who deserve it. That is a very large part of the work of the office of the Judge Advocate General. The committee recommendation adopted yesterday, cutting down the number of officers from 13,000 to 11,000, has a very direct and vital effect upon the office of the Judge Advocate General. I shall be glad if I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, because I want to check my facts if my understanding differs from his.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will give the gentleman a little information right now. The committee appropriated $70,000 for this purpose. The department asked for $88,000 for courts-martial for an Army of 150,000 men. The revised figures submitted by the Chief of Finance for an army of 100,000 men calls for $63,000, so we figured that on the exact proportion for an Army of 115,000, and we allowed a little more ratio and gave $70,000, so our figures are in proportion to those submitted by the Chief of Finance.

Mr. ROGERS. I assume it is true in regard to testimony of the Chief of Finance that it is predicated upon the theory that we were to have 13,000 officers in the Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. This has largely to do with the enlisted men. They may figure a per capita basis.

Mr. ROGERS. I see. The point to which I wish to direct attention particularly is this: Yesterday we reduced the number of officers from 13,000 to 11,000. I was interested to ascertain just how that reduction would affect this branch of the War Department work.

I took occasion to telephone the Office of the Judge Advocate General to-day to learn what would happen with regard to that particular office. The Office of the Judge Advocate General has an authorized commissioned personnel of 114 at this moment with 1 vacancy. Thus there are now 113 commissioned officers under the Judge Advocate General. Part of the 113, of course, are of the so-called Regular Army class, and part of them are retained on the force from the emergency class.

Mr. VAILE. If the gentleman will yield, I hope the gentleman will call attention to the fact that the work of the Judge Advocate General's Office now is by no means confined to courts-martial matter. It has a very large amount of civil business to attend to, such as the preparation of contracts, matters arising out of the ownership of land, and matters connected with admiralty law.

Mr. ROGERS. All kinds of claims growing out of the war are handled by the Office of the Judge Advocate General in addition to the types of cases which the gentleman from Colorado and I have already cited. Thus it is true that the administration of courts-martial and other disciplinary matters comprises only a fractional part of the functions of that office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. This item, I will say, goes almost entirely to the pay of witnesses and the expenses of reporters and stenographers in trials. It has nothing to do with the pay of officers of the Judge Advocate General's Office.

Mr. ROGERS. I entirely understand that. My purpose in offering this amendment is to raise the point whether, in view of the reduction of the commissioned personnel in that office, we are not going to need more money to replace with civilian personnel the officers who will necessarily be eliminated.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not see how it could possibly affect the officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department.

Mr. ROGERS. Here is the situation: There is 1 major general of the old Regular Establishment, who is the Judge Advocate General. There are 13 colonels in all, of whom 9 are of the old Regular Establishment and 4 are emergency officers. There are 15 lieutenant colonels, of whom 7 are of the old Regular Establishment and 8 are emergency officers. There are 50 majors, 7 of whom are old line officers and 43 are emergency officers. There are 34 captains, none of whom are of the old establishment, but all of whom are emergency officers. Thus of the 113 officers now attached to the office of the Judge Advocate General, 24 are of the old Regular Establishment and 89 are emergency officers. My next statement may possibly be questioned by some members of the committee. It is my impression, however, as the result of the legislation on pages 15 and 16 of this bill, that every one of those 89 emergency officers will find themselves out of the service either voluntarily or because their resignations are asked for. If that is true, and I believe it to be true—and I am told by the office of the Judge Advocate General that it is true—the result of this legislation is that there will be only 24 officers attached to the Judge Advocate General's Office when the pending bill becomes effective.

A very small proportion of those 24 men are technically trained in the law. It is extremely difficult to procure commissioned regular officers who are trained, tried legal men, and who can serve in the manifold duties which are required. As a matter of fact, as I say, very few of the 24 of the old Regular Establishment are equipped with the kind of legal experience which they have always needed, but which, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE] suggests, they need much more now than ever before. It is these 89 emergency officers, mostly majors and captains, who have been handling a tremendous part of the legal problems which have multiplied almost in geometrical ratio as a result of the war. It is they who will be eliminated by this bill.

I should like to call the attention of the committee to the testimony of the Judge Advocate General, which appears in the hearings, beginning on page 224. He shows the great volume of work on the criminal side of his office. The Judge Advocate General's office is getting some 3,000 cases of all kinds every month. Six hundred to seven hundred cases involving courts-martial findings come to the office every month.

The number apparently is increasing from time to time instead of decreasing, as one might have expected, to correspond with the decrease in the size of the Army which has already occurred. It is for that reason that I am inclined to disagree with the viewpoint of the chairman of the subcommittee in saying that as the Army is reduced the need for the sum originally requested becomes reduced. I am inclined to think there will be at least a maintenance of the present requirement. The present law, which I am incorporating in my proposed amendment, carries $87,500 for this purpose. I am convinced that as a result of the officer legislation carried in this bill we are going to cut down the number of officers available for this extremely difficult and important work from 113 to 24. I propose by this amendment to do the best we can to remedy in part the deficiency in this extremely important branch of the military service.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I want to again assure the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] that there is nothing in the bill that I know of that has the slightest reference to a reduction of officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department, and his increase of this item from $70,000 to $87,500 will not have the slightest effect in the world on the number of officers in that department. In fact, the entire question would be in the hands of the Secretary of War. And if the gentleman from Massachusetts has confidence in the Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, to maintain the proper number of officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department, I am sure there will be no change there.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROGERS. I should like to ask whether, if this amount was increased, as proposed by the amendment, from the $70,000 in the bill the extra $17,500 would not be available for the civilian employees to remedy the absence of the commissioned personnel?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is taken care of in another item in the bill, and this item, as I have tried to explain to the gentleman, pays for witnesses, expenses of stenographers, and so forth, at military trials.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of clerks and other employees of the Finance Department, $1,000,000.

Mr. KING and Mr. WOODRUFF rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KING: On page 22, line 15, under the War Department, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,300,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, this is a section that has to do with compensation of clerks and other employees of the Finance Department, for which $1,000,000 is appropriated.

There was $300,000 set aside in last year's bill for the contract audit division of this department, which this year, for some reason, has been eliminated, and the appropriation has been cut down from $1,300,000 to $1,000,000. It is very important for the House to take notice of this, it seems to me, and I desire at this point to call its attention to the amendment, which I hope the House will adopt. At this point I simply want to drive a peg to which we can go back to some of these days. Here I simply want to turn down a page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that we may some future time easily find it and to inform the House of the work this department is doing, for the purpose of bringing to justice those men who robbed this Government of millions of dollars during the war in Europe.

If you stop this work then they can not accumulate the evidence which they are now getting together for the purpose of instituting and conducting these prosecutions. They are doing a great work, and I am satisfied if the "Budgetry" have had a hand in keeping down this appropriation they did not know of the great work that this department is doing. I desire to read a short letter which I wrote a few days ago to the Secretary of War, which will explain the situation:

MARCH 20, 1922.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In perusing the hearings and the report of the House Committee on Appropriations in connection with H. R. 10871, Army appropriation bill, I have noticed that the amount named for the field service of the Finance Department is $1,000,000, which, I understand, is some $300,000 less than the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year.

Will you kindly inform me what portion of the above-named amount is to be used for the war contract auditing activity of the Finance Department, as I am very much interested in this particular function and feel that ample provision should be made for its continued and enlarged prosecution.

I understand that there has been found up to this time an amount approximating $48,000,000 due to the United States Government from war contractors, and that there has been so far recovered by the energies of the Chief of Finance without the assistance of the Department of Justice about $3,000,000.

Detailed and complete information on the above matter is respectfully requested, as I am impressed with the belief that the public interest demands not only a continuance and enlargement of this activity of the Finance Department but a more complete coordination with the Department of Justice, to the end that recovery may be made of the millions of dollars wrongfully and fraudulently taken from our Government.

As the Army appropriation bill is now before the House, it is requested that the above information be furnished me at your early convenience.

Very truly yours, EDWARD J. KING.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the time is coming in this country, and the people are demanding it, when justice will have to be meted out to those who exacted undue profits and excessive prices from the Government during the war. Congress has not forgotten it. Let no man think this Congress has forgotten the work of these great extortionists during the war. Congress is the friend of the people. It is their only recourse. And the Congress will demand the prosecution of these men. The time is coming slowly, but surely. You know the old quotation—

The mills of the gods grind slowly,
But they grind exceeding small.

Not only this, but the failure to prosecute these people, which I am sure the administration will not permit, is ruining this country and proving a demoralizing agency. If you ask any prosecuting attorney what reason is given by lawless men for holding up trains, robbing banks, and continually engaging in crime, the prosecutor will tell you that they answer, every one of them, or at least nine out of every ten, "Well, the big fellow is getting his, and I am going to get mine." If you want to bring back the moral conditions that existed in this country prior to the war, this prosecution should go on.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman says, "the mills grind exceeding small." Do not the mills grind the exceeding small?

Mr. KING. They are grinding, and some day these fellows, however powerful they are, and whatever technicalities they may raise, will by the force of public opinion be brought to the bar of justice and punished for their wrongdoing, as they should be. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to offer the amendment which was just offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING], and would have done so had the Chair recognized me for that purpose. So I arise in support of the amendment, as I believe it of the utmost importance that sufficient funds be provided with which to carry on the work of auditing the 100,000 war contracts and recovering for the Government the hundreds of millions of dollars which this audit will prove was unlawfully collected from the Public Treasury.

I have some information in my possession in regard to the particular activities covered by the amendment of the gentleman who has just spoken—information, perhaps, which was not given to the committee during their hearings. I have scanned the committee hearings, and I fail to find in the testimony given by the representatives of the Finance Department in the War Department where the committee was given any information as to the vast amount of work to be done by the force engaged in the auditing of war contracts. One gentleman who appeared there on behalf of the Finance Department stated that in the last year and a half the contract audit section had audited 15,000 war contracts, and that he believed about one-third of those war contracts had been audited. This gentleman either misunderstood the question asked him or he was grossly ignorant of the matter under discussion, as I was informed no later than to-day by the head of the Finance Department that there were in all approximately 100,000 war contracts to be audited.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the contract audit section of the Finance Department has been in operation about one and one-half years, during which period there have been audited 15,000 war contracts which were entered into by the various bureaus of the War Department.

In the course of this audit there has been found due the United States from war contractors approximately $46,000,000, of which there has been collected by the Chief of Finance, without the assistance of the Department of Justice, about $3,000,000.

The findings of the contract audit section forms a positive and tangible basis for action by the Department of Justice, and it is estimated that there will be developed by a close coordination between the two activities named an amount of money approximating $750,000,000 which was wrongfully and fraudulently taken from the United States Government by those war contractors, whose operations have, incident to the audit of their contracts, indicated unmistakable criminal dishonesty. A large percentage of these millions may be recovered and returned to the Public Treasury.

While 15,000 contracts have been audited and $46,000,000 found to be due the Government, approximately $3,000 per contract, it would seem that the sum estimated to be found by a complete audit is too large. This is not the case, however, for to date only a very few of the larger contracts have been audited, the work done consisting almost exclusively of the smaller ordnance contracts. In the few larger contracts audited very large recoveries are indicated in almost every case, and it is on this condition the figures of $750,000,000 are based.

The amount stated in the Army appropriation bill—fiscal year 1923—now pending for the field service of the Finance Department is $1,000,000, which is nearly $300,000 less than the appropriation for the present fiscal year. The contract audit section is a part of the finance field service, and was only allotted for the present fiscal year about $200,000, and at this time has only a civilian personnel of 87.

It can readily be seen that if an amount was appropriated for this activity which was commensurate with its importance, an additional personnel of expert accountants could be employed on this work, and the United States Government would recover an enormous sum of money with a very small outlay. This is the purpose of this amendment.

The recovery of this vast sum would not only have a decided effect on the morale of the commercial world but would offset to a large extent any funds which might be required in connection with meeting the obligation incident to the soldiers' bonus.

To give the committee some idea of the working of the contract audit section I propose to cite a few typical examples of war contracts audited by this section:

A contract was made by a bureau of the War Department for the disposal of a large amount of a special kind of supplies. An audit of this contract was made by the contract audit section, which developed the fact that the amount being received by the United States was very much less than the true value of the property sold and that the United States was being put to expense for the purpose of converting the property from a condition in which it was to be paid for under the contract at a higher price to a condition in which a lower price was applicable. The Department of Justice took up this case with a view to recovering any funds wrongfully withheld from the Government, the amount of which will be subsequently determined.

A contract was made by a bureau of the War Department for the disposal of a very large quantity of surplus raw material. An audit of this contract has indicated that the contractor has underpaid the Government in the amount of $1,854,076.04. This case is now in the hands of the Department of Justice.

Production contracts were made by a branch of the War Department with a large corporation for a certain class of war material. An audit of these contracts has demonstrated that this contractor was paid about $9,600,000 for which, as far as the War Department records show, no services were rendered or property delivered. This case has also been given to the Department of Justice, who will call upon the contractor for an accounting for this sum.

Contracts were made with a corporation where materials were supplied to contractor by the Government and not accounted for by him in finished articles delivered or materials otherwise returned to the Government. The amount found due from this contractor is $1,371,368.02. This case is being prepared for transmittal to the Department of Justice.

A contractor had two contracts with the Government, one of which provided that the contractor should be furnished Government material and the other contract provided that the contractor should furnish his own material. An audit of these contracts showed that the Government material had been used on both contracts. The amount involved is approximately $700,000. This case is now the subject of correspondence between the finance office and the contractor.

On a contract for the sale of surplus war supplies, when shipments were made to Government arsenals the Government was to pay the freight. An audit showed that under this provision the Government had paid approximately $30,000 in freight to private manufacturers. The same contract provided that the price to be paid for the material was to be determined to a considerable extent by commercial sales during the period of the contract. The contractor furnished statements covering the amount of such sales, which were used as the basis upon which he made his payments to the Government. When an audit of the contract was undertaken and the contractor was called upon to show the correctness of these figures, he stated that they were made without first-hand knowledge on his part, but had been obtained from a third party, and that he understood that the basic papers upon which these figures were based had been destroyed. The approximate amount involved is $2,200,000. This matter is being made the subject of further investigation.

As a result of an audit of contracts for the manufacture of certain articles of equipment it was found that the contractor was indebted to the United States in the sum of $44,527.51 on account of Government-owned material not accounted for. A cash collection was made covering the value of this property.

The finance department recovered $71,093.39 in cash as the result of an audit by the contract audit branch of a number of ordnance contracts between the Government and the Republic Iron & Steel Co.

T. A. Gillespie on one ordnance contract overused Government material valued at $98,984.61, which was determined after a complete audit of the contract. The amount due was collected by the finance department.

A contract was placed with the Washington Steel & Ordnance Co. for machining 14-inch high-explosive shells. Forgings of the value of $104,450.89 were delivered by the United States to the contractor's plant for use under this contract. The armistice intervened before work was started on this contract, and these forgings had apparently been lost sight of. The audit of the contract disclosed that the forgings were still on hand at the plant, and that, while the department had been advised in November, 1918, that the forgings had been shipped to the contractor, no action had subsequently been taken toward recovering the material, which has since been accomplished as a result of the audit by the office of the chief of finance.

These cases are quoted as typical of many hundred contracts already audited, and are illustrating the reasons why a complete audit is vitally necessary for the public interest. They represent but a very few of the many cases where this department has either collected the money due the Government or supplied the Department of Justice with the facts upon which to base prosecution.

Mr. Chairman, as I said before, one of the witnesses before the committee stated 15,000 contracts had been audited and that the work was about one-third completed.

Now, as a matter of fact there are 36,000 Ordnance contracts; there are 37,000 Air Service contracts; there are 800 large construction contracts, and those construction contracts involve sums running from $500,000 up to something like $80,000,000 or $90,000,000, including the Muscle Shoals construction contracts. These construction contracts were all let upon a cost-plus basis, and the possibilities of making large recoveries on these particular contracts seems to me very great.

Now, we all know there has been more or less scandal regarding the construction contracts the Government entered into at the beginning of the war and during the progress of the war, and it seems to me highly important that these contracts should be carefully audited and with expedition. The contract audit department has merely touched the air contracts, and yet the Government expended something like $1,200,000,000 in that department during the war without ever putting a battle plane into action. One of the very few of these contracts audited to date discloses the fact that the contractor has been paid millions in excess of the sums he should have been paid. As a result of the audit these millions will be returned to the Treasury, and I most sincerely hope the contractor will be jailed. There are 37,000 of these contracts. There are innumerable quartermaster supply contracts. There are so many of these contracts that the officials have not the slightest idea how many there are. Then there are contracts for the Chemical Warfare Service, for the Signal Corps, for the Motor Transport, and transactions pertaining to the sale of surplus property that need careful auditing.

In one of these Air Service contracts the contract audit has discovered that certain people were guilty not only of taking from the Government millions of dollars, but that in doing so they made themselves criminally liable. This case is now in the hands of the Department of Justice for collection and prosecution.

In calling attention to these typical cases I have in some instances named the companies or individuals involved. These people have shown a desire to settle with the Government when the conditions have been called to their attention. In other cases I have carefully refrained from mentioning the firms or individuals implicated, for the reason that the evidence is such as to indicate criminal liability, and I do not wish to embarrass the Department of Justice in their work of prosecution.

In auditing these accounts the contract audit has found many firms who settled promptly and gladly when the facts were brought to their attention. In many other instances evidence of criminal conspiracy and graft have been discovered and these cases have been turned over to the Department of Justice for prosecution, and, as I said before, I do not believe the committee during the hearings had the slightest information that the number of contracts was as large as it is. The figures I quote, I will say to the members of the committee, are figures that I received from the department. They are authentic. I was told this morning by General Lord that in his opinion there were at least 100,000 war contracts to be audited by his department. There are 87 men employed in that department. In a year and a half they have been able to audit less than 15,500 of these accounts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that this item does not extend to the clerical force of the War Department in Washington, in the District of Columbia?

This item is for the employment of clerk hire in the field, in this country and outside the country, at posts, as, for instance, in Paris and in New York, in Boston, and elsewhere.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Does the gentleman know that there are only nine members of the contract auditing force employed in the city of Washington, and that these nine auditors have in the year and a half they have been employed at this work given to the departments of the Government information upon which to base a recovery of $13,000,000?

Mr. STAFFORD. There are 14 clerks employed in that work.

Mr. WOODRUFF. There are nine clerks only employed in the contract audit in the city of Washington.

Mr. ANTHONY. Most of the clerks employed in the contract auditing force are in the field—out in these factories—where they ought to be.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I quite agree with the chairman of the committee that a large force of these auditors should be in the field. I do not believe, however, that a sufficient number is employed either in Washington or in the field. With the personnel we have at work on these contracts it has been possible to audit them only at the rate of 10,000 per year, and even though this force is not to be reduced it will be 10 long years before the last of the contracts are audited, the money recovered, and the criminals brought to the bar of justice.

The purpose of this amendment, Mr. Chairman, is not alone to keep the present capable group of men at work, but it is to enable the Finance Department to employ enough additional help to complete this audit before either the statute of limitations or death itself intervenes to defeat the ends of justice. I would like to see the contract audit section largely increased. This amendment will accomplish this end. That the committee reduction over last year's appropriation as contemplated in this bill does not provide sufficient funds to pay the men now engaged in this work, to say nothing about increasing this force, is indicated by a statement made to me by a man high in authority in the Finance Department to the effect that if a cut is to be made in the appropriations the effect must of necessity be felt largely in the contract audit section. This means a reduction in the personnel of this department.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the chairman and every member of the Appropriations Committee feel exactly as I do. I believe they want to see this work carried on to its completion. In view of the testimony submitted to the committee, from which they could infer there were only 45,000 contracts all told to be audited, they concluded this work would be completed in two years more and that the present force in this department would not be reduced by reason of the reduction in the appropriation. But I have given the facts as they are and not as the committee supposed them to be, and I believe it would be the height of folly to reject this amendment. Either this work is to be done within the generation or it is not. Adopt the amendment and this work will be speedily completed, hundreds of millions recovered for the Treasury, and I hope every guilty man placed behind the bars.

I doubt whether the Members of the House can condone the actions of many of our business men in seizing with alacrity the opportunity of vastly increasing their wealth through the execution of war contracts at a time when millions of our young men were compelled by law to offer their lives, and were paid but a dollar a day for their offering. We all agree, I think, that business should have been satisfied with a legitimate profit. The work of the contract audit section is disclosing that the great majority of the business concerns of the country were satisfied to stay within the law. It is also disclosing the fact that this country harbors to-day many supposedly respectable business men who did not hesitate to throw to the winds conscience, decency, and morals when by so doing they could, supposedly, profit at the expense of the public and a war-burdened Treasury.

It is only justice that the decent, law-abiding business men be given a clean bill of health. It is their due. It is justice, also, that the law-defying grafter, the man who would deliberately steal from the Government, be made to return his ill-gotten gains and to suffer the most extreme penalty which an outraged justice can impose. I most sincerely hope the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the item under discussion refers to the clerical force of the finance department at work in the field outside of Washington, except the nine men who are at work in the auditing of contracts in the office here in Washington.

Last year the total appropriation for this purpose was $1,420,000. For the next fiscal year the estimate of the Budget was $1,267,000. The committee have allowed $1,000,000. The estimate of $1,267,000 was based upon an army of 150,000 men. The chief of finance states that the reduction can be made in view of the reduction in the size of the Army. We have reduced it below the amount that they have stated it could be reduced, but not a great deal. The gentlemen who have spoken are interested in the auditing of war contracts. So are the committee that prepared this appropriation bill interested in the auditing of these war contracts. We do not want to interfere in the slightest degree with that work.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply wish to ask the gentleman from Kansas if it is not a fact that in the finance department they have quite a large force of clerks checking up on the contracts for purchases in order that they may take advantage of the discount?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. And if this appropriation is cut too low they will have to transfer clerks from that division into the auditing division if the auditing division is to keep up with its work.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not.

Mr. McKENZIE. Therefore it will cripple them either at one end or the other.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. I will say to the gentleman that every bureau, when you lessen the number of clerks, immediately sets up a hue and cry that you are crippling their work, and if we had listened to the complaints of these various bureaus every year they would still have the forces that they had while the war was going on.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], who has just interrogated the chairman of the committee, will vouch for what I said a moment ago when I stated that a man high in authority in the office of the Finance Department said to me this morning, in the presence of the gentleman from Illinois, that if this cut was made the contract-auditing end of the work would have to suffer.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman to whom you refer should cut any of the force engaged in the auditing of war accounts, I am sure we would all be very much disappointed, and we do not believe he will have to do it. The 1923 estimate provides for 905 clerks, of whom 187, at a total salary of $140,000, are employed in the auditing of war contracts. Now, we are appropriating $1,000,000 for this entire work, and it seems to us that it ought not to interfere with the continued use of $140,000 for this very meritorious work of auditing war contracts. I do not want to criticize the Finance Department, because they are very efficient and they are doing a good work. There is a disposition in the Finance Department to station finance officers at every Army post in the country, whether there is necessity for it or not. Now, where there is a small post and a quartermaster's officer is stationed there, economical administration would suggest that the quartermaster's officer be allowed to make the disbursements, instead of putting in a finance officer above him and perhaps a few more clerks.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ANTHONY. We believe they could work economies along this line, and we are cutting down the appropriation about $100,000 below what they thought it ought to be for an Army of the size we are providing for.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not want the chairman of the committee to misunderstand me. I assure him and the members of the committee that I believe he is doing the very best he can and that he has at heart the best interest not only of the service itself but of the people generally. I believe he has made an honest attempt to arrive at the proper figures, but I do not believe he had the information on which to base those figures when he presented the bill to the House, and I believe the fact that there are something like 100,000 contracts yet to be audited should receive some consideration.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KING. I do not think either the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. WOODRUFF] or anyone else has intended to criticize the committee in any degree whatever.

Mr. Chairman, we know the great work this committee is doing, but we have received the information that they intend to cut off that part of the appropriation which applies to the contract auditing department in the District of Columbia, which is a part of the Quartermaster Corps. Now, we want to know, is this going to be cut off, and is this work of the investigation of war contracts going to be suspended?

Mr. ANTHONY. If they should cut off any of it, I think they would be entitled to very severe criticism.

Mr. KING. That would not do much good.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WOODRUFF) there were—ayes 12, noes 40.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations made herein for pay of the Army shall be used, except in time of emergency, for the payment of troops garrisoned in China or for payment of more than 500 officers and enlisted men on the Continent of Europe; nor shall such appropriations be used, except in time of emergency, for the payment of more than 5,000 enlisted men in the Panama Canal Zone or more than 5,000 enlisted men in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. ROGERS. I suggest that the gentleman make his point of order.

Mr. CRAGO. I make the point of order; and in support of the point of order I simply wish to call attention to the fact that this is new legislation, and is a limitation which is not in accordance with the rules in such cases provided. The provision is—

Nor shall any provision in any such bill—

Speaking of an appropriation bill—or any amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall reduce expenditures—

In certain ways.

First, by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States. This does not do that, as I think it will be admitted. Second, by the reduction of compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States. I think it will be admitted that this provision does not do that. Third, by the reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill. I think it will be admitted that this provision does none of these three things.

Now, my point of order goes to the fact that this is legislation and an attempt to usurp the functions of the President of the United States and Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States. If it is proper for this language to be used in an appropriation bill, it would be possible for Congress in an appropriation bill to direct that no moneys herein appropriated shall be used for the payment of, say, more than 100 troops stationed along the Mexican border; or it would be possible to say by legislation that no part of this appropriation shall be paid for the maintenance or pay of troops unless they are all quartered north of Mason and Dixon's line. I insist that the language is repugnant to the principles which govern general appropriation bills and is therefore subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the power to do a thing and the exercise of the power are two entirely different things. We could provide in this bill that no part of this money should be paid to anybody in the Army but red-headed men or blue-eyed men. Having the power to make an appropriation, we can put a limitation in as to whom it may be paid to and whom it may not be paid to. That is the appropriation. That does not interfere with the power of the President. He can not maintain any troops unless we appropriate the money for it unless he paid it out of his own pocket. We have the power to say that we will not appropriate a dollar for any purpose. There is no power in the world except our constituency which can reverse our action. Having the power to appropriate, having the power to refuse to appropriate, we can appropriate on conditions with limitations. That is all this is. I question the advisability of exercising the power. That, however, would be a matter for the Congress to determine. I do not see how there can be any question as to the power to put a limitation on the appropriation as far as the rules are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very frank in saying that he is so much opposed to this proposition that he has tried to find some way of holding it out of order. But the Chair does not see how that is possible in any way in compliance with the rules of the House. Furthermore, the Chair conceives that his personal opinion of the merits of a proposition should never govern his decision on a point of order but only his knowledge of precedent and orderly procedure.

Congress has the power to limit or decrease executive discretion by withholding an appropriation. It has not the power to affirmatively direct the doing of a particular act, but it has the power, through its control of the purse strings of the Nation to prevent an appropriation being made under certain conditions. There are a number of precedents on this point which are not worth while to cite, because the merits of the question here involved seem to the Chair entirely clear. The Chair recollects a notable case where the decision was made by the House itself. It was in a case where the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] offered an amendment to the sundry civil bill providing that no part of the appropriation to erect a certain building in the city of Cleveland could be used unless it were built of granite. Under the law the Secretary of the Treasury had the discretion of building it either of granite or sandstone. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole ruled the amendment out of order because he held it to be affirmative legislation, but the Committee of the Whole on an appeal by a very large vote refused to sustain the decision of the Chair.

Congress has the complete and exclusive power to appropriate for the pay of the Army. It may grant or withhold appropriation to any extent it pleases. It has not the power to direct the President to do or not to do a particular thing with reference to the assignment of the Army to this country or that, but having the power to entirely withhold the appropriations that go for the pay of the Army it unquestionably has the power to direct that no part of the appropriation shall be used to pay that portion of the Army that is in a certain country or countries, as this provision does. The Chair therefore feels compelled to overrule the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, beginning with line 20, strike out the paragraph ending with line 2 on page 23.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am very much opposed to the retention of the paragraph in the bill for two reasons: First, because to my way of thinking the proposal is clearly unconstitutional; and second, because I think that even if it be deemed constitutional it is an extremely unwise exercise of the power of the Congress.

So far as the constitutional point is concerned, I prepared and had inserted in the RECORD some days ago a discussion of the authorities so far as I had at that time been able to find them. That discussion, in case any members of the committee are interested in this phase of the matter, will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Saturday, at page 4109. Since that time I have assembled further authorities on this subject, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks in the ordinary CONGRESSIONAL RECORD type. I ask unanimous consent to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in 8-point type. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. There is no authority upon the constitutional aspect of the case that I have been able to find which discusses the question at all which does not definitely state that such a provision as this is beyond the power of Congress.

But as the Secretary of War says, in effect, in the course of his testimony before the committee of the House—if it is not treason to quote the Secretary of War on this floor—"I think Congress has not the constitutional power to do these things, but even if it has the power, I believe it will be a mighty bad thing for Congress to exercise that power." If we once begin undertaking to run the details of the Army and Navy of the United States, telling the President who shall go here and who shall go there, how long they may stay, and what they may do when they get there, there is absolutely no end to the inefficiency and demoralization which will result from a program of that kind.

In my judgment this attempt is bad in itself. It is even worse because of what it may easily lead to. If we embark on a policy of trying to run the Army from the House of Representatives and the Senate it will result in the most colossal and most untold damage to the morale and efficiency of the Army for all time.

Other members of the committee wish to discuss this paragraph. As I have already discussed it twice, I shall not take any more time of the committee.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO CONTROL THE DISTRIBUTION OF THE FORCES COMPOSING THE REGULAR MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

It is believed that the power of Congress stops, and ought to stop, when it has determined the nature and size of the Military Establishment, and of the component parts thereof, and that the distribution of the forces composing such Military Establishment is an incident to the use of these forces, and that this distribution and this use pertain to the functions of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It is accordingly believed that the distribution of these forces belongs to the President of the United States, both as a matter of a constitutional division of powers between the legislative and executive branches of the Government, and also that this belongs to the President as a matter of sound judgment, policy, and wisdom, and that whatever may be the powers of Congress they ought not to be exercised in such manner as to limit the President of the United States in his distribution and use of the military forces.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER OF CONGRESS TO DISTRIBUTE THE MILITARY FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Pursuant to Article II, section 2, clause 1, of the Constitution, it is provided that—

The President shall be the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States.

It must, of course, be conceded that the Constitution is doing something more than giving a name to one of the functions of the President. The Constitution indisputably is conferring upon the President certain powers of command of the military and naval forces, and pari passu, it is withholding those very powers from the legislative branch of the Government. The only question is: What are the powers thus conferred?

The simplest answer to this question is that the framers of the Constitution must have intended to confer upon the President those powers of command with which they were familiar as being enjoyed to their knowledge, and within their experience, by a commander in chief, and these powers thus enjoyed in 1787 included, of course, the power of the commander in chief to determine where the different units and component parts of his command should be sent for use, actual or prospective. The commander in chief had and has no responsibility in determining the size or character of the force which is to constitute his command. His function is to command it when supplied to him, but when once raised, organized, and supplied to the commander in chief, the function of the legislative or other authority by which the military force is raised and supplied has been discharged. The acts of Parliament will be searched in vain to find instances in which the power of a military commander has been attempted to be curtailed by directing that a particular portion of his command shall be used in a particular way or sent to a particular place. It is, of course, true in general that the power which creates an Army may afterwards terminate its existence, or curtail it, or bring to an end any of its parts or organizations, and that any component part of a command may, by such authority, be taken from one commander and transferred to another commander, but this general proposition is entirely inapplicable to the command exercised over the military and naval forces of the United States by the President, because the Constitution gives him command of all the military and naval forces of the United States, and Congress may not constitutionally devolve supreme command of any part of these forces upon anyone other than the President of the United States.

Authorities dealing with this proposition are not numerous.

The Court of Claims has said in Swain v. United States, 28 Ct. Cls., 173, 221, that Congress can not impair the authority of the President as commander in chief, and that so long as we have a military force Congress can not take away from the President the supreme command.

In the United States v. Sweeny, 157 U. S., 281, 284, the court said that the Constitution has conferred upon the President—such supreme and undivided command as would be necessary to the prosecution of a successful war.

It must be obvious that the court was merely defining in terms of the situation existing in time of war the general nature of the command of the President, the nature of that command being, of course, the same both in peace and in war, for the Constitution makes him commander in chief in peace as well as in war. The President could not, of course, legally or properly commit aggressive acts of war in time of peace, but this fact has nothing to do with the nature of his command or rather the quantum of authority implied in the command which the Constitution gives him. It has only to do with determining how he shall exercise the power that he has.

The only other case in which our highest tribunal has said anything on this subject is the case of Fleming v. Page, 9 Howard, 603, 615.

Sutherland in his Notes on the United States Constitution, page 469, states the ruling of the Supreme Court in this case as follows:

As Commander in Chief the President is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed under his command, and to employ them in a manner which he may deem most effectual for the purposes for which they exist.

But in this language Sutherland has missed a part of the doctrine which it would seem was in the mind of Chief Justice Taney in his opinion of this case. For what the Chief Justice really said in that opinion was really this—as Commander in Chief, the President is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed by law at his command.

There seems to be an antithesis in the mind of the Chief Justice indicated by the words that Sutherland omits. The forces are placed by law at the command of the President, and the source of the law is, of course, Congress. In other words, it is Congress that creates the force for the President to command, and it is the President and not Congress that is authorized to direct its movements. It is, of course, clear that the directing of the movements of the military force is inseparable from the controlling of the disposition or distribution of the force.

Pomeroy in his work on Constitutional Law draws very clearly the distinction between the powers of the President and the powers of Congress. It is Congress, not the President, that fixes the strength of each unit or organization, the number and grade of its officers, their duties and their pay, that defines military offenses and fixes their punishment, and that provides for the procedure of courts-martial; but it is the President, and not Congress, who is empowered to make all dispositions of troops, vessels, supplies, and munitions when once these troops, vessels, and supplies are placed under the command of the President. The language of Pomeroy is well worthy of quotation, reading as follows:

Congress, under its supreme authority, passes laws which concern the military alone, and these the President must enforce with the same diligence and by virtue of the same function that he carries out those legislative mandates which apply alone to civilians; he is not then operating as commander, but as a supreme civil magistrate. But as Commander in Chief he calls other attributes into action, for which the legislature has furnished the occasion, but which do not consist in executing any positive laws. I repeat, it is important that these two classes of powers and duties should be kept distinct. Under its authority to raise armies, maintain navies, furnish supplies, and the like, Congress may direct the manner in which the President's power shall be exercised, for he will be, in fact, but executing its commands. Thus it may determine how many men shall be enlisted in each branch of the service, or what and how many armed vessels shall be constructed. As Congress is to make all appropriations, it may declare the specific purpose for which money is to be used; what forts shall be erected, and their cost; what ships built, their character and cost; what kind of arms purchased or manufactured and the cost. Instances of this sort might be multiplied. In all these cases great or little discretion may be left to the Executive and his subordinates, as the legislature deems best. Congress is authorized to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces; it may therefore arrange and classify these forces; fix upon the plan of organization; determine upon the number, duties, and pay of officers; define military offenses and allot the punishment; provide for the creation, jurisdiction, and procedure of courts-martial, and for carrying out their sentences. The President's duties in respect to these various subjects may thus be clearly defined and controlled by the legislature. But in time of peace he has an independent function. He commands the Army and Navy; Congress does not. He may make all dispositions of troops and officers, stationing them now at this post, now at that; he may send out naval vessels to such parts of the world as he pleases; he may distribute the arms, ammunition, and supplies in such quantities and at such arsenals and depositories as he deems best. All this is a work of ordinary routine in time of peace and is probably left, in fact, to the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, and to military officers high in command.

706. When actual hostilities have commenced, either through a formal declaration made by Congress or a belligerent attack made by a foreign Government which the President must repel by force, another branch of his function as Commander in Chief comes into play. He wages war; Congress does not. The legislature may, it is true, control the course of hostilities in an indirect manner, for it must bestow all the military means and instruments; but it can not interfere in any direct manner with the actual belligerent operations. Wherever be the theater of the warlike movements, whether at home or abroad, whether on land or on the sea, whether there be an invasion or a rebellion, the President as Commander in Chief must conduct those movements; he possesses the sole authority and is clothed with the sole responsibility. (Pomeroy's Constitutional Law (Bennett's tenth edition), pages 590, 591.)

Professor Willoughby expresses his views in language very similar to that of Pomeroy. He says:

Through or under his [the President's] orders, all military operations in times of peace as well as war are conducted. He has within his control the disposition of troops and the direction of vessels of war. (2 Willoughby, Constitution; p. 1207, sec. 713.)

Hare, in his American Constitutional Law (vol. 1, pp. 171, 172), takes the same view, insisting upon a proposition that the President is not, in theory, an agent of Congress for carrying into effect the laws which it enacts, but he is equally with Congress an independent representative of the people of the United States. His language referred to is as follows:

He is as much the representative of the entire people of the United States as any Member of Congress can be of his district and should therefore exercise the discretionary powers confided to him by the Constitution in the way that he may deem best calculated to promote the welfare of the country, which may not be the way deemed best by Congress.

So the question whether the South should be relieved from military occupation and regain the political freedom which the Constitution guarantees was recently determined by the Executive and not by the legislature, which could neither command the withdrawal of the troops nor direct that they should remain.

The want of constitutional power of Congress to control the distribution or use of the military forces of the United States, when once they have been provided by Congress, was also recognized and declared by Mr. Seward in the note which, as Secretary of State, he addressed in October, 1861, to Lord Lyons, the British ambassador:

It seems necessary to state, for the information of that Government, that Congress is by the Constitution invested with no executive power or responsibility whatever, but, on the contrary, that the President of the United States is, by the Constitution and laws, invested with the whole executive power of the Government and charged with the supreme direction of all municipal and ministerial civil agents, as well as of the whole land and naval forces of the United States, and that, invested with these ample powers, he is charged by the Constitution and laws with the absolute duty of suppressing insurrection, as well as of preventing and repelling invasion. (Quoted in Stevens's Sources of the Constitution, 162, 163.)

It may not be inappropriate to this question to refer to Landon's comments on the authority of President Lincoln to issue the emancipation proclamation. After giving, with evident disapproval, the prevailing answer of Civil War times to the objections of those who held that the President's proclamation exceeded his constitutional powers, Landon says:

* * * But the true answer is that, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President has the constitutional power to employ the means recognized by the laws of war as necessary to conquer the enemy. Congress can pass no law which can deprive the President of the power which the Constitution confers in creating him Commander in Chief. (Landon, Constitutional History and Government of the United States, 205.)

Landon's reasoning would, of course, have compelled him to say, had it been relevant to the subject under discussion, that the President has constitutional power to employ the means that are universally recognized as necessary to put his country in a state of defense against the possible exigencies of a prospective war, and that Congress, when once it has provided a military force, can pass no law which will prevent the distribution of this military force in time of peace in such a manner as will, in the President's judgment, best prepare the country to resist attack in the event of its becoming involved in a war.

The case of Captain Meigs, which was passed upon by Attorney General Black, is perhaps useful by way of analogy. It did not involve the distribution of the forces, but it did involve the power of Congress to divide military duties between Army officers. Upon the theory that Congress had by statute conferred upon Captain Meigs the right to superintend and control the building of the Washington Aqueduct, the Attorney General said:

As Commander in Chief of the Army it is your right to decide according to your own judgment what officer shall perform any particular duty, and as the supreme Executive Magistrate you have power of appointment. Congress could not, if it would, take away from the President or in any wise diminish the authority conferred upon him by the Constitution. (9 Ops. Attorney General, 462, 468.)

The general principle applicable to this subject was thus stated by Judge Advocate General Davis in his Treatise on the Military Law of the United States (third edition, p. 323):

In the exercise of military command and in the conduct of military operations the President is not subject to legislative or judicial control.

As Commander in Chief the President is authorized to direct the movements of the land and naval forces placed by law at his command and to employ them in the manner he may deem most effectual to harass and conquer and subdue the enemy. He may invade the hostile country and subject it to the sovereignty and authority of the United States. But his conquests do not enlarge the boundaries of this Union nor extend the operations of our institutions and laws beyond the limits before assigned to them by the legislative power. The power of command and control reserved by the Crown was placed by the Constitution in the hands of the President.

Perhaps the fullest treatment of this subject by any of the text writers is that which is found in Watson's Constitution of the United States (vol. 2, p. 914). Watson says that by the first clause of Article II, section 2, of the Constitution, the President is made commander of the military and naval forces of the United States for the whole time that he is President. He then continues:

No other department of the Government and no other officer of the Government can exercise this power or assume to command either the Army or the Navy unless designated by the President to do so. Congress can legislate relative to the number of the Army or the Navy, the compensation of the officers and men, and the terms of their service, as well as many other matters, but the command of the Army and Navy is vested in the President, and Congress can neither command them or take that power from the President.

The power is vested in the President to dispose of or arrange the component parts of the Army and Navy at his pleasure.

While Congress can make rules for the Army and Navy, it can not interfere with the President's power as commander of such forces.

SOUND POLICY REQUIRES THAT THE PRESIDENT BE LEFT FREE TO CONTROL THE DISTRIBUTION OF THE MILITARY FORCES.

Whether or not the views expressed above, concerning the want of power of Congress to interfere with the President's control of the distribution of the military forces, are shared by Congress, it would seem almost indisputable that as a matter of wisdom and policy Congress ought not to exercise such power.

When the question of the adoption of the Constitution was before the Legislature of the State of New York, the question whether the military power conferred by the Constitution upon the National Government would be a menace was one of the topics of discussion. Alexander Hamilton seems to have conceded that there would be danger of oppression of the people by military power if the right to raise and support armies, and also to direct the use to be made of them, were lodged in a single arm of the Government. Then he added:

But where the purse is lodged in one branch and the sword in another, there can be no danger. All governments have possessed these powers; they would be monsters without them, and incapable of exertion. (2 Elliot's Debates on the Constitution (2d ed.), 349.)

The same thought was expressed in a somewhat different manner by Mr. George Nicholas in addressing the Virginia Legislature upon the ratification of the Constitution (3 id., 497).

While Congress may perhaps not entirely relish the thought, it is true that there is less danger of tyranny and oppression if the power that creates the Army and that taxes the people to support it shall not have the control of the Army when thus raised. If the control, including the distribution of the Army, is vested in the Executive, then there are two branches of the Government that operate as mutual agents upon each other.

This consideration, which was so prominent 135 years ago, seems very unimportant now that the liberties of the people of this country are by tradition and the developments of our history so well protected. The practical reason why Congress ought not to interfere in the distribution of the military forces of the United States is that such interference must, of necessity, conduce to weakness of this Nation in its relations with other nations.

The distribution and use of the military forces involve many problems of difficulty, problems that are soluble advantageously only by trained experts in the art of war, and the Presidency, as an office, includes the military knowledge, experience, and skill of the trained military officers of the Regular Army of the United States. The use of the military forces which the President will make, while, of course, liable to some mistakes, as all human activities are, will on the average be wise and advantageous; whereas if Congress or a committee of Congress were to attempt to do the same thing, it needs no argument to show that on the average it would be done much less advantageously.

But even if Congress were composed entirely of military experts, the direction and distribution of the military forces of the United States could, in the nature of things, not be advantageously exercised by Congress. The delicacy of the relations of the great nations between one another is such that information of a military nature—that is, information that is calculated to influence the directing mind in determining the use and distribution of the military forces of the United States, is almost invariably of a confidential character. Whoever is to determine the use and distribution of the military forces, and to do so wisely, must, of necessity, have access to this information. But to put this information before Congress would necessarily be to publish it to the world, and to put this information before a committee of Congress would be to incur a serious risk of making it public. The fact of making public information of this character would, in many cases, be to precipitate war before the country could make adequate preparations to protect itself against the prospective enemy.

But the incompetency of Congress to control the use and distribution of the military forces is one which it shares with all popular representative assemblies. It is in the nature of things a deliberative body. Its function is and must be to weigh the pros and cons of every measure carefully and then to enact into a law the results of its deliberations. This machinery is, and ought to be, such that quick action is impossible. If Congress were to take upon its shoulders the responsibility for determining this distribution of the forces, it would frequently be met with new situations, due to international or other complications, and would be asked to give new directions as to distribution of the forces. In such case, the strong probability would be that before the two bodies of Congress had acted and had authorized the necessary redistribution of the forces the emergency which made such redistribution advantageous or essential would have passed, and the damage to the country through not having an actual redistribution would have been suffered.

If all the annals of history are searched, few instances, and perhaps no instance, will be found in which a deliberative assembly has attempted to control the distribution and use of military forces. In the French Revolution no such attempt was made, but an attempt was made to punish military commanders whose action in the matter of the use or distribution of military forces did not accord with the views of the legislative authorities in Paris. This was done through civilian commissioners, who attended all of the armies. It is unnecessary to point out to what extent this system proved to be despotic and oppressive and highly disadvantageous in a military sense. There seems to be warning enough against attempting to control the use and distribution of military forces by a deliberative assembly; that in the numerous cases in which a control of this character has been vested in a committee or commission of an executive character, rather than in a single responsible executive, the result has always been highly disadvantageous. Weakness and delay have always followed, and the result has invariably been a deliberate abandonment of this scheme or else the assumption of dictatorial powers by one member of the commission or some other individual. As, for instance, when Napoleon assumed the reins of supreme power.

How bad it would be for Congress to set a definite limit of the military force in a particular place may be pointed out by a single illustration:

Suppose Congress limited the number of troops to be maintained within a strategic distance of the Mexican frontier to, say, 15,000. Suppose the President of the United States through confidential military channels were to learn that Mexico was organizing an army of 250,000 soldiers to invade the United States without any declaration of war, the communication of this fact by the Executive to Congress would, of course, precipitate war before the United States could take measures to meet the emergency. On the other hand, if the President thought the emergency so serious that he could justify his conscience in defying the statute and sending a larger number of troops to the Mexican frontier than the statute authorized, believing that when the true situation became known Congress would promptly vindicate him, the result would be almost as bad. The first movement of troops would precipitate the invasion. In such a case the only safety lies in permitting the President, without taking anyone into his confidence except a few of his military advisers of the highest rank, gradually to send troops to the threatened area and to have mobilization of troops in such case keep pace with the receipt of confidential information as to the growth of the menace.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting therein some authorities with reference to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, under the Constitution the responsibility of raising and supporting an Army rests upon Congress. It is our business and our responsibility to fix the size of the Army. I have disagreed with the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. ANTHONY] and the members of that committee on their recommendation to the House as to the size of that Army. The vote of the House has demonstrated the fact that the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations reflected the judgment of a majority of the Members of the House, and that matter is now settled.

While we fix the size of the Army, the control, disposition, and movement of that Army is without our jurisdiction entirely, and under the Constitution is vested in the President as the Commander in Chief.

Article II, section 1, relating to the power of the President, provides:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

Section 2 of the same article provides:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

It will be noted that the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, with no restrictions as to whether the country is in peace or war.

It will not be claimed that Congress has the power under the Constitution to control, move, or dispose of the Army in direct and express legislative terms. The power to move and dispose of an army necessarily rests in the Commander in Chief, otherwise he, the Commander in Chief, has the title in name only. So that the committee has not attempted in express terms to deprive the President of the power which the Constitution confers upon him. They do this not directly but indirectly under the guise of a limitation upon an appropriation for the support of the Army. In this manner the Committee on Appropriations requests the House to control the Army and its disposition and thereby deprive the President of the power that is rightfully his.

In so doing they have accomplished their object just as effectively as if they had gone about it through a direct legislative direction to the President. For example, it will not be contended that Congress has the power by express terms to provide that no troops shall be garrisoned in China, but the same result is obtained by this limitation as would have been obtained if a direct provision had been embodied in the bill, for the limitation prevents any troops so garrisoned in China from being paid, and an army can not be maintained when deprived of its pay.

I deny, first, the power and authority of Congress, under the Constitution, to interfere with the exclusive powers of the Executive. Secondly, assuming for the purposes of argument that Congress has this power, I disagree emphatically with the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations as to the wisdom of exercising it.

I shall first take up the question of constitutionality, and I use that term in its broad general sense as distinguished from the purely technical legal sense.

The fathers who sat in the constitutional convention had some very definite ideas about government. They believed in separating the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of that government and, in so far as possible, to make those branches independent of one another. They had but emerged from the War of Independence and were trying to avoid the anarchy and chaos following that war. Its members included Washington, Hamilton, and others who had witnessed during the days of the Revolutionary War the inefficiency of the legislative body attempting to function as an executive, which resulted in interference with military operations and caused great trouble and embarrassment and added materially to the increasing of the cost of the military operations. Washington had had to put up with congressional interference and knew its evils. Hamilton had been on Washington's staff and was thoroughly familiar with all of the troubles and embarrassments that Washington had been subjected to by the Continental Congress, which was clothed with the powers of an executive. There is no question but what they and their colleagues made up their minds that the new Government would have an Executive that was clothed with real power. Furthermore, the governors of several of the 13 States were clothed with power, making them commander in chief of the military forces of their State. Therefore, with experience and precedent to guide and direct them, the Chief Executive was made the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, both in time of war and peace.

There is nothing plainer in the Constitution than the provision conferring upon the President, without limitation, the power of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

In looking over the various grants of power in the Constitution to the President it will be found that there are, generally speaking, three distinct classes of powers or duties devolving upon the President. First, as the Chief Executive he is charged with seeing that the laws are executed and obeyed. While it is his duty to see that the laws are enforced, the President can not exercise this grant of power until Congress has placed upon the statute books laws to be obeyed and enforced. Secondly, the President under the Constitution is made the sole instrument of communication with foreign nations in our negotiations and transactions with them. This is a different grant of power, for it will be observed that he, and he alone, is charged with this responsibility, and his right to so speak and act rests not upon any action of Congress at all, but upon this constitutional grant of power. The exercise of power under this grant requires no legislation whatever. Third, then there are those powers that are conferred that require legislative action before there is created an opportunity for the President to exercise the powers conferred in the Constitution. They involve instances where the power is complete but where the subject matter is lacking. For example, while the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, there is nothing for him to command until Congress acts and raises an Army and builds a Navy. But the moment that Congress does act, and raises an Army and builds a Navy, it thereby furnishes the President an opportunity to exercise fully and completely the power that the Constitution confers upon him as the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. Congress exhausts its own power and authority when it raises the Army and provides a Navy. It is as to this power that I call special attention to. In this connection I desire to quote from Pomeroy, from Constitutional Law, third edition, page 470:

> The President is thus clothed with a most important military function. He is to command the forces at all times; Congress never commands them. As such commander he wages war; Congress never wages war. We must endeavor, however, to ascertain the exact limits of this attribute and to distinguish it from the ordinary duty of executing the laws. The legislature alone furnishes the occasions upon which it can come into play, but can not interfere with or control the attribute itself. Congress raises and supplies armies and navies, and makes rules for their government, and there its power and duty ends. The additional power of the President as supreme commander is independent and absolute.

The writer then quotes from the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Chase in the celebrated case of Ex parte Milligan, where the Chief Justice said:

> The power to make the necessary laws is in Congress, the power to execute in the President. Both powers imply many subordinate and auxiliary powers. Each includes all authorities essential to its due exercise. But neither can the President in war more than in peace intrude upon the proper authority of Congress, nor Congress upon the proper authority of the President. Both are servants of the people, whose will is expressed in the fundamental law.

The author then proceeds to detail some of the powers of Congress in reference to the Army and the Navy, and contrasts those with certain distinct and independent powers of the President. I quote further from page 471:

> In the time of peace, therefore, the President's functions, as far as they relate to the Army and Navy, are of two separate and entirely distinct characters, and to avoid confusion we must carefully distinguish between these attributes. In respect to certain classes of measures he acts entirely in his general capacity of executive, and takes care that the laws are faithfully executed. Congress, under its supreme authority, passes laws which concern the military alone, and these the President must enforce with the same diligence, and by virtue of the same function that he carries out those legislative mandates which apply alone to civilians; he is not then operating as commander, but as the supreme civil magnate. But as Commander in Chief he calls other attributes into action, for which the legislature has furnished the occasion, but which do not consist in executing any positive laws. I repeat, it is important that these two classes of power and duties should be kept distinct. Under its authority to raise armies, maintain navies, furnish supplies, and the like, Congress may direct the manner in which the President's power shall be exercised, for he will be, in fact, but executing its commands. Thus it may determine how many men shall be enlisted in each branch of the service, or what and how many armed vessels shall be constructed. As Congress is to make all appropriations, it may declare the specific purpose for which money is to be used; what forts shall be erected, and their cost; what ships built, their character and cost; what kind of arms purchased or manufactured, and the cost. Instances of this sort might be multiplied. In all these cases great or little discretion may be left to the Executive and his subordinates, as the legislature deems best.
> Congress is authorized to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces; it may, therefore, arrange and classify these forces; fix upon the plan of organization; determine upon the number, duties, and pay of officers; define military offenses and allot the punishment; provide for the creation, jurisdiction, and procedure of courts-martial, and for carrying out their sentences. The President's duties in respect to these various subjects may thus be clearly defined and controlled by the legislature. But in time of peace he has an independent function. He commands the Army and Navy; Congress does not. He may make all disposition of troops and officers, stationing them now at this post, now at that; he may send out naval vessels to such parts of the world as he pleases; he may distribute the arms, ammunition, and supplies in such quantities and to such arsenals and depositories as he deems best.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 17, 1909, will be found a speech by Senator Bacon, who was an authority upon constitutional law, and which details the powers of the President. It is as follows:

> The President is an executive. Upon him devolves the execution of the law and the enforcement of the law; and the enforcement of the law must necessarily be, in its last analysis, through the military arm. Of course, the President can not be the supreme executive unless he has the supreme command of that through which the execution of the law must be enforced. The civil authority is supreme, and the military authority is subject to the order of the civil authority and executes its order. Here is an order from the court; the posse comitatus is summoned for the purpose of executing the mandate of the court, but is unable to do it by reason of superior force opposed to it, and finally it must appeal to the Executive to use the military arm to carry out the order of the court. That is what I mean by saying that in the last analysis the military arm is that by which the law is executed or must be executed.

Watson, on the Constitution, page 914, volume 2, with reference to the powers of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, has this to say:

> By this clause he is made commander of the military and naval forces of the United States for the whole time that he is President. No other department of the Government and no other officer of the Government can exercise this power or assume the command of either the Army or the Navy unless designated by the President to do so. Congress can legislate relative to the number of the Army or the Navy, the compensation of the officers and men, the term of their service, as well as many other matters, but the command of the Army and the Navy is vested in the President, and Congress can neither command them nor take that power from the President.
> The power is vested in the President to dispose of or arrange the component parts of the Army and Navy at his pleasure. In practice he does this through the military and naval departments of the Government, but their action is his action. While Congress can make rules for the Army and Navy, it can not interfere—it can not interfere with the President's power as commander of such forces. The line between the exercise of his power as commander and that of Congress is plain, and neither can rightfully or legally invade the other.

It seems to me that it is clear from these authorities that the President as the Commander in Chief of the Army in peace or in war can move or dispose of them as he sees fit. It is difficult to find court decisions that are directly in point for the very reason that it is difficult to so raise a question of this kind as to present it to the courts for decision. On a question of this character, if Congress insists upon its power to act, whether constitutional or not, the Executive would be without a remedy.

If Congress can by this method limit the power of the President and prohibit him from maintaining troops in China, it would have the right to limit or prohibit the garrisoning of troops in any other part of the world, including any part or portion of the United States. If it can limit one garrison, it can limit all garrisons; if it limits all garrisons, then what is there left of the power and authority of the Commander in Chief of the Army?

If Congress has the right to so limit the Army, it could provide that no part of the appropriation for the Navy should go to the payment of marines who are landed upon foreign soil to protect the lives of American citizens. The President is charged with seeing that our laws are enforced. In foreign affairs he speaks for the country. It is his business to see that the lives of American citizens are protected. In fulfilling his obligation under the Constitution it has been the practice of Presidents to land American marines on foreign soil to protect the lives of American citizens. In so doing he is only doing his sworn duty; if he fails so to act, he would be violating his obligations under the Constitution; yet if Congress has this power, which the Committee on Appropriations seems to feel that it has, it could prevent the President from paying any marines so used by him.

Mr. Chairman, from such examination and consideration of the authorities as I have been able to make, I am thoroughly convinced that Congress would be violating the spirit of the Constitution, if not the letter, if we passed this appropriation bill with this limitation, for it is perfectly clear that those who framed the Constitution intended and in expressed terms provided that if an army was raised, that army and its disposition and control should be by its Commander in Chief, the President of the United States.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. But let us take the great number that there is in Panama and the great number in Hawaii. If the Chief Executive wants to keep that big army over there against the will of Congress, how is Congress going to stop it unless we legislate in this fashion?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Let Congress reduce the Army to the size it would like to have it, when the Executive will have to arrange the Army accordingly. When we go that far, that is as far as we can go.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the Executive should determine to keep 50,000 American troops in Germany and that everybody in Congress was opposed to that. Does the gentleman think that Congress ought to sit down and do nothing and let the Executive do as he pleases about it, and pay the troops regardless of whether we want them there or not?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is not the question before us.

Mr. MANN. But that is the constitutional question before us.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is the constitutional question; but it is my own opinion that so far as that is concerned the power rests with the President, and that the only control that Congress has is over the purse strings. Of course, there is the power of public opinion over the President.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman as to the item in the bill, but I do not agree with the reason that he gives.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will permit, there is the further power of impeaching the President if he abuses the power that is granted to him.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Exactly so. I now come to the question of the policy and wisdom of exercising this power, assuming only for the purposes of argument that Congress has the power. This provision limits the pay available for troops at Panama and in the Hawaiian Islands and in Europe. It provides that it shall not be available to pay for troops garrisoned in China. The question before us is not that pertaining to the wisdom of maintaining troops in these various localities. My objection to this form of legislation is not as to the policy of maintaining or withdrawing them, but as to the wisdom of Congress in attempting to interfere in a question which is so closely involved in the question of our national defense and in the handling of our foreign relations. The President is the mouthpiece of the Nation in all communications with foreign countries and in negotiating matters with foreign nations. We have seen here that this limitation in effect absolutely precludes him from having any troops whatever in China.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, I think the gentleman does not mean to make that statement, because the President in the time of an emergency could send the entire Army to China.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In time of an emergency, yes; but the gentleman does not think that an emergency exists to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. We certainly do not, and no military officer advanced any argument to the committee why there should be.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This provision is a mandate to the President to withdraw troops from China, no matter what our foreign relations happen to be at the present time.

The arrangement and disposition of our small Army is vitally connected with the military policy of our country. It is the judgment of those men who are charged with the responsibility of handling and disposing of our Army that these restrictions should not be placed. Our action in this respect will have material bearing upon our foreign relations. It is claimed that in one instance it will affect our obligations not only to our own citizens but to other nations growing out of understandings entered into with those nations. It would seem to me that this being the case, that this committee before making this recommendation to the House should have sought the advice, counsel, and judgment of the Secretary of State, but a search of the hearings fails to show any effort to get the opinion of the Secretary of State. Mark you, that the Secretary of War appeared before the committee and advised the committee that this was a State Department and administration question. But notwithstanding this the Secretary of State was not called before the committee. Since that time the Secretary of State has advised the House by a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the responsibility and obligation that this country is under by reason of the conditions in China. I quote from the letter as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
March 15, 1922.

The Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
Chairman Military Affairs Committee,
House of Representatives.

SIR: With reference to your conversation of to-day over the telephone with the Far Eastern Division of this department, I have the honor to state that the right to station troops at Tientsin, China, and along the line of the railway which connects Peking with the sea was conceded to the United States and to certain of the European powers by the final protocol for the settlement of the disturbances in China of 1900, which was signed September 7, 1901.

During the Chinese revolution of 1911 and 1912 the powers who were party to the protocol of 1901, including the United States, considered that the disturbed conditions then prevailing in the neighborhood of Peking necessitated the stationing of troops at Tientsin and at other places along the railway between Tientsin and Peking for the purpose of maintaining open communication between the capital of China and the sea. In recognition of its obligation in this connection the United States dispatched to Tientsin a number of troops, which in 1921 numbered 62 officers and 1,469 enlisted men. During the summer of 1921 the Secretary of War raised the question as to whether this number of troops might be entirely withdrawn or reduced, and on July 9, 1921, the State Department informed the Secretary of War that it did not favor the entire withdrawal of these men, because such action might result in unsettling the situation then prevailing.

The department expressed itself, however, as being agreeable to a reduction of 50 per cent. The Department of State now understands that a reduction of 50 per cent was effected last fall. The conditions prevailing on July 9, 1921, have not changed, and the department still believes that it would be inexpedient at the present time to effect any radical change in the present arrangement.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant, CHARLES E. HUGHES.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This action is being taken against the advice of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War, the General of our Armies, and the Assistant Chief of the General Staff, and a search of the hearings produces no evidence in any way controverting the statements or the arguments of these men.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Will the gentleman tell the committee how it is physically possible or how it is going to be physically possible to get troops any such distance as that in adequate time after the emergency has arisen?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Why, you can not get them there in time. There are two different governments there. We know from the press and reliable authorities that one is kept in power largely because of the influence of a large group of bandits, and yet under those circumstances, and with that situation confronting us, this House is asked to upset the policy of 125 or 130 years and direct the President where he shall put the Army of the United States. Gentlemen, it is wrong.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. As I understand from my friend, he is advocating the keeping of soldiers in China for the purpose of taking sides in a possible pending controversy?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No; the gentleman from Kansas did not understand the gentleman from Minnesota to be advocating anything of the kind. The gentleman from Minnesota does not advocate that, but the gentleman from Minnesota says that the President of the United States, who is charged with the administration of our foreign affairs, can be trusted with 500 men or 50,000 men. [Applause.] The gentleman from Minnesota says to the gentleman from Kansas that this House ought not under these circumstances, with a man like Judge Hughes as Secretary of State, to say to the President of the United States, coming, as he does, from the great conference here, that this Congress is not willing to trust its President—its Chief Executive—in the handling of our foreign affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman claim there is an emergency in China?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do not make any such claim.

Mr. TINCHER. Well, it has been held by the Secretary of War since he appeared before the committee that there was not an emergency in Germany and he is sending the troops home, where they should have been three years ago.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But bear in mind the hearing was on the 20th of February, and at that time the Secretary of War informed the committee that he was reducing the forces there, and that very soon it would be reduced to 2,000 men. Since then we have been denied payment of the expense of maintaining this Rhine army. In my judgment the Secretary of War for that reason is going to withdraw the troops, and it ought to be left to him; it ought to be left to the President, and we ought not to usurp the functions of the Chief Executive.

Mr. EDMONDS. Do I understand this will take away the regiment we have in China at the present time?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Absolutely. We are under an understanding with the several nations to maintain troops there, and this committee has reported to the House a provision which will take them away.

Mr. ANTHONY. The bill very plainly says except in case of an emergency, and if this country is in such condition as the gentleman says, and the President says there is an emergency, he can keep the whole 115,000 there.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; but there is not an emergency there to-day, the gentleman says.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman was just describing an emergency of civil war in China.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That would not be considered an emergency, because that condition existed when the bill was up for consideration.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not want to infringe upon the gentleman's time.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I would like to have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks for five minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman permit me to quote to him what the Secretary of War says about it?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I asked him this:

Mr. ANTHONY. In regard to the force we maintain in China: This committee is going to insist, Mr. Secretary, on trying to lop off every expense it considers unnecessary, and so far there has been no real argument presented to this committee why we should continue to maintain the expense of keeping a force of troops in China.

Secretary WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the desires of the committee are the desires of the War Department; we are all in the same boat. We want to economize and reduce wherever we can do it with safety; the only difference will be perhaps in judgment about the extent and where the reductions in expense should be made. I do not know about the conditions in China that require the maintenance of a force there. It is part of the Philippine Islands force—two battalions, as I remember. That is largely an administration and State Department matter. I have never asked the President how long he wanted to maintain those troops in China; perhaps I have been negligent in that respect, although I assume if he and the State Department wanted to make a change that I would get my directions, and the change would be made, of course.

Now, if there is any pressing necessity, does not the gentleman think the Secretary would have intimated it to the committee?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. He admitted he did not know but that it was a matter within the discretion of the State Department. Now, was he called in for advice—the Secretary of State? There is not a word in the hearings to indicate that he was, but since then we know that the Secretary of State feels that the troops should not be withdrawn.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the bill is passed in this way in reference to the keeping of troops unless in any of those places there is declared to be an emergency, I want to ask the gentleman whether it is not often very dangerous to declare an emergency?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman from New Jersey is absolutely correct. The feeling that there was an emergency requiring the moving of troops to a place might create an even greater emergency, which would cost the country millions of dollars.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What would have been the attitude of the world if, when President Roosevelt sent the Navy around South America, he had announced there was an emergency that required the demonstration?

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, as the constitutional leader of the Army and the Navy of the United States, it is not only the privilege but the duty of the President of the United States to shift any of the armed forces wherever he thinks it is necessary for him to do it, and if he has not that privilege, then he is not Commander in Chief of the forces.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. EDMONDS. After the Boxer rebellion there was an international agreement between several nations that they would each carry sufficient troops to guard the railroad between Tientsin and Peking. There may be no emergency in China tomorrow or next week; but it was an international arrangement and has been carried out ever since, and it is a very necessary arrangement, in my mind, and should be carried out.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I take it from the gentleman's argument that he considers the provisions of this bill, in fact, a usurpation of the President's prerogatives and powers?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There is no question about it at all.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Might there not be an emergency in China which was not an emergency between the United States and China but might require the presence of the United States troops there, when there is such an unsettled condition there that there are two rival governments being maintained now?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. We have big responsibilities in China, and we are placing the President, in a way, where he, as the head of our Nation, can not perform them.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is it not plain enough that we have American citizens in China and that they have large property interests there and still need the presence of American troops to protect them in such a time as there is in China at present, without the presence of an emergency at all?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Exactly.

Mr. Chairman, why should we adopt this unprecedented course? Why should we overturn the precedents of over a century and deprive the Executive of his rightful power over the Army? Have we lost confidence in the President? Has he in any way abused its powers and privileges? As the head of our Army has he in any way failed to carry out his responsibilities and duties? No one claims this. Furthermore, no one could claim it. Mr. Chairman, the President's handling of the foreign relations of our country has probably been unexcelled in our history. He came into the office one year ago at a very critical time. During this one-year period we have settled our difficulties with Costa Rica and other Central American countries, brought Mexico to a point where now she respects this country and its flag and no longer molests our borders or takes the lives of our citizens. We are adjusting the rights of American citizens in Mesopotamia. Finally, at the Washington conference which has just closed, with masterly hand the President of the United States and his able advisor, Mr. Secretary Hughes, have negotiated treaties which, when ratified, will settle the very vexing problems of the Far East and permit this country and the other great nations of the world to limit their expenditures for navies and thereby take from the backs of the people tax burdens equaling hundreds of millions of dollars annually. Why should this Congress manifest its lack of confidence in such an Executive, at such a time when the whole country has repeatedly manifested its confidence in him?

Mr. Chairman, this action is unwarranted. It is uncalled for. It is in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, if not the letter. It is such action that if once taken by us probably can not be corrected, for it would be difficult to review it in the courts. The power of Congress and the power of the House of Representatives over the purse is in practical effect without limit. The House of Representatives ought always to be very jealous of its own power. We ought always to reserve to ourselves the right to say what size the Army shall be. But, while we jealously guard our own rights, we ought not to intrude upon the rights of the Executive. Mr. Chairman, the motion to strike out the limitation, consisting of the entire paragraph, should prevail.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MODEL MARINE INSURANCE LAW.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address of David M. Lea, delivered before the Washington Board of Trade on the model marine insurance law, March 21, 1922.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF DAVID M. LEA, DELIVERED BEFORE THE WASHINGTON BOARD OF TRADE ON THE MODEL MARINE INSURANCE LAW, MARCH 21, 1922.

Mr. President, honored guests, and fellow members of the board of trade: In the preparation of this paper on the subject of the recently enacted model marine insurance bill, which has now become a law, I am keenly aware of the largeness of the subject and the smallness of my ability to properly put before you a subject so highly technical and bristling with difficulties of interpretation. Therefore I shall not worry you with the technical side of this question, but endeavor to touch upon the more salient features of it in its broader aspects.

There are few within the sound of my voice who realize that three-fourths of our insurance on vessels and two-thirds of our insurance on both cargoes and vessels are under the control of foreign insurance companies. In order to explain more clearly to those who are not familiar with this subject, I desire to call attention to the highly technical and competitive character of the business and the way in which it is handled and controlled.

Eight brokerage firms in this country place practically all of the insurance and place it abroad for the reason that foreign companies, owing to lack of legislative restrictions and lower taxation, can quote lower rates and thus render it impossible for American companies to compete. This is a distinct disadvantage to American commerce because price competition in international commerce is so close that frequently the difference in the cost of insurance determines the country to which the order is to be given. There is no international agreement on rates such as there is between fire insurance companies in this country, which, by consent of the States and with a nationwide organization, are enabled to charge the proper rate to cover the hazard, consequently making a fixed rate. Such is not the case in marine insurance, which is very fluid and is subject only to the conditions and demands in the various countries, thus practically putting it in the hands of the brokers instead of the companies. The law under consideration removes these restrictions and lowers the taxation, thereby enabling companies in the United States to compete for their share of the business.

The United States Government, both by expenditure of money and by legislation, has endeavored to create a fleet of vessels to carry our cargoes abroad and to compete for the world's trade. Over these vessels flies the American flag but under it and rendering it useless is the cover of foreign insurance, because our leading competitors have for years used marine insurance to preempt leading lines of trade. Nations that are strong in marine-insurance facilities may deny the service altogether or give it only under unfavorable conditions to the citizens of other nations who do not possess adequate facilities of their own. Possession of sufficient underwriting capacity, free from foreign control, is essential to the proper protection of commercial secrets from our trade competitors. Foreign underwriters, when insuring American cargoes, necessarily learn the facts concerning the carriers used, the consignees, methods of packing and handling, financial affiliations of the consignors, costs of production, and the conditions and price of sales. Therefore, there is pressing need for ample and independent American marine insurance companies, and I take it for granted that no American citizen wishes to see such a deplorable state of affairs to continue.

It is necessary, therefore, to remove the shackles that have bound marine insurance ever since the decision by the Supreme Court of the United States many years ago, in the case of Paul v. Virginia, in which it was decided that insurance was not interstate commerce and was, therefore, subject to the control of each individual State, a condition which has produced a chaos of 48 different varieties of legislation, taxation, and rates on a matter that, in spite of the decision of the Supreme Court, is the support and basis of credit for all interstate and foreign commerce and should be treated as such.

Insurance, in its last analysis, is a tax upon the people and should be fairly and economically administered. Modern taxation of business is being modeled more and more upon the principles of ability to pay, fair treatment between different types of essential industries, and avoidance of burdens so harsh as to destroy the initiative of capital; and it is difficult to explain why the freedom of incorporation prevailing in this country with respect to other business enterprises should have been denied to insurance companies.

People do not realize that insurance is a part of the cost of everything that is used—the clothing they wear, the food they eat, and the houses they live in. And yet insurance is rapidly replacing the railroads as a legislative toy. The drift is unmistakable, the threat of danger precise and certain. In 1916 there were 720 bills relating to insurance introduced in State legislatures. In 1921 there were 1,429 such bills presented, a gain in the five-year interval of almost 100 per cent. While some of these proposed laws were constructive and necessary measures, the great bulk of them were of a radical, restrictive, or harassing nature with a distinctly socialistic background. The anxiety of our legislative medicine men, who seek to cure all ills by a dose of laws, should occasion little wonder, as a business insurance ranks with the foremost enterprises of the age, and, therefore, offers a fruitful field for political terrorism and plunder. It would be as difficult to think of commerce without insurance as it would be to think of transportation without railroads, vessels, automobiles, or airships. Modern life has become so completely immersed in the theory and practice of insurance that there are few contingencies affecting human relationships to which its principles have not been successfully applied. It is, perhaps, our most universal institution, reaching in its wide sweep all classes of people, all industries, and all business interests. To human progress it has become essential and as a means toward general economic security it is indispensable. The prospect, therefore, that it may be tinkered with and exploited by designing, corrupt, or ignorant politicians is worthy of the most serious consideration.

Therefore I do not hesitate to designate the law under consideration as the Magna Charta of insurance legislation, for, while it applies particularly to marine insurance, it is equally applicable in its principles to fire and other lines because of the inclusion of the multiple line feature which, with the exception of one State—Wisconsin—is recognized in this country for the first time, although it has been in existence in Europe for 200 years and has been used as a means of strengthening and enlarging our foreign competitors, who, through it, have been able to reach the various markets of the world and to enjoy the average obtained by handling the different branches of insurance, while our institutions have been confined to a single market and a single branch of insurance. All of which tends to a lower cost of production, lower loss ratio through distribution of hazard, and more economical management in one of our essential industries.

Marine insurance is a national commercial weapon, and it may be doubted if any other essential and strategic business has suffered so cruelly from unwise and merciless taxation. It is interesting to know that the taxation equals the underwriting profits recently agreed upon by the national convention of insurance commissioners, which decided upon an allowance of 5 per cent as a reasonable and fair profit. What other important business could stand such an inroad upon its profits? In order to preserve their solvency this has to be passed on by the companies to the people in the rates charged. The law under consideration obviates this by a tax upon the profits instead of the premiums received, and therefore lowers the cost.

The law was prepared with a view to its adoption by the various States following the example of the District of Columbia, which process has already begun—notably in New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois—and it is hoped will result in a standardization of the business so that the conditions will be the same insurance wise in California as well as in New York.

Such is the contribution it is hoped the District of Columbia will make to the national welfare, and I would like to pause for a moment in this discussion to call attention to the important part that the board of trade has had in this legislation. It is the only trade body in the District of Columbia which contributed anything toward the development and the final results of this law through the cooperation of its insurance committee which, in the inception of the movement in regard to this law, was called into consultation by those handling the measure and by the superintendent of insurance of the District of Columbia, Dr. Lewis A. Griffith. I also beg to call attention to the splendid services of Doctor Griffith, who, when he discovered that certain portions of the bill were inimical to the welfare of the local District of Columbia companies, particularly in regard to the requirements for capitalization and surplus, demanded and obtained changes that safeguarded the interests of our local companies.

Having set forth the national and international aspects of this law, I desire briefly to touch upon its interests to the District of Columbia. Although it is essentially a national commerce measure, one should not lose sight of the fact that various sections of the law are designed to benefit the District of Columbia in very important particulars.

Section 3 provides for the creation of corporations for the sole purpose of transacting a reinsurance business, and there seems to be no reason why purely reinsurance companies can not advantageously organize in the District. Incidentally, I would like to state that movements are already on foot to accomplish this purpose, and organizations possessing millions of dollars are considering taking advantage of the law and establishing companies in the District at the present time.

Section 21 provides for the organization within the District of corporations engaged exclusively in the writing of insurance in foreign countries, the capital stock of which corporations may be owned by American companies engaged in the same kind of insurance.

Other sections of the law will serve very materially in fostering the success of these two types of companies, as well as other companies which may decide to organize within the District. Moreover, the American marine insurance syndicates already have their domiciles in the District, and one of the essential purposes of the law is to bring about a legislative situation under which these syndicates may develop and thrive so that it will no longer be necessary to send nearly half a billion dollars of premiums abroad, carrying with it vital trade secrets for the information of our commercial rivals in the competition for the trade of the world.

There is no reason why, with this favorable legislation, Washington should not become one of the country's largest insurance centers, and as we have the finest material for the selection of efficient clerical forces of any city in the country, the opening of offices for those desiring to take advantage of this law will afford employment to many people.

It is a known fact that a single company entering the field of marine insurance is somewhat handicapped and in many instances has met with disaster, but to those operating through syndicates, by the enlargement of premium income, distribution of losses through the scattering of the hazard, through the material lowering of expenses on account of economy of operation, and by having the experience of the best brains in the marine business at comparatively little cost, participation may be advantageously made by companies otherwise financially unable to enter this important field. At the present time the syndicates operating in the District of Columbia are confined in their cover to $2,000,000 on hulls under syndicate B for Shipping Board vessels and two and a half million dollars on hulls under syndicate C for privately owned vessels. The entry of other companies not only from the District but from the balance of the country into these syndicates under the provisions of this law will be greatly welcomed and would enable them to carry the four or five million dollar cover, which is the goal at which they now aim. It seems to me that to the extent of their resources that this is a legitimate avenue for the enterprise of our local fire companies.

The organization of large reinsurance companies in the District of Columbia should very greatly help our local fire companies, which hitherto have hesitated to branch out into larger fields because of inadequacy of finances.

Lastly, our local fire insurance companies should be congratulated on the opportunity afforded them to take advantage of what is believed to be the most advanced, fairest, and sanest piece of insurance legislation that has been enacted in this country for the last hundred years. And in conclusion I desire to pay high tribute to Congressman GEORGE W. EDMONDS, of Pennsylvania, but for whose tact and untiring energy it could not have been accomplished, and I desire to give him his full mead of praise for the passage of this measure, which was universally believed to be impossible.

Respectfully submitted.

DAVID M. LEA,
Chairman Insurance Committee, Washington Board of Trade.
